Estate of Jones by Jones v. City of Martinsburg, W. Virginia, No. 17-1003, 2018 WL 1151558, at *5 (4th Cir. Mar. 5, 2018) (not reported) ("Even though Jones did not release the knife when instructed to do so, a reasonable jury could consider the totality of the facts and still find that the officers exercised excessive force. Most critically, it is not clear that Jones continued to pose an immediate threat of physical harm to the officers at the time they shot and killed him. The video evidence shows that when the officers backed away, drew their firearms, and formed a semi-circle around Jones, Jones remained on the ground. At least one police officer stated that Jones 'did not make any overt acts with the knife towards the officers' once they stepped back. Furthermore, the officers reported that Jones lay on his right side on the sidewalk with the knife in his right hand, which would further support a reasonable jury finding that Jones was not wielding the knife when the officers shot him. The district court's analysis wholly fails to account for these facts and the reasonable inferences that could be drawn from them in the Estate's favor. Instead, the district court incorrectly assumed that the deceased's possession of a knife and the fact that he resisted arrest necessarily rendered the officers' use of deadly force reasonable. In doing so, the district court erred by considering the facts in the light most favorable to the officers, concluding that the Defendants-Appellees' version of events was essentially undisputed despite discrepancies among the officers' accounts, and reasoning that Jones's continuing grasp on the knife from where he lay on the ground—beaten, choked, and tased—indisputably constituted an immediate threat to the officers' safety at the time he was shot. . . Because genuine issues of material fact remain which underlie the determination of whether the force the officers used was excessive, we conclude that summary judgment was improper on the Estate's § 1983 claim against the officers for use of excessive force in violation of Jones's Fourth Amendment rights, as well as on the related § 1983 claim brought against the city. Accordingly, we reverse and remand the case to the district court for further proceedings on these claims.")

Gandy v. Robey, 520 F. App'x 134, 145-47 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The district court submitted interrogatories # 3 and # 4 to the jury in an effort to sort out the question of qualified immunity. Under the approach established in Saucier, analysis of a qualified immunity claim involves a two-step procedure 'that asks first whether a constitutional violation occurred and second whether the right violated was clearly established.'. . As previously suggested, the district court intended interrogatory # 3 to resolve the first question of whether Robey committed a constitutional violation by asking the jury:

Has the plaintiff, Terry A. Gandy, established by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant Neal Patrick Robey violated David Charles Gandy's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive use of force, or his Fourteenth Amendment [right] not to be deprived of life without due process of law, when he shot David Charles Gandy?

J.A. 961 (emphasis added). The jury answered 'yes' to this question. In interrogatory # 4, which the district court intended to resolve the second question of whether Robey was entitled to qualified immunity despite the constitutional violation, the jury was asked:

Do you find that at the time that he shot David Charles Gandy, Deputy Neal Patrick Robey had a reasonable belief that Mr. Gandy posed an imminent threat of causing death or serious bodily injury to Deputy Robey or to other persons present at the scene?

J.A. 962 (emphasis added). The jury answered 'yes' to this question as well, but then reached a general verdict in Terry's favor, awarding her $267,000 in compensatory damages. In responding affirmatively to special interrogatory # 3, the jury concluded as a factual matter that Deputy Robey's act of shooting David constituted excessive force, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. This finding is inconsistent with the jury's answer to special interrogatory # 4, in which the jury concluded that Deputy Robey had a reasonable belief that David posed an imminent threat of causing death or serious bodily injury to persons present at the scene of the incident. The inconsistency between the answers to these two questions is apparent because the factual question presented in interrogatory # 4, whether Deputy Robey reasonably believed that David posed a threat of imminent harm, is a core component of the issue addressed by special interrogatory # 3, namely, whether the force employed by Deputy Robey was excessive. As the Supreme Court held in Graham v.. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), an analysis of the reasonableness of a particular use of force 'requires careful attention to the facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.' Id. at 396 (emphasis added). This court, too, has made clear that the question of whether a suspect posed an immediate threat of harm to an officer is a factor relevant to the analysis of an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. [citing cases] Accordingly, the factual question of whether an individual poses a threat of danger is a component of, and is subsumed by, the broader question of whether the officer's use of force to seize an individual was excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Unfortunately, special interrogatories # 3 and # 4 permitted the jury to answer these interrelated questions in an inconsistent manner. According to the jury, Deputy Robey reasonably believed that David posed an imminent threat of serious harm, yet the jury concluded that Deputy Robey used excessive force in preventing David from carrying out such a threat of harm. In addition to being inconsistent with each other, of course, these interrogatory answers are inconsistent with the general verdict awarding Terry $267,000 in compensatory damages. Despite its conclusion that Robey reasonably perceived an immediate threat from Gandy, it awarded damages as a result of his conduct. These inconsistencies implicate Fed. R. Civ. P 49(b)(4) and leave us no choice but to remand for a new trial.")

Gregg v. Ham, 678 F.3d 333, 338, 339 (4th Cir. 2012) ("Ham contends that he is entitled to a new trial on the § 1983 claim because the district court improperly submitted the legal question of qualified immunity to the jury. Because Ham did not object to the jury instruction at trial, we review for plain error. . . .[I]n Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 560 (4th Cir.2005), we explained that if 'a dispute of material fact precludes a conclusive ruling on qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, the district court should submit factual questions to the jury and reserve for itself the legal question of whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the facts found by the jury.'. . . Here, the district court asked the jury, 'Could defendant Jon E. Ham, based upon the totality of the circumstances, have reasonably believed that plaintiff had given him knowing and voluntary consent to search her home?'. . Neither party objected to the court's instruction. Relying on the rule announced in Willingham, Ham now contends that the jury instruction constituted plain error because it required the jury to answer the legal question of qualified immunity. We need not resolve this issue, however, because even assuming the instruction was improper, there was no error because Ham was not entitled to a qualified immunity defense.")

International Ground Transportation v. Mayor and City Council of Ocean City, 475 F.3d 214, 219, 220 n.3 (4th Cir. 2007) ("[D]espite the general bar to municipal liability set out in Heller, a situation may arise in which a finding of no liability on the part of the individual municipal actors can co-exist with a finding of liability on the part of the municipality. Namely, such a verdict could result when the individual defendants successfully assert a qualified immunity defense. This case presents exactly this situation.. . . We hold, therefore, that when a jury, which has been instructed on a qualified immunity defense as to the individual defendants, returns a general verdict in favor of the individual defendants but against the municipality, the verdict is consistent and liability will lie against the municipality (assuming the verdict is proper in all other respects). . . We do not intend our holding here to approve the submission of qualified immunity to juries. Entitlement to qualified immunity is a legal question to be decided to the court, although factual issues underlying the qualified immunity analysis may be submitted to a jury. . . Nonetheless, we find it necessary to hold as we do here because the parties do not maintain that the district court erred in submitting qualified immunity to the jury.").

Schultz v. Braga, 455 F.3d 470, 479 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In sum, there remain genuine issues of material fact as to the circumstances leading up to Agent Braga's decision to fire his weapon at Schultz, including whether Agent Braga heard and registered the conflicting command of Agent Stowe to unlock the door and whether, in view of the conflicting command and all of the other facts and circumstances surrounding it, a reasonable officer in Agent Braga's position could have believed that Schultz was making a noncompliant, dangerous movement warranting the use of deadly force to protect himself and others from an immediate and deadly threat. There are, undoubtedly, a number of other factual scenarios that the jury might endorse under which Agent Braga might still be entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, but these are matters for the district court to revisit, where appropriate, on remand.").

Helsabeck v. Fabyanic, 173 F. App'x 251, 2006 WL 871003, at 3-5 (4th Cir. Mar. 30, 2006) (not published) ("Helsabeck argues that the district court erred in submitting the qualified immunity interrogatory to the jury. . . . Because Helsabeck failed to object to submission of the interrogatory to the jury at trial, we review for plain error. . . . In reviewing for plain error, the initial question is whether an error occurred. In Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 560 (4th Cir.2005), we held that the question of a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity under a particular set of facts must be decided by the court, not by the jury. The district court in the present case therefore committed error when it submitted the qualified immunity interrogatory to the jury. . . . Although it is clear that the district court committed error under Willingham, that case was not decided until more than one year after the jury delivered its verdict in favor of Fabyanic. The applicable law in this circuit was unsettled at the time of trial. . . . The third question is whether the error affected Helsabeck's substantial rights, that is, whether it was prejudicial. . . . In this case, there is no way to conclude that the error did not affect the outcome. The outcome here–the finding that Fabyanic was entitled to qualified immunity–can be attributed to nothing other than the error–submission of a specific interrogatory on qualified immunity to the jury. The error therefore affected Helsabeck's substantial rights. . . The final issue is whether the error seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings. We conclude that it does not, and we therefore decline to notice this error even if it was 'plain.'").

Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 559-60(4th Cir. 2005) ("We reject Willingham's contention that our prior decision–holding that Sergeant Crooke was not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity–finally disposed of the qualified immunity defense because the evidence presented at trial was essentially the same as the evidence forecasted in the summary judgment record. Because the prior appeal concerned Willingham's challenge to the grant of summary judgment to Sergeant Crooke, we were required to view the evidence in the light most favorable to her. . . And, in affirming the denial of summary judgment we decided only that the forecasted evidence, when viewed in the light most favorable to Willingham, established a violation of clearly established law. . . The jury, however, was not required to view the facts in the light most favorable to Willingham, and thus could reasonably have found in favor of Willingham with respect to some facts but not others. Because we did not decide what a reasonable officer would have known regarding the lawfulness of his actions under any other version of events, the qualified immunity defense remained viable after our decision. . . Although we reject Willingham's first contention, we agree with her second. The question of whether Sergeant Crooke was entitled to qualified immunity under the facts found by the jury–i.e., whether a reasonable officer would have known that his actions violated the law–should not have been submitted to the jury. . . . There is no question that when the historical facts are undisputed, whether a reasonable officer should have known of the illegality of his conduct is a question of law for the court. . . The existence of disputed material facts–which must be submitted to a jury, . . .does not alter the 'essentially legal' nature of the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established. . . Indeed, we indicated in Knussman v. Maryland, 272 F.3d 625, 634 (4th Cir.2001), that this legal question should not be submitted to the jury. There, the district court submitted to the jury both disputed factual issues and the ultimate question of whether the defendant was entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that he could reasonably have believed that his actions were lawful. Although the defendant did not challenge the submission of that question to the jury, we noted our disapproval of the practice . . . . The issue having now come before us, we hold that the legal question of a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity under a particular set of facts should be decided by the court, not by the jury. . . . As we explained in Knussman, juries are ill-suited to make the determinations of law required by the qualified immunity analysis. . . Therefore, to the extent that a dispute of material fact precludes a conclusive ruling on qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, the district court should submit factual questions to the jury and reserve for itself the legal question of whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the facts found by the jury.").

Knussman v. Maryland, 272 F.3d 625, 634 (4th Cir. 2001) (Knussman IV)("Before turning to our analysis of whether Mullineaux is entitled to qualified immunity, we pause to note that, although the jury may be suited for making factual findings relevant to the question of qualified immunity, we believe it is far better for the court, not the jury, to answer the ultimate legal question of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . The nature of the analysis–requiring an examination of current federal law and federal law as it existed at the time of the alleged violation–makes for an awkward determination by the jury, at best. But, since the issue has not been raised, we will leave for another day the question of whether it is ever appropriate for a jury to answer the ultimate legal question of a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity.").

Hoy v. Simpson, 182 F.3d 908 (Table), 1999 WL 427193, at *5, *6 (4th Cir. June 25, 1999) (per curiam) ("[A]ppellant contends . . . the question whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity is always a question of law and thus should never be submitted to the jury. . . Although we find nothing inherently confusing about two separate instructions that accurately convey that an alleged constitutional violation requires an inquiry into the defendant's subjective awareness while a defense to liability for that violation does not, appellant's related contention–that qualified immunity should never be left to the jury–is less easily dismissed. For the instructions given in this case would seem to allow the jury to find that an individual defendant was in fact deliberately indifferent to Brown's serious medical needs, but that he was immune from liability because a reasonable officer would not know that such indifference constituted a violation of federal law. Appellant's argument, and it is not without support, is that this latter conclusion would rest on a determination that it was not 'clearly established,' in the particularized sense that our caselaw requires, . . . that deliberate indifference to an intoxicated pre-trial detainee's medical need would violate that detainee's constitutional rights to due process. This determination, appellant contends, is for the court to make. . . We need not decide whether allowing the jury to make this determination was error, however, because the jury's clear verdict that the defendants were not deliberately indifferent precluded any consideration of the qualified immunity question, and thus any error in giving the instruction was harmless.").

Buonocore v. Harris, 65 F.3d 347, 359-60 (4th Cir. 1995) ("If a plaintiff has alleged a clearly established right, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is improper as long as there remains any material factual dispute regarding the actual conduct of the defendants.").

Rowland v. Perry, 41 F.3d 167, 173 (4th Cir. 1994) ("Though it focuses on the objective facts, the immunity inquiry must be filtered through the lens of the officer's perceptions at the time of the incident in question. Such a perspective serves two purposes. First, using the officer's perception of the facts at the time limits second-guessing the reasonableness of actions with the benefit of 20/20 hindsight. Second, using this perspective limits the need for decision-makers to sort through conflicting versions of the 'actual' facts, and allows them to focus instead on what the police officer reasonably perceived. [citing Gooden] In sum, the officer's subjective state of mind is not relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry but his perceptions of the objective facts of the incident in question are.").

Taylor v. Farmer, 13 F.3d 117, 120-21 (4th Cir. 1993) (denying immunity and distinguishing facts from Gooden, where defendants' observations and eyewitness reports were contradictory, not corroborative, where exigent circumstances did not exist, where detectives did not exercise reasonable care in investigation, and where conduct guided by settled standards for search and seizure.)

Rainey v. Conerly, 973 F.2d 321, 324 (4th Cir. 1992) ("This case is distinguishable from this court's recent decision in Gooden. In Gooden, the en banc court addressed a similar situation in which the applicability of qualified immunity arguably depended on resolution of conflicting versions of the facts. The majority ultimately concluded that resolution of what actually happened was irrelevant to the qualified immunity claim, because the appropriate focus was on the perceptions of the officers.... Unlike Gooden where what actually happened did not need to be resolved by the trier of fact in order to reach a decision on the applicability of qualified immunity, in this case a determination of what actually happened is absolutely necessary to decide whether [defendant] could reasonably have believed that his actions were lawful. [Defendant] does not claim. . . that he operated under a mistaken, but reasonable, perception of the facts. Instead, the crux of the dispute revolves entirely around the level of force utilized by [defendant] in removing [plaintiff] from the vestibule....The determination of what actually happened depends exclusively on an assessment of the credibility of the respective witnesses. This assessment is a disputed issue of fact and, therefore, cannot be resolved on summary judgment or directed verdict.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 313 (4th Cir. 1992) ("[T]he narrow threshold question whether a right allegedly violated was clearly established at the appropriate level of inquiry and at the time of the challenged conduct is always a matter of law for the court, hence is always capable of decision at the summary judgment stage. Whether the conduct allegedly violative of the right actually occurred or, if so, whether a reasonable officer would have known that conduct would violate the right, however, may or may not be then subject to determination as a matter of law. If there are genuine issues of historical fact respecting the officer's conduct or its reasonableness under the circumstances, summary judgment is not appropriate, and the issue must to reserved for trial.").

Coates v. Daugherty, 973 F.2d 290, 293 (4th Cir. 1992) ("[T]he magistrate judge instructed the jury on the qualified immunity question. Neither party challenges the propriety of submitting this question to the jury nor the contents of the instruction; thus we do not consider these questions ....").

Gooden v. Howard County, Maryland, 954 F.2d 960, 965-66 (4th Cir. 1992) (en banc) (reasonableness of officers' response must be gauged against reasonableness of their perceptions; different accounts as to what occurred need not signify a difference of triable fact; in absence of a genuine dispute about reasonableness of officers' perceptions, issue of qualified immunity is ripe for summary judgment).

Compare Gooden, supra, 954 F.2d at 970-74 (Phillips, J., joined by Ervin, Murnaghan, Sprouse, and Butzner, JJ. dissenting) ("...the majority essentially... shifts the burden to the plaintiff as non-movant, either resolving conflicting inferences arising from conflicting versions of critical historical facts in favor of the defendants in an exercise of raw factfinding, or simply sweeping aside as immaterial the existence of flat conflict in the evidence as forecast on certain critical issues. With all respect, I think the majority, out of concern that summary judgment doctrine, regularly applied, might thwart the underlying purposes of qualified immunity doctrine, has simply declined here to apply those aspects unfavorable to the defendants with full and proper rigor.... The importance of this case...lies in the classic problem it poses of accommodating qualified immunity doctrine's preference for pre-trial establishment of the defense, with summary judgment's insistence that, desirable as this may be, it cannot be done if genuine issues of fact material to the defense exist.").

Rhodes v. Clemmons, No. 7:13-CV-192-RJ, 2016 WL 3766307, at *1-2 (E.D.N.C. July 11, 2016) ("The court, in its discretion, is unpersuaded that trifurcation of the issues in this matter would serve to expedite, economize, or avoid prejudice. It appears that if the issues are separated as urged by Defendants, some evidence related to liability and/or damages would necessarily need to be presented during other phases of the trial, resulting in overlapping evidence and potential confusion of the jurors. While the question of whether Defendants are entitled to immunity under the facts found by the jury is a question of law reserved for the court, Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 559 (4th Cir. 2005), such requirement in no way compels the need for bi– or trifurcation of the issues. . . Indeed, proceeding in the manner suggested by Defendants, with three trial phases, each consisting of separate issues and findings by the jury and/or the court, would seem in this instance to create a scenario ripe for confusion and resulting prejudice to either Defendants or Plaintiff, or both. Defendants have simply not satisfied their burden to show that separation of the issues will promote greater convenience and economy in this matter and will not result in undue prejudice to any party. The court therefore in its discretion denies Defendants' request. . . . Defendants seek to use special interrogatories to resolve factual issues bearing on Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. Plaintiff objects to the use of special interrogatories on the grounds that they are not required, their use would unnecessarily complicate and confuse the jury, and the jury's decision on liability would necessarily subsume their responses to the interrogatories. In any event, Plaintiff argues the interrogatories as proposed by Defendants misstate the law and are premature. Alternatively, Plaintiff seeks to reserve his ability to propose his own special interrogatories should the court allow them to be submitted to the jury. The court agrees that the motion to use special interrogatories is premature, as there may be additional factual disputes that arise or anticipated factual disputes that do not arise at trial. . . Accordingly, the court denies Defendants' motion without prejudice, and it will consider a request to use special interrogatories again at the appropriate time during the trial.

Thompson v. Farmer, 945 F. Supp. 109, 114-16 (W.D.N.C. 1996) ("Taken together Mitchell and Johnson establish a continuum along which the court makes qualified immunity decisions. On one end of the continuum is a case like Mitchell or Siegert where the plaintiff fails to allege conduct that violates a clearly established legal norm. The other end of the continuum is cases like Johnson where the plaintiff does allege conduct that violates a clearly established legal norm, but there is a factual dispute concerning whether the conduct alleged by the plaintiff actually occurred. In between the two extremes created by Mitchell and Johnson there is a related question that arises in cases where the law is clearly established (as in this case), the facts are undisputed (as Farmer's argument assumes), and the only issue that remains is whether the officer's belief that his actions comported with the law is objectively reasonable. Farmer's argument implicates this precise issue because he has argued that if the facts are as he alleges–he was leaning in the car and being dragged along-side the vehicle–then the question of whether his actions were objectively reasonable is a question of law for the Court. Put another way, Farmer argues that since the (assumed) facts and the law are established it is up to this Court to decide whether his belief that he had probable cause to believe that Thompson represented a significant threat of death or serious injury to himself was objectively reasonable. So this portion of Farmer's argument presents the following question: in cases where the law is clear and the facts are clear but the Court determines that reasonable persons could differ over whether a reasonable government official "should have known that his conduct was illegal" Pittman, 87 F.3d at 119, does the Court or the jury make the ultimate immunity determination? The answer is not entirely clear. . . . This Court is sympathetic to the view that the issue of whether Farmer's use of force was objectively reasonable under the circumstances because he had probable cause to believe that Thompson posed a significant threat of serious injury to himself is a question of fact for the jury. . . . If the objective reasonableness of Farmer's use of deadly force–the liability inquiry–is a question of fact, why shouldn't the question of an objectively reasonable (but reasonably mistaken) use of force–the immunity inquiry–be a question of fact? The case law in the Fourth Circuit is not entirely clear. . . . As noted earlier, this Court believes that there is much to recommend the notion that the objective reasonableness of an officer's actions is a question of law for the Court where reasonable persons could differ as to whether the officer's actions were reasonable under the circumstances. Perhaps the Court of Appeals will use Farmer's interlocutory appeal to put this Court at ease with respect to this issue if the law governing appellate jurisdiction allows such good works.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Kokesh v. Curlee, 14 F.4th 382, 391-98 (5th Cir. 2021) ("'Whether an official's conduct was objectively reasonable [in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of the disputed action] is a question of law for the court, not a matter of fact for the jury.' Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249, 253 (5th Cir. 2010). But, 'in certain circumstances where "there remain disputed issues of material fact relative to immunity, the jury, properly instructed, may decide the question."'. . .

Relying on Johnson v. Thibodaux City, 887 F.3d 726 (5th Cir. 2018), Kokesh argues that, as in Johnson, he was simply a passenger in a vehicle that was lawfully stopped but who himself was not suspected of criminal wrongdoing. Further, Kokesh contends that Curlee began to demand identification only when he noticed Kokesh recording him, which is a protected activity under the First Amendment. . . Even viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Kokesh, we disagree. The centerpiece of Kokesh's argument is the recent Johnson case. . . . In order for Kokesh to fall within the scope of Johnson, he must demonstrate that Curlee improperly continued and extended a traffic stop for the sole purpose of obtaining his identification, without developing 'reasonable suspicion, supported by articulable facts' during the justified portion of the stop or must have made the request because of 'the circumstances that justified the stop.'. . Putting aside the undisputed fact that this was not a traffic stop at all, but rather was initiated by the voluntary stop of the truck at the instruction of Kokesh, the evidence does not suggest that Curlee continued or extended his interaction with Kokesh and his supporters unnecessarily and unreasonably. Indeed, as set forth above, articulable facts exist (and are depicted on the bodycam video) to support reasonable suspicion that Kokesh participated in the defacement of public property in violation of LA. R.S. 14:56.4. To that end, Curlee questioned both Evans and Gizzarelli, who both indicated they acted on Kokesh's instructions as to stopping the truck on the elevated Pontchartrain Expressway, exiting the vehicle, and stenciling 'freedom' on the overpass wall. Because both Gizzarelli and Evans cited Kokesh's authority, as a presidential candidate and book author, for their acts, further inquiry was surely in order, and requesting a personal identification from Kokesh was not unreasonable. . . Moreover, the actions of Kokesh himself, under these circumstances, also generated reasonable suspicion: without prompting, Kokesh pulled out a card and began reading what would be his Miranda rights when Curlee approached. Also, without any request whatsoever to search, Kokesh announced forthrightly that he did not consent to a search of any kind. At that time, Curlee understood that Kokesh was the leader and director of the trio, that he refused to cooperate with the production of identification, and seemed to be under the impression he was being arrested though Curlee made not even an intimation of such intent. These are hardly the circumstances which would warrant a law enforcement officer to return to his LSP unit and drive off into the night. Kokesh's claim therefore fails on the first inquiry of qualified immunity: his constitutional and statutory rights were not violated by Curlee's request for identification or the arrest for failure to comply under LA. R.S. 14:108(B)(1)(c). Accordingly, we need not discuss the second prong, i.e., the clear establishment of such rights at the time of the violation such that the officer was on notice of the unlawfulness of his conduct. . . Kokesh's allegations that Curlee's actions were driven by seeing Kokesh video recording the encounter are frivolous. Indeed, Curlee was well aware that his conduct and verbiage was being recorded for posterity where all could view, examine, and second guess each and every second because he purposefully turned his bodycam on, and left it on for hours during the time he was with Kokesh. It therefore makes no sense that Curlee was angered, incensed, or motivated by resentment upon seeing Kokesh holding his recording cell phone. Moreover, Curlee not once instructed Kokesh to cease the video recording, nor did he try to obstruct Kokesh's camera lens. Curlee did not voice any objection to the video recording (no doubt because his bodycam was also recording), nor did he ask either Evans or Gizzarelli to prevail upon Kokesh to stop recording. Once Kokesh was arrested, Curlee did not destroy or delete the video recording, nor did he ask Kokesh's companions to do so. He did not even seek to stop the recording himself by grabbing the phone. In fact, Curlee offered Kokesh the option of either keeping his cell phone (which contained the existing recording and was even then recording or capable of continuing to record into the future), or putting it in possession of Evans and/or Gizzarelli for safekeeping. In front of Curlee, Kokesh gave the phone to Evans. These acts are hardly evidence of a state trooper angry over the video recording of his actions. Rather, they suggest the opposite. . . . Citizens have long-cherished constitutional rights which deserve our protection. Law enforcement officers have difficult but necessary jobs which deserve our cooperation and respect. Under the facts presented here, this appears to be a regular investigation of an extraordinary and hazardous situation created voluntarily by the plaintiff himself, and this officer's conduct appears to be in accord with reasonable expectations as the encounter unfolded. The Fourth Amendment and 42 U.S.C. § 1983 should not be employed as a daily quiz tendered by videotaping hopefuls seeking to metamorphosize law enforcement officers from investigators and protectors, into mere spectators, and then further converting them into federal defendants. Based upon the facts as alleged by Kokesh and represented on Trooper Curlee's bodycam, the denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity is REVERSED and the case is REMANDED to the district court for entry of summary judgment in favor of Trooper Curlee.") Kokesh v. Curlee, 14 F.4th 382, 398, 401-09 (5th Cir. 2021) (Willett, J., dissenting) ("This is a strange case, even by New Orleans' standards. . . Maybe the utter weirdness of it all—a midnight meeting between a police officer, a pressure washer, and a presidential candidate—explains the majority's grant of qualified immunity: What was an officer to do? Even so, the key facts are sharply disputed, even if their oddness is not. Accordingly, I believe the district court got it right: A jury of Trooper Curlee's peers should decide if he acted constitutionally—not us. . . . [U]nder our prior decisions, we lack jurisdiction to review genuineness—whether the district court correctly found a particular fact dispute genuine. . . We are precedentially hemmed in. Our analysis centers on one thing: whether the fact disputes identified by the district court are material. . . And a fact dispute is material anytime its resolution 'might affect the outcome of the lawsuit.'. . That bears repeating: if it might affect the outcome. Moreover, inferences must be drawn in Kokesh's favor, not Trooper Curlee's. . . The only facts that matter are those that Trooper Curlee knew at or before the time that he arrested Kokesh. Those he learned later are immaterial. . . And we must be careful with facts in another regard. We cannot define this case's factual 'context' by construing genuinely disputed facts in Trooper Curlee's favor. . . Again, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Kokesh. . .Respectfully, the majority opinion rightly states these principles but wrongly applies them. The district court properly found genuine disputes of material fact as to whether Trooper Curlee violated Kokesh's First and Fourth Amendment rights. And because applicable law was clearly established at the time of Kokesh's arrest, the district court properly denied summary judgment. . . . Arresting someone under a stop-and-identify law is constitutionally dubious. That's because the Supreme Court held in Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada that it offends the Constitution to arrest someone under these laws merely for failing to identify himself. . . Two things must be true before an officer may constitutionally make an arrest under a stop-and-identify law: (1) the initial stop must have been lawful (that is, with at least reasonable suspicion); and (2) the 'request for identification' must be 'reasonably related to the circumstances justifying' it. . . The district court found a genuine fact dispute under each prong. . . . As for Hiibel's first prong, the district court found a fact issue regarding 'whether Curlee had reasonable suspicion supported by articulable facts that Kokesh had engaged in criminal activity or was about to do so.' The entire case boils down to this issue. Trooper Curlee must have lawfully seized Kokesh before he could constitutionally demand identification papers. . . . Simply put, holding that an officer can form a reasonable suspicion because a person anticipatorily invoked his constitutional rights . . .creates a 'Catch-22'. . . of constitutional proportions. Police are free to approach individuals and ask questions, ask for identification, or even ask to conduct a search. They may do it with no suspicion at all. . . What keeps these pre-reasonable-suspicion requests constitutional? Police cannot require compliance. . . Individuals are free to 'decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'. . But under the majority's view, there's a catch. As of today, if a vehicle passenger invokes his right not to comply with an officer's pre-reasonable-suspicion requests, then that gives the officer what he lacks: reasonable suspicion. Add in a stop-and-identify statute like Louisiana's, and an officer now has a constitutional basis to demand identification on pain of arrest. The passenger can avoid arrest only by complying with the officer's request for identification, which, of course, is the very kind of forced compliance that the Fourth Amendment guards against. That cannot be reasonable under the Constitution. . . . Putting everything together, only one question remains: Was Kokesh's right to refuse to identify himself clearly established when Trooper Curlee arrested him? It was. As we have previously noted, a right is clearly established when its contours are sufficiently clear to the point that a reasonable official would understand that his conduct violates it. . . And as we explained less than a year ago, that means Kokesh need only 'identify a case ... in which an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Constitution.' . .That case is Johnson v. Thibodaux City. . . .The majority opinion erroneously discounts Johnson's applicability. . . First, it attempts to distinguish the case by again attacking genuineness. The majority says that Johnson is inapt since, '[u]nlike Kokesh, Johnson was merely a passenger in the truck, said not a word to the officer, and took no action whatsoever prior to the request for identification.'. . Further, 'the truck's occupants in Johnson were not violating any laws or traffic regulations" prior to the stop. . . These are all immaterial distinctions. The touchstone is similar. Not identical. . . Johnson did not turn on how the officer wound up behind a stopped truck. It turned entirely on the officer lacking reasonable suspicion for the passenger—precisely the fact that the district court here found to be genuinely disputed. . . . The majority acknowledges that probable cause goes right to the heart of a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . But it wires around materiality by doing precisely what it lacks jurisdiction to do: rejecting that this dispute is genuine—in fact, branding it 'frivolous.'. . It spends pages building up an inference that Trooper Curlee could not possibly have had a retaliatory motive. He had already switched on his bodycam. . . He did not attempt to stop Kokesh from recording him. . . Plus, Trooper Curlee's insistence on seeing an 'official means of identification' from Kokesh was reasonable since only people 'with something to hide' would refuse to identify themselves. . . Perhaps a jury would agree. Perhaps not. And that's the point. Again, we must draw inferences in Kokesh's favor, not Trooper Curlee's. And here, a jury could infer that 'retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the arrest.'. . That's because the first time Curlee saw Kokesh recording a video, he asked Gizzarelli if the men were trying to get attention. Then, as Curlee was demanding to see Kokesh's identification papers, Curlee stated: 'Is this what y'all do? Videotape the police?' And Curlee later told Kokesh: 'I don't come out here to play games, bro. Oh, serious games like the one you were playing? You don't know what I do, bro. I do this for a living. I can't hear you. You don't need to talk no more, bro.' A jury could find a retaliatory motive on these facts. . . . Turning to qualified immunity's second inquiry—whether a constitutional right was clearly established—we did more in Turner than simply declare that the right to record police exists. We also cemented that it was clearly established from then on. . . As Turner was decided in 2017 and Kokesh was arrested in 2019, . . . that made Kokesh's rights clearly established at the time Trooper Curlee arrested him. Since that's the case, and because there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether Trooper Curlee violated this right, the conclusion is apparent: Trooper Curlee is not entitled to summary judgment on this claim. . . The Big Easy does not hide crazy, the saying goes; it parades it down the street. This is a peculiar case, no question. But just because facts are passing strange does not mean government's response to those facts passes muster. Trooper Curlee was not limited to 'wish[ing] the three gentlemen a nice evening ... and driv[ing] away into the dark night.'. . He had a safer, simpler option: ordering Kokesh and crew to beat it. . . Instead, Trooper Curlee conducted a criminal investigation that arguably violated Kokesh's constitutional rights. The district court got this case right. Genuine disputes of material fact surround Kokesh's Fourth and First Amendment claims. As odd as this case is, I cannot conclude that Trooper Curlee acted constitutionally. Nor can I conclude the opposite. All I can conclude is that a jury should decide.")

Oliver v. Arnold, 3 F.4th 152, 162-63 (5th Cir. 2021), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 19 F.4th 843 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Our dissenting colleague argues that Arnold simply gave an unconventional teaching assignment that no clearly established law prohibits. . . He further posits that, in holding that Arnold's conduct, if proven, would violate clearly established rights, we open the door for students to sue over any classwork they deem offensive. . . But the dissent fails to heed the limits on our jurisdiction in this context and to consider the facts in the light most favorable to Oliver. In this appeal, the 'impure motive' we must assume Arnold had for giving the Pledge assignment is not simply 'foster[ing] respect for the Pledge' as the dissent contends. . . Instead, because the district court found that Arnold's motives are genuinely disputed, we must presume here that Arnold was requiring his students to make precisely the sort of written oath of allegiance that the dissent acknowledges would be impermissible. . . We are not permitted to look beyond the district court's findings of disputed facts to conclude that, based on the evidence in the record, Arnold was instead merely employing a 'curious teaching method.'. .The dissent also places much weight on the fact that what is at issue here is a 'written assignment.'. . But the Court in Barnette stated, 'If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.'. . It is immaterial that, under the facts we must accept here, the required pledge was a written oath rather than an oral one and that the consequence for non-compliance was an academic penalty rather than an overt disciplinary action. Barnette clearly states that teachers and other school officials may not require students to swear allegiance, and with the case in this posture, we must assume that this is what Arnold did. Thus, there is no danger that our decision will pave the way for students to file lawsuits over their being required to study Dr. Seuss or any of the other figures featured in the scenarios the dissent imagines. . . Unless a teacher is requiring students to swear their fealty and devotion to Dr. Seuss and his teachings, the assignments the dissent envisions are clearly not implicated by the present case.")

Oliver v. Arnold, 3 F.4th 152, 164-65 (5th Cir. 2021) (Duncan, J., dissenting), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, No. 20-20215, 2021 WL 5917124 (5th Cir. Dec. 15, 2021) ("Qualified immunity yields only where an official violates 'clearly established law,' meaning binding authority 'that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . But Barnette does not provide the 'particularity' to settle Oliver's First Amendment claims. In Barnette, the Pledge figured in a distinct context: students were made to join in a 'ceremony' where they stood and 'salut[ed]' the American flag while reciting the Pledge. . . By contrast, the Pledge assignment here involves nothing like Barnette's coerced ceremonial recitation. Rather, the undisputed record shows students would 'transcribe' the Pledge's words as part of a timed in-class exercise. This is a curious teaching method, but no case cited to us addresses whether it violates the First Amendment. The majority mentions our Barnette-related decision in Brinsdon, . . . but that case addressed a mock exercise where students had to 'mimic the pledge ceremony that Mexican citizens follow' by reciting the Mexican Pledge of Allegiance and singing the Mexican National Anthem. . . Like Barnette, Brinsdon involved a coerced pledge recitation, not an assignment where students write a pledge's words. The majority concludes we lack jurisdiction to decide this issue because of disputes about Arnold's motives for giving the assignment. . . Like the district court, it relies on an in-class monologue Arnold gave the day after the assignment—a stream-of-consciousness rant ranging from the Pledge to communism, the Pope, the Cuban Missile Crisis, sex offender laws, and the Day of the Dead (the Mexican holiday, not the zombie movie). . . This appeal being interlocutory, I assume a jury could therefore infer that Arnold gave the assignment hoping to inculcate respect for the Pledge. . . But nothing prevents us from deciding whether that dispute is material to qualified immunity. . . I fail to see how it is. Let's assume Arnold had an impure motive for giving the Pledge assignment. What decision clearly establishes that, because of that motive, he violated the First Amendment? Indeed, what decision says that asking students to write down words as part of a class exercise constitutes 'compelled speech' in the first place? . . . To be sure, one can conjure up a scenario where a teacher makes students 'swear allegiance' to the flag through a written oath. But no one pretends that is the situation here. . . Even if Arnold hoped to foster respect for the Pledge, that does not make him a latter-day Henry VIII. Finally, consider the implications of the majority's approach. It sends to trial a § 1983 claim based on a student's objection to a written assignment, merely because there is a question about the teacher's motive for giving it. One can imagine where this approach, if taken in a precedential opinion, might lead. It is not a happy place.")

See also Oliver v. Arnold, 19 F.4th 843, 852-54 (5th Cir. 2021) (Ho, J., concurring in denial of rehearing en banc) ("I have previously criticized the doctrine of qualified immunity as contrary to the text and original understanding of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . That's because I see no textualist or originalist basis for requiring § 1983 plaintiffs to demonstrate not only a constitutional violation, but a 'clearly established' one. . . . Contrast the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, in which Congress expressly codified a 'clearly established' requirement into law. . . But to make matters worse, we often get things precisely backwards when we dutifully apply the doctrine of qualified immunity. '[W]e grant immunity when we should deny—and we deny immunity when we should grant.'. .We 'find constitutional violations [clearly established] where they do not [even] exist'—and ignore them when they are patent. . . To take an example familiar to our en banc court, imagine we denied qualified immunity to a police officer for making a split-second, life-or-death decision to protect innocent citizens against violent criminals—but granted qualified immunity to a public school teacher who deliberately punished a student for exercising her freedom of conscience on one of the most sensitive issues dividing our Nation. To my mind, that would turn the law upside down. But see Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (denying qualified immunity to police officer engaged in good-faith, split-second decision to fire at potential mass shooter); Winzer v. Kaufman Cnty., 940 F.3d 900 (5th Cir. 2019) (denying en banc rehearing after panel denied qualified immunity under similar circumstances). After all, consider this: One of the primary reasons for qualified immunity is that we do not want to chill government officials from the 'unflinching discharge of their duties.'. . But '[w]hen it comes to the First Amendment, ... we are concerned about government chilling the citizen—not the other way around.'. . .I'll end where I began—with the sad fact that the culture wars are no longer fought only by elected politicians who volunteer for battle, but are increasingly forced upon private citizens in schools and communities across America. But the reason for this reveals an even sadder truth—that we increasingly live in a country that does not value freedom. Our Nation's commitment to free speech is based on our 'firm belief in the robust and fearless exchange of ideas as the best mechanism for uncovering the truth.'. . . But free speech and debate are increasingly devalued in the search for truth—to the contrary, they are openly disparaged as harmful to progress. In some quarters, free speech is nothing more than a tool of patriarchy and white supremacy. . . . Worst of all, these views have begun to affect (some might say infect) our Nation's institutions of learning. And that may be the most tragic development of all. For it is in our classrooms where we are supposed to teach the next generation what it means to be free. Schools should be training students, not sock puppets. . . But a new regime has started to sink in—one in which 'education is not about teaching people how to think, it's about reeducating them in what to think.... [T]he need to feel safe trumps the need to speak truthfully.'. . Our society and our schools once embraced the quintessentially American maxim: 'I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.' But our culture and our teachers are increasingly sending citizens and students the opposite message: I disapprove of what you say, and I will use every means at my disposal to stop you from saying it. Americans are a diverse and passionate bunch. That is a feature of our country, not a bug. But if we can't debate (or even tolerate) one another—if this is where our national culture is going—then we are headed for an ideological arms race, one in which each side in any major debate will escalate every grievance and deploy every tool at their disposal to suppress their opponents. And I fear that, as our Founders predicted, we will all be worse off as a result. . . . .It is for all these reasons that I highlight our court's decision today. A decision that affirms our Nation's founding commitment to freedom of speech. A decision that enforces the First Amendment where it is increasingly needed—in public school classrooms nationwide. A decision to deny qualified immunity and hold public officials accountable where the constitutional violation is not only obvious, but trending. I concur in the denial of rehearing en banc.")

Oliver v. Arnold, 19 F.4th 843, 854-58 (5th Cir. 2021) (Elrod, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Duncan, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of en banc rehearing) ("Can a teacher in the Fifth Circuit be held liable for money damages for giving an in-class writing assignment? Until now, no. The district court, the panel majority, and the concurring opinion do not identify a single case where this has happened before—not in the Fifth Circuit, not anywhere else. Yet somehow each finds a way to deny Arnold qualified immunity. Federal judges should not be in the business of policing the lesson plans of public-school teachers. But even when we must, qualified immunity should protect a teacher who (until now) could not have known that his conduct violated a student's constitutional rights. Thus, I respectfully dissent. . . . Importantly and problematically, the panel majority rested its conclusion on the district court's finding a factual dispute about Arnold's 'impure motive' in giving this assignment. . . But for qualified-immunity purposes, 'a particular defendant's subjective state of mind has no bearing on whether that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 457 (5th Cir. 2001). Granted, under some circumstances we do consider subjective intent, like with race discrimination or First Amendment retaliation claims. Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc). But as those examples indicate, we do so when an official's subjective state of mind is an element of the claim—for race discrimination, motive is key; for First Amendment retaliation, adverse action must be because of the plaintiff's protected speech. But in determining whether speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, motive is irrelevant. To establish that her speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, Oliver does not have to show that Arnold intended to make her pledge loyalty to America. . . The focus of our inquiry is not the teacher's motive, but the student's compelled act. . . Otherwise, the vindication of a student's constitutional rights hinges on a teacher's earnestness rather than the objective reasonableness of the teacher's actions. True, this approach provides Oliver a short-term win: She may proceed to trial on her claims. But in the long-run, students lose. Because a student must now prove her educator's 'impure motive,' a student is much less likely to prevail at the end of the day. . . Our sister circuits have wisely steered clear of this improper-motive path. In the Fourth Circuit, a teacher can require a student to write out the Five Pillars of Islam so long as the student is not required to 'profess or accept the tenets of Islam.' Wood v. Arnold, 915 F.3d 308, 319 (4th Cir.

2019). In the Third Circuit, a teacher may force a student to 'speak or write on a particular topic even though the student may prefer a different topic,' provided that the teacher does not 'demand that a student profess beliefs or views with which the student does not agree.' C.N. v. Ridgewood Bd. of Ed., 430 F.3d 159, 187 (3d Cir. 2005). And in the Ninth Circuit, a teacher can make a student 'write a paper from a particular viewpoint, even if it is a view-point with which the student disagrees, so long as the requirement serves a legitimate pedagogical purpose.' Brown v. Li, 308 F.3d 939, 953 (9th Cir. 2002). . . . In the meantime, teachers in the Fifth Circuit are left in the lurch. How are they to know whether their lesson plans conflict with 'fixed star[s]' in our 'constitutional constellation'? Read at the interstellar level of generality, qualified immunity provides no safe harbor. I respectfully dissent from the denial of en banc rehearing.")

Oliver v. Arnold, 19 F.4th 843, 858-59, 863 (5th Cir. 2021) (Duncan, J., joined by Jones (except part III), Smith, Elrod, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from denial of en banc rehearing) ("In our circuit, public school teachers can make students pledge allegiance to Mexico but can't make students write down our own pledge. The first assignment is a 'cultural and educational exercise,' Brinsdon v. McAllen Indep. Sch. Dist., 863 F.3d 338, 349 (5th Cir. 2017), but the second is a compelled patriotic statement forbidden by the First Amendment. Oliver v. Arnold, 3 F.4th 152, 159–60 (5th Cir. 2021). A teacher who gives the first assignment merits qualified immunity, but a teacher who gives the second will have to convince a jury he had a 'pedagogical purpose.'. . I assume the reverse is also true. So, a teacher can make students pledge allegiance to the American Flag as a 'cultural and educational exercise' but can't make students write down the Mexican pledge if he wants to promote el Patriotismo. Our law in this area is, in other words, a dumpster fire. We should have taken this case en banc to put it out. Then we could have addressed in a more coherent way how the First Amendment applies to student speech and public school curricula, an important and developing field. . . For reasons that baffle me, a majority of my colleagues declines the opportunity. . . . Here, the panel accepts an unprecedented application of Barnette that warps the compelled speech doctrine, splits with another circuit, and sets up federal judges and juries as arbiters of whether teachers should pay damages for giving 'non-pedagogical' assignments. A majority of the court unwisely declines to stop this misbegotten experiment in its tracks. I respectfully dissent from denial of en banc rehearing.")

Priest v. Grazier, 860 F. App'x 343, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) ("As regrettable as Priest's injuries are, Grazier and Fenwick are entitled to qualified immunity. In a series of non-precedential but analogous cases, we have held that qualified immunity protects officers who force noncompliant suspects to the ground for handcuffing. . . Here, the dash cam video substantiates Grazier's and Fenwick's testimony that Priest did not comply with their repeated instructions to roll down his window, open his door, and get out of his car. In the face of this non-compliance, Grazier and Fenwick did not violate clearly established law by forcing Priest to the ground to handcuff him. . . . In the absence of competent summary judgment evidence to the contrary, there is no genuine dispute that a reasonable officer could have perceived Priest as resisting at the moment Fenwick struck him three times. And if Priest was resisting, Fenwick's hand strikes did not violate clearly established law. . . It follows that the district court properly granted Fenwick qualified immunity for striking Priest in the back. . . Finally, Priest contends that Grazier used excessive force by kneeing him in the back after he was handcuffed. Priest asserts that even though he was cuffed and bleeding profusely, Grazier nonetheless rolled him onto his side and kneed him in the back. But the record clearly, and without any genuine dispute of fact, belies Priest's version of events. Grazier testified that Priest rolled to his side on his own after Grazier tried sitting Priest up. The dash cam video in fact shows Priest leaning away from Grazier and falling to the right. Grazier also testified that Priest continued to resist arrest even after being handcuffed. Again, the dash cam video shows a handcuffed Priest yelling and kicking his legs. A reasonable officer could have perceived this behavior as resisting arrest. . . Priest counters that when Grazier kneed him, he was already in handcuffs, on the ground, and blocked in by the car door, Grazier and Fenwick. Priest asserts that, in this position, he did not pose a serious risk of resistance or flight. But as explained above, Priest's contention is based on hindsight logic, not on evidence competent to create a genuine fact dispute. The actual evidence—the dash cam video and Grazier's corresponding testimony—shows Priest behaving in ways a reasonable officer could perceive as resistance. The district court therefore properly granted Grazier summary judgment as to this claim.")

Tucker v. City of Shreveport, 998 F.3d 165, 172-73 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 419 (2021) ('Whether an official's conduct was objectively reasonable [in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of the disputed action] is a question of law for the court, not a matter of fact for the jury.'. . But, 'in certain circumstances where "there remain disputed issues of material fact relative to immunity, the jury, properly instructed, may decide the question."'. . 'A qualified immunity defense alters the usual summary judgment burden of proof.'. . Although nominally an affirmative defense, the plaintiff has the burden to negate the defense once it is properly raised. . . The plaintiff has the burden to point out clearly established law. . . The plaintiff also bears the burden of 'raising a fact issue as to its violation.'. . Thus, once the defense is invoked, '[t]he plaintiff must rebut the defense by establishing that the official's allegedly wrongful conduct violated clearly established law and that genuine issues of material fact exist regarding the reasonableness of the official's conduct' according to that law. . .At the summary judgment stage, however, all inferences are still drawn in the plaintiff's favor. . . This is true 'even when ... a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the [qualified immunity] standard.'. . Likewise, 'under either [qualified immunity] prong, courts may not resolve genuine disputes of fact in favor of the party seeking summary judgment.'. . 'Accordingly, courts must take care not to define a case's "context" in a manner that imports genuinely disputed factual propositions.'")

Tucker v. City of Shreveport, 998 F.3d 165, 175-81, 185 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 419 (2021) ("As previously stated, we agree with the district court that 'two distinct moments of force must be separately analyzed: [(1)] [Officers] McIntire and Cisco taking Tucker to the ground, and [(2)] Defendant Officers punching and kicking him as he lay on the ground.' With each, the district court concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Defendant Officers acted unreasonably such that Tucker's Fourth Amendment rights were violated and, moreover, that Defendant Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. Putting aside the question of whether Defendant Officers acted unreasonably for purposes of establishing a Fourth Amendment violation, we disagree with the district court's determinations relative to qualified immunity. . . .After watching the video footage of McIntire's sudden takedown of Tucker and the struggle that followed on the ground, it is easy for us—having the benefit of hindsight and multiple angles of video to scrutinize, frame by frame—to question whether Tucker might have been handcuffed without scuffle or injury if McIntire had immediately verbally consulted with Cisco upon arrival, told Tucker that he was under arrest, and/or repeated Cisco's 'put your hands behind your back' instruction to Tucker before forcefully pulling him to the ground. . . Importantly, however, the legal reasonableness of a police officer's use of force—for purposes of the Fourth Amendment and qualified immunity—is not evaluated with the benefit of hindsight. Rather, our focus is on the officers' reasonable perception of the events at issue, as they happened, without the aid of hindsight, multiple viewing angles, slow motion, or the ability to pause, rewind, and zoom. Considering the record in this manner, we find the district court erred in concluding that the conduct of Officers McIntire and Cisco—in taking Tucker to the ground—was objectively unreasonable in light of pertinent clearly established law in November 2016. For the most part, the cases cited by the district court and Tucker, including some not decided until after the November 2016 incident here—simply acknowledge uncontroversial general principles. . . Moreover, none of these pronouncements 'squarely govern' the particular facts at issue here such that, in November 2016, no reasonable officer would have thought that the Defendant Officers' takedown of Tucker was legally permissible. . . .Faced with this scenario, viewed in its entirety, an officer in McIntire's position, having just arrived on the scene, could reasonably question whether Tucker might attempt to break away, fight being handcuffed, or even attempt to grab one of the officer's weapons. At a minimum, he could reasonably question whether Cisco had sufficient control over the scene or instead required immediate officer assistance. And, while consultation amongst the officers and Tucker might have quelled such concerns, hesitation for that purpose, absent an ability to predict the future with certainty, likewise could well have operated to the officers' detriment. This is evident, notwithstanding the district court's inference that a reasonable officer, in Defendant Officers' position, would have believed that Tucker was unarmed after Cisco removed the pocketknife from Tucker's pocket. . . . Given these uncertainties, and Tucker's superior height, particularly relative to McIntire, who apparently precipitated the officers' efforts to get Tucker to the ground, . . . we are convinced that the district court erred in its qualified immunity assessment of the 'takedown' aspect of Tucker's claim. . . Specifically, we are not convinced that applicable jurisprudence provided fair warning to Cisco and McIntire, as of November 30, 2016, that pulling Tucker to the ground under the circumstances and in the manner that occurred here would necessarily violate his Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure. . . Rather, even construed in Tucker's favor for summary judgment purposes, the foregoing facts and circumstances, when viewed in their entirety, created a scenario sufficiently 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' to place the officers' takedown of Tucker, even if mistaken, within the protected 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' established by then-existing Fourth Amendment excessive force jurisprudence. Consequently, it is immaterial whether, as the dissent urges, the video footage 'does not blatantly contradict' Tucker's assertion that, immediately prior to the takedown, he was putting his hands behind his back in compliance with Cisco's orders and did not pull away prior to being taken to the ground. Accordingly, we find the district court erred in not granting summary judgment in favor of Defendant Officers, on grounds of qualified immunity, relative to the takedown. . . . In hindsight, knowing as we do that Tucker was unarmed, was not in possession of drugs or other contraband, and was pulled over for a non-violent traffic offense, it is regrettable that Tucker suffered any injury or indignity at the hands of law enforcement officers, no matter how slight or temporary. And, of course, one might logically wonder if injury could have been avoided, or at least lessened, if one of the five persons involved had reacted differently. In one respect, the answer certainly is 'yes'; that is, Tucker could have obeyed and pulled over when Cisco signaled; or he could have quieted, stilled, and put his hands behind his back when ultimately stopped. Otherwise, in these scenarios, unlike in boxing, there unfortunately is no referee to ring a bell requiring everyone to 'return to their corners' for time out to rest, re-evaluate, and reconsider strategies. Even so, one might argue that, at some point in the maelstrom, considering that Tucker was on the ground and surrounded by three, and then with Kolb's arrival, four officers, including one of substantially superior height and brawn (Kolb), one of the officers could, or should, have called for a pause—that is, for the officers to cease any efforts to physically restrain Tucker—in order to give Tucker an opportunity, void of confusion and in a moment of calm, to make the logical decision to simply cooperate in Cisco's efforts to handcuff him, despite believing handcuffs to be unwarranted. We need not and do not decide that question today, especially on the instant record, reflecting that the entirety of the struggle lasted less than one minute. And, importantly, for its duration, the situation was replete with rapid movement, confusion, and the (apparently ignored) repeated directives, both by Defendant Officers and Tucker's onlooking girlfriend, for Tucker to: 'Put your hands behind your back! Stop moving! Stop resisting! Quit moving! Quit resisting!' In any event, clearly established law, as of November 30, 2016, certainly did not impose such a requirement. Nor, on the instant facts, viewed from the perspective of the officers, as the events occurred, not from hindsight, is this situation one in which it should have been obvious to Defendant Officers, even in the absence of pre-existing, factually similar case law, that the force being utilized was excessive.") Tucker v. City of Shreveport, 998 F.3d 165, 185-87 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 419 (2021) (Higginson, J., dissenting) ("The district court, in an extensively detailed order, determined that issues of fact precluded summary judgment based on qualified immunity for the Defendant Officers. I agree with the district court that fact issues remain as to whether Tucker, a motorist whose brake light was out, actively resisted arrest to justify a sudden, violent takedown and repeated physical blows and open kicks while prone and unarmed and surrounded by officers. . . I would affirm the district court. Video footage of the incident confirms the violent takedown and Defendant Officers' use of repeated strikes and kicks against Tucker while he was on the ground. Tucker asserts that, immediately prior to the takedown, he was putting his hands behind his back in compliance with Officer Cisco's order and did not pull away from Officers Cisco and McIntire prior to being taken to the ground. The footage does not 'blatantly contradict' his account. . . The law is clearly established that the use of violent physical force against—not to mention the extreme violence of kicking—an arrestee who is not actively resisting arrest is a constitutional violation. . . . It may be that the Defendant Officers will nonetheless prove entitled to qualified immunity for the extreme force they used against Tucker from start to finish. But, as the district court found, a jury must first resolve the factual uncertainty as to whether Defendant Officers had justification and urgency to throw Tucker down and repeatedly strike and kick him. . . . I regret not having persuaded the majority. I hope, however, our disagreement highlights the importance of recent attention given to the issue of qualified immunity and violent police-citizen encounters. See Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc); id. at 470 (Willett, J., dissenting); id. at 473 (Ho & Oldham, JJ., dissenting); see also Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F. Supp. 3d 386, 423 (S.D. Miss. 2020) (exhortation to revisit doctrine of qualified immunity). From my perspective, it is not our role to second guess a district court's assessment of factual disputes, here pretermitting resolution of uncertainties about excessive force, specifically why police inflicted such abrupt and steadily escalating violence against this motorist whose brake light was out. When there is no dispute about the reasonableness of the use of force, for example when an arrestee flees or is an aggressor, the doctrine of qualified immunity will shield defendant officers. But here, I agree with the district court that qualified immunity is not yet an available tool to resolve this fact-laden, extended, and brutal police-citizen encounter. . . Instead, careful resolution properly comes, and constitutionally must come, from citizen peer jurors. Their fair assessment is vital as much for fellow citizens like Tucker and public trust, as it is for the police who respond to situational threats with professional restraint and seek to be distinguished from the few who do not, whose misconduct is maliciously unrestrained. One acting under color of law who throws a fellow citizen to the ground and then, when the other is prone, surrounded, and unarmed, repeatedly strikes and kicks him, surely gives rise to a material question of fact as to whether that government force is excessive.")

City of Shreveport, Louisiana, No. 21-569, 2021 WL 5763085, at *1 (U.S. Dec. 6, 2021) (Statement of Justice Sotomayor, respecting the denial of certiorari) ("While this case does not meet our traditional criteria for certiorari, I write to note that the Fifth Circuit's reversal of the District Court's detailed order denying qualified immunity appears highly questionable for the reasons set forth by Judge Higginson's thorough dissenting opinion.")

Renfroe v. Parker, 974 F.3d 594, 599-600 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The district court cannot be said to have resolved conflicting facts in favor of Deputy Parker . . . because Mrs. Renfroe did not offer any competent evidence of her own alleged facts. Despite being present, Mrs. Renfroe did not submit an affidavit describing what she saw as the shooting unfolded. And the allegations in her complaint are insufficient. . . . The evidence properly before the district court shows that Deputy Parker was responding to a call from dispatch reporting that a truck similar to the Renfroes' was present during an attempted burglary. Mr. Renfroe ran toward Deputy Parker, unaffected by the deputy's use of a taser. According to the unrebutted testimony of Deputy Parker, Mr. Renfroe began assaulting him as soon as he disappeared from the dash camera. And that unrebutted testimony is supported by video, which shows the body of the police vehicle jostling and shaking. Mrs. Renfroe emphasizes that Mr. Renfroe was not armed at the time of the shooting and that Deputy Parker did not warn him before using lethal force. But this court has previously found that an individual need not be armed for a law enforcement officer to believe that he is in danger of serious physical harm. See, e.g., Colston v. Barnhart, 130 F.3d 96, 99–100 (5th Cir. 1997). And as this court recognized in Colston, an officer's duty to warn a suspect before using deadly force depends on whether that officer has time to do so. . . The video footage reflects that, given Mr. Renfroe's swift approach, it was not feasible for Deputy Parker to issue a warning.")

Bryant v. Gillem, 965 F.3d 387, 392-93 (5th Cir. 2020) ("There is no evidence that Gillem intended to shoot Bryant, and indeed, there is overwhelming evidence that he did not. Bryant argues otherwise, but we reject the argument based on this record. What needs further attention, though, is the effect of the evidence about Gillem's failure to holster his firearm as he was attempting to handcuff Bryant. Bryant contends that if Gillem acted unreasonably prior to the accidental shooting by intentionally failing to holster his weapon, that intentional act can be the basis for liability under Section 1983. A nonprecedential opinion of this court dealt with that factual situation, stating that even if an officer's shooting of a suspect is accidental, there may be a constitutional violation if the officer 'acted objectively unreasonably by deciding to make an arrest, by drawing his pistol, or by not holstering it before attempting to handcuff' the suspect. Watson v. Bryant, 532 F. App'x 453, 457–58 (5th Cir. 2013). In that opinion, the court was addressing a situation in which the officer intentionally kept his weapon in one hand while handcuffing with the other despite his training not to do so, because of concerns the suspect had his own weapon. . . No such concerns are involved here. The district court here found no 'competent summary judgment evidence reasonably showing that Gillem's failure to holster his firearm and his discharge of the firearm were intentional acts.' We look to the validity of that finding. There is not much in the record directly relevant to Bryant's possible intent to keep his weapon drawn. We conclude the district court properly summarized what is in the record:
After Gillem shot Bryant, he immediately pointed the pistol away from him. Gillem subsequently holstered the pistol on the right side of his hip and requested assistance. ... At deposition, Gillem stated that he thought he had holstered his gun prior to attempting to secure Bryant, that he did not intend to pull the trigger of his firearm, and that he accidentally shot Bryant. Consistent with his deposition testimony, Gillem subsequently filed a declaration in which he declared that '[t]he discharge was purely an accident,' that '[he] did not intend to discharge [his] weapon at any time,' and that '[he] did not even realize [he] was holding the gun in [his] left hand as [he] kneeled down and accidentally discharged the gun.'
Taking this to be the entirety of the relevant evidence, as we must on summary judgment, . . . we conclude that there is no fact dispute that Gillem unintentionally kept his firearm in his hand as he sought to restrain Bryant. Any finding by jurors to the contrary would only be 'unsupported speculation.'. . Because Bryant has failed to show a violation of any Fourth Amendment rights, we need not consider the second qualified-immunity prong.")

Mason v. Faul, 929 F.3d 762, 764-66 (5th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 116 (2020) ("[A]lthough the parties might better have relied in their briefs on Supreme Court precedent from the ensuing three decades following Young, the trial court's reliance on that case as a general matter was not misplaced. Contrary to the views expressed by Judge Higginbotham's dissent in Mason I . . . and adopted here by Appellants, Young's holding expresses the law regarding qualified immunity just as accurately for this case, involving both the officer's release of a trained canine and a shooting, as it did for a police encounter involving the shooting alone. It was for the jury to determine, as Judge Higginbotham's dissent acknowledged, . . . whether Mason's actions at any point could have led a reasonable officer to believe that Mason was posing a serious threat to others. Qualified immunity is justified unless no reasonable officer could have acted as Officer Faul did here, or every reasonable officer faced with the same facts would not have shot at Mason. . . . Appellants contend that the trial court erred by submitting to the jury two jury interrogatories, one on unconstitutional excessive force and one on qualified immunity. They contend that this alleged error, fortified by the court's misplaced reliance on Young, led to an inconsistent jury verdict on the issues. There is no error. The court's charges on the constitutional issue and qualified immunity separated the two questions and were precisely and almost verbatim stated according to the Fifth Circuit Pattern Jury Instructions (Civil) 10.1 and 10.3. The pattern instructions, in turn, represent an admirable summary, based on Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit precedent, of the elements of a plaintiff's claim that must be proven at trial. We find no error in the court's use of the pattern charges. . . .Because the jury found that Officer Faul used 'objectively unreasonable' excessive force (Issue One) but was also entitled to qualified immunity (Issue Two), Appellants contend the verdict is fatally inconsistent. We disagree. That these two issues were framed according to governing law and the pattern jury instructions has already been pointed out. It is therefore inherently difficult to credit an argument of legal inconsistency, much less redundancy. To be sure, an officer's conduct must be objectively unreasonable to find a Fourth Amendment violation. . . And qualified immunity must be rejected where the facts found by the jury demonstrate not only a constitutional violation but also that the law was clearly established such that the officer's conduct was objectively unreasonable according to that law. . . It was not clearly established at the time of this shooting that an officer armed with a pistol and a trained canine could not release the canine on a suspect and nearly simultaneously begin to shoot to incapacitate Mason, unless no reasonable officer could have believed that Mason continued to pose a danger. The term 'objective reasonableness' pertains independently to the determination of a constitutional violation and also to the immunity issue. . . While Officer Faul, according to the jury, used objectively unreasonable excessive force in deploying the canine and shooting Mason, this is not fatally inconsistent with a factual finding of immunity. The jury must have found that although Officer Faul's belief that Mason posed and continued to pose a serious threat was incorrect, it was excusable or, at most, negligent in the heat and immediacy of the confrontation. Put otherwise, for immunity purposes, the jury need not have accepted the contention, advanced in Judge Higginbotham's dissent, that Mason posed no 'sufficient threat' before or during the confrontation. . . In that situation, qualified immunity was required. It is this court's duty to resolve any facial conflict in a jury's verdict. . . Here, given the numerous witnesses and conflicting versions of the encounter, we cannot conclude that the facts found by the jury could not support both of its findings.")

Westfall v. Luna (Westfall I), 903 F.3d 534, 548-49 (5th Cir. 2018) ("The district court relied on Scott to disregard Westfall's account of the events leading up to the body-slam. But the standard is a demanding one: 'a court should not discount the nonmoving party's story unless the video evidence provides so much clarity that a reasonable jury could not believe his account.'. . In Darden, for example, we held that videos did not meet that difficult standard because they did not show what happened during an important twenty-five seconds of the encounter, a period of time for which the parties provided different accounts. . . In Ramirez v. Martinez, 716 F.3d 369 (5th Cir. 2013), we held the same thing about videos that were 'too uncertain' to discount the plaintiff's version of the events and where it was 'unclear exactly what or who precipitate[d] and what constitute[d] that struggle.'. . Here, the audio is similarly unhelpful. The audio does not indicate how, if at all, Westfall physically resisted the officers' alleged attempts to restrain her. Furthermore, the audio is unclear as to the sequence of events, including when exactly Luna slammed Westfall to the ground. Thus, there is a fact issue as to whether a reasonable officer would have concluded that there was a need for force. And taking the facts in the light most favorable to Westfall—that she was attempting to enter her house but not actively resisting the officers—a jury could reasonably find that the degree of force Luna used—slamming Westfall onto her brick porch—did not match the need.")

Thomas v. Williams, 719 F. App'x 346, 350-52 & n.4 (5th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 638 (2019) ("In evaluating a qualified immunity defense, this court 'considers only the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers.'. . 'Those items of evidence that emerge after the warrant is issued have no bearing on whether or not a warrant was validly issued.'. .The Thomases rely only on observations that Williams made during the course of executing the warrant, not facts Williams was actually aware of when he submitted his probable cause affidavit to the judge. . . Because the Thomases do not present any evidence that Williams knew the statements were false or acted with reckless disregard for the truth at the time he swore the affidavit, the district court properly held that Williams was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As Williams did not violate any clearly established law by executing a search warrant at a residence that he thought was the location described in the search warrant, the district court appropriately found that Williams's qualified immunity defense was applicable and he did not violate the Thomases' Fourth Amendment rights by entering their home without a warrant. Even if some Fourth Amendment rights were violated, the rights were not clearly established. The prevailing law does not instruct that unintentionally executing a search warrant at the wrong location automatically violates the Fourth Amendment and precludes an officer's qualified immunity defense. Accordingly, Williams could not have been 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violat[ing] the law.'. . . As the district court found, it is undisputed that Williams first conducted a sweep, which led him to decide to abort the search, and no such search was ever conducted. This protective sweep does not constitute a search, so Williams merely entering the Thomases' residence does not constitute a 'search.'. . Moreover, the record does not reflect that Williams remained in the residence to perform an unconstitutional search; he remained in the residence to explain to the Thomases what had happened and to ask questions about the suspect. It was not objectively unreasonable for Williams to conduct a protective sweep and remain in the Thomases' home to explain the circumstances under which the officers inadvertently entered their home. Accordingly, because Williams did not perform a search after realizing he was at the wrong location, Williams did not violate any clearly established constitutional law. . . The district court, again, properly granted Williams qualified immunity on this issue. . . . The dissent attacks this conclusion, urging that it fails to consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the Thomases. Importantly, it never mentions the burden-shifting in the qualified immunity context: plaintiffs must show that a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . The dissent also would have this court place an unrealistic burden on police officers that would essentially void well-established law that officers should not be liable for honest mistakes. Its position would force officers to act only upon completely vetted information; it is no secret that a main tenet of an officer's job is to act and react, in the most reasonable manner possible, while circumstances are rapidly unfolding in real time. To provide otherwise would allow no leeway in an officer's judgment—leeway explicitly provided for under the qualified immunity doctrine—and would also place the public's safety in jeopardy.")

Thomas v. Williams, 719 F. App'x 346, 354, 357 n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) (Dennis, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 638 (2019) ("In Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014), the Supreme Court took the unusual step of granting certiorari simply to correct this court's misapplication of the summary judgment standard. The Supreme Court then unanimously and summarily vacated this court's affirmance of summary judgment to a defendant-officer on the basis of qualified immunity. . . The Court stated, '[T]he Fifth Circuit failed to view the evidence at summary judgment in the light most favorable to [the nonmovant] with respect to the central facts of this case' and 'fail[ed] to credit evidence that contradicted some of its key factual conclusions,' and thereby 'improperly "weighed the evidence" and resolved disputed issues in favor of the moving party.'. . Statistically speaking, it is highly unlikely that the Supreme Court would repeat this strong remedy in the instant case, but the majority appears bent on providing a very good candidate for this course of action. Because the majority opinion fails to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, fails to credit evidence that contradicts its key factual conclusions, and makes additional serious legal errors, I must respectfully dissent. . . .[I]n affirming the district court's summary judgment dismissal of the Thomases' claims, the majority opinion fails to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmovants with respect to the central facts of this case, fails to credit evidence that contradicts its key factual conclusions, improperly weighs the evidence and resolves disputed issues in favor of the moving party, and makes serious legal errors regarding the scope of the Fourth Amendment. I respectfully dissent. . . . The majority opinion faults this dissent for not mentioning 'the burden-shifting in the qualified-immunity context,' pursuant to which 'plaintiffs must show that a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . It is, of course, the Thomases' burden to show that Williams's conduct violated their clearly established rights. They have carried their burden by providing the opposing summary-judgment evidence discussed above, which the majority opinion ignores. The majority opinion's invocation of 'burden-shifting' as if it modifies the well-established rule that 'courts may not resolve genuine disputes of fact in favor of the party seeking summary judgment,' Tolan, 134 S. Ct. at 1866, is emblematic of the majority opinion's misapprehension of the summary judgment standard.") Darden v. City of Fort Worth, Texas, 880 F.3d 722, 729-33 (5th Cir. 2017) (on denial of rehearing), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 69 (2018) ("[I]n the present case, eyewitnesses claim that Darden put his hands in the air when the officers entered the residence, complied with the officers' commands, and did not resist arrest. Yet Officer Snow allegedly threw Darden to the ground and twice shocked him with a Taser while he was being beaten by Officer Romero. In light of our prior case law, Officer Snow should have known that he could not use that amount of force on an individual who was not resisting arrest. It is worth pointing out that a jury may ultimately conclude that Darden did not comply with the officers' commands and was actively resisting arrest. Under those facts, Officer Snow's decisions to force Darden to the ground and tase him might have been reasonable. . . However, on the record before us, there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether Darden was actively resisting arrest and whether the force Officer Snow used was clearly excessive and clearly unreasonable. . . . [W]e must determine whether a jury could find that Officer Romero used excessive force when he allegedly choked, kicked, and punched Darden and forced Darden into a prone position to handcuff him behind his back. As an initial matter, we note that this was not a situation where an officer arrived at the scene with little or no information and had to make a split-second decision. Rather, Officer Romero acknowledges that he stood at his post near the front door for a while and observed the interaction between Darden and Officer Snow before running into the house to assist. In other words, Officer Romero saw whether Darden was resisting and saw how much force had already been used on Darden. He needed to take those perceptions into account in assessing how much additional force, if any, was necessary. . . [W]e have found that a police officer uses excessive force when the officer chokes, punches, or kicks a suspect who is not resisting arrest. . . Thus, if a jury finds that no reasonable officer on the scene would have perceived Darden to be actively resisting arrest, then a jury could also conclude that Officer Romero used excessive force by choking Darden and repeatedly punching and kicking him in the face. . . Darden's right to be free from such force was also clearly established at the time of Officer Romero's alleged misconduct. The law is clear that the degree of force an officer can reasonably employ is reduced when an arrestee is not actively resisting. . . Moreover, at the time of the alleged misconduct it was clearly established that violently slamming or striking a suspect who is not actively resisting arrest constitutes excessive use of force. . . In the case at bar, eyewitnesses testified that Officer Romero choked, punched, and kicked Darden, even though Darden was purportedly complying with the officers' orders and not resisting arrest. Officer Romero also forced Darden—an obese man—onto his stomach, pushed his face into the floor, and pulled Darden's hands behind his back. All the while, other people in the residence were repeatedly yelling that Darden could not breathe. If the plaintiff's version of events is true, Officer Romero's actions were plainly in conflict with our case law at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . . As is analyzed above, a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer would have perceived Darden as posing an immediate threat to the officers' safety or thought that he was resisting arrest. Therefore, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Darden, Officer Romero's actions—choking, punching, and kicking Darden—were objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at the time of the incident.")

Orr v. Copeland, 844 F.3d 484, 491-95 (5th Cir. 2016) ("While Scott empowers a district court to disregard testimony that is at odds with video evidence, the holding below would prevent summary judgment from being granted in the absence of video evidence, effectively stripping all officers of qualified immunity if their actions were not recorded. This fundamentally flips the burden back onto the government official. . . Second, the district court was not permitted to disregard the testimony of the two eyewitnesses. There is no evidence to suggest that the pair was biased, and the district court specifically found that the heirs '[did] not offer any evidence to contradict the eyewitnesses' statements.' Because their testimony was 'uncontradicted and unimpeached,' the district court was required to give it credence. Failure to do so amounted to an inappropriate 'credibility determination[ ].'. .We now turn to the question of whether Copeland was entitled to qualified immunity, applying the correct evidentiary standard for summary judgment articulated above. Giving full weight to the undisputed eyewitness testimony, we hold that the district court erred in denying Copeland's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . . Here, after Bradley ignored Copeland's verbal commands and initial efforts to restrain him, Copeland deployed his taser. When the taser malfunctioned, he resorted to physical force—kicks, punches, and hammer strikes—to attempt to take down the suspect. Considering the totality of the circumstances including the size differential of the combatant and the duration of the altercation, which one eyewitness referred to as a 'fight to the death,' Copeland's conduct prior to the shooting was neither excessive nor unreasonable. . . .Here, undisputed evidence demonstrates that Copeland used deadly force to protect himself. By the time Copeland drew and fired his weapon, Bradley—who was physically larger and stronger than Copeland—had already disobeyed verbal orders, put Copeland in a headlock, wrestled Copeland to the ground, and repeatedly reached for Copeland's firearm. One eyewitness described the altercation as a 'fight to the death.' Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable officer could have believed that his life was in danger. The heirs claim that they have proffered enough evidence to raise genuine issues of material fact and should survive summary judgment. Specifically, they claim that the testimonies of Copeland's firearm expert Greg Karim and crime scene reconstruction expert Janice Johnson call into question the accuracy of the reenactment photos. They also claim that the lack of DNA evidence on Copeland's radio wire challenges Copeland's story that Bradley attempted to choke him with the chord. But the heirs have failed to provide any evidence challenging the principle dispositive 'fact material to whether [Copeland] was justified in using deadly force': that Bradley repeatedly reached for the officer's firearm. . . This court has repeatedly found that it is objectively reasonable for an officer to use deadly force even if he merely believes—albeit reasonably—that the suspect is reaching for a weapon. . .Copeland, Brenda Miller, and Zachary Rife all stated that prior to the shooting, Bradley attempted to grab Copeland's pistol. Absent evidence to the contrary, the court is required to accept this testimony as true. . . The heirs have thus failed to satisfy their burden of establishing that Copeland's use of lethal force was unreasonable. . . . Because the heirs have failed to demonstrate a constitutional violation, we hold that they have failed to satisfy their burden of showing that Copeland is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bone v. Dunnaway, 657 F. App'x 258 (5th Cir. 2016) ("We have distinguished, for purposes of qualified immunity, cases in which officers face verbal resistance but no fleeing suspect, from those in which officers face some form of verbal or physical resistance and a fleeing suspect. In the former cases, we have denied qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. [collecting cases] In the latter cases, we have affirmed grants of qualified immunity. [collecting cases] . . . .This distinction also drove the outcome for one plaintiff in Tolan v. Cotton, 573 F. App'x 330, 330 (5th Cir.) (no qualified immunity where officers shot suspect who was neither physically resisting officers nor attempting to flee), on remand from 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014), . . . while resulting in a different outcome for his mother, see Tolan v. Cotton, 713 F.3d 299, 308 (5th Cir. 2013) (holding that officer's 'grabbing [the plaintiff's] arm and shoving her against the garage door' after she refused to comply with verbal commands to facilitate a search was not unconstitutional under clearly established law), vacated on other grounds, 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014), aff'd in relevant part, 573 F. App'x 330, 331 (2014) ("It goes without saying that all other [than the son's] dismissals ... are not affected by [the Supreme Court's] holding."). . . . [I]f Bone's version of the events is true, there was no verbal command that she stop, no arrest, and no flight, and Jones's degree of force was clearly prohibited under our precedent. Given this factual dispute, which turns on the credibility of Jones and Bone, we cannot resolve the qualified immunity question as a matter of law. Accordingly, we conclude that Jones is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, 826 F.3d 272, 278-79 (5th Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1277 (2017) ("Salazar contends that the district court erred because it resolved disputed issues of material fact in Officer Thompson's favor. Specifically, Salazar asserts that the district court erred by finding that: 1) the highway was dimly lit; 2) Officer Thompson adequately warned Salazar prior to the shooting; 3) Salazar turned sharply towards Thompson; and 4) Salazar reached for his waistband, making threatening movements with his hands. Of the four issues, only one need be addressed—whether Salazar reached for his waistband before being shot. Unless Salazar has presented competent summary judgment evidence that he did not reach toward his waistband (for what Officer Thompson perceived to be a weapon), Officer Thompson's decision to shoot was not a use of unreasonable or excessive deadly force. . .Here, the record evidence shows that Officer Thompson testified that: 1) he saw Salazar reach for his waistband; 2) his view of Salazar's waistband was obscured (either by Salazar's low-hanging shirt, the angle at which Salazar turned, or some combination of the two); and 3) he perceived Salazar's movements to be consistent with those of an arrestee reaching for a concealed weapon. In the proceedings before the district court, however, Salazar did not deny reaching for his waistband. . . nor has he submitted any other controverting evidence in this regard. To the point, Salazar has not presented any competent summary judgment evidence to controvert or challenge Officer Thompson's testimony noted above. And, in the absence of such controverting evidence, we cannot assume that Salazar 'could or would prove the necessary facts' to survive summary judgment. . . Thus, based on our precedent and the undisputed facts, considering the totality of the circumstances—which include Salazar's resistance, intoxication, his disregard for Officer Thompson's orders, the threat he and the other three men in his truck posed while unrestrained, and Salazar's actions leading up to the shooting (including suddenly reaching towards his waistband)—it seems clear that it was not unreasonable for an officer in Officer Thompson's position to perceive Salazar's actions to be an immediate threat to his safety. . . And, it follows that it was not 'clearly excessive' or 'unreasonable' for Officer Thompson to use deadly force in the manner he did to protect himself in such circumstances. . . Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Salazar's constitutional rights were not violated; and, we hold that the district court did not err in granting Officer Thompson qualified immunity.")

Byrd v. City of Bossier, 624 F. App'x 899, 904 (5th Cir. 2015) ("While the photograph tends to discredit Byrd's testimony, it does not blatantly contradict it. Unquestionably, Byrd was not yet handcuffed at the time the photograph was taken. But although the photo shows the Officers using physical contact to restrain Byrd, the photo does not necessarily depict the Officers 'striking' Byrd in the manner that caused his injuries. A jury could conclude that the Officers were not yet using force when the photo was taken: rather, Short held Byrd's forearm, without resistance, to put Byrd's hands behind his back. Or a jury could conclude that the photo supports Byrd's version of events because it was taken mere seconds before the Officers successfully cuffed Byrd. Following that, the Officers might have proceeded to dunk Byrd's head underwater and beat him in the manner he described. Finally, the photo does not necessarily show that Byrd resisted arrest, though that is one rational conclusion that could be drawn from it. A jury could conclude that Byrd—recently rescued from the water—was flailing or grasping for a branch. A jury may not find Byrd's narrative credible, but the photograph does not blatantly contradict it. Accordingly, the district court erred in refusing to consider Byrd's deposition testimony in its summary judgment analysis. See Tolan v. Cotton, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 1861, 1866, 188 L.Ed.2d 895 (2014) (per curiam).")

Dawson v. Anderson Cnty., Tex., 769 F.3d 326, 327, 328 (5th Cir. 2014) (Haynes, J., joined by Dennis and Graves, JJ., dissenting from denial of reh'g en banc) ("The Supreme Court's recent decision in Tolan v. Cotton reminds us that, for summary judgment motions based on qualified immunity, the facts must be viewed in context and in the light most favorable to the nonmovant. . . After Dawson was arrested and brought to the jail, she was asked to 'squat and cough' while undressed in the presence of four armed jailers. The stated reason for the 'squat and cough' was that the jailers needed to determine whether Dawson had secreted contraband or weapons on her person. Dawson testified that she complied with the initial command to 'squat and cough.' Anderson County contends she did not comply at all. The jailers asked Dawson to 'squat and cough' again, allegedly stating that they would make her 'squat and cough' 'all night long.' Dawson refused. At some point, the jailers responded by shooting her with a pepperball gun to force compliance. As we must view the facts in the light most favorable to Dawson, we must assume she did comply with the initial command. Assuming Dawson complied, a jury could infer that the jailers were not concerned about safety at all but rather were issuing unreasonable orders for sport. . . In that light, it would be unreasonable for a jailer to take Dawson's refusal to comply for the jailer's amusement a second time (after already squatting and coughing), without more, as license to begin shooting pepperballs at her. No case law suggests this sort of procedure can be conducted for any reason other than to assure officers there is nothing hidden inside the cavity. As such, summary judgment was improper. I recognize, however, that the fact that a case is wrongly decided on the merits is not, by itself, a basis for en banc rehearing. . . This case presents larger questions that would benefit from en banc consideration. Where is the line between a legitimate security protocol and government oppression? What standard should apply when the alleged victim of police abuse has been arrested but is not yet processed for pretrial detainment? Both questions are worthy of this full court's attention. I therefore dissent from the court's decision not to rehear this case en banc. I agree that Supreme Court precedent makes a strip search with a 'squat and cough' arguably permissible for an initial search. Florence v. Bd. of Chosen Freeholders of Cnty. of Burlington, 132 S.Ct. 1510 (2012). But does Florence mean an officer can make a naked, defenseless arrestee 'squat and cough' 'all night long?' Once an arrestee 'squats and coughs,' how many more times must she comply? Is an arrestee required to follow any order from a group of armed jailers, regardless of how ridiculous, or face a pepperball to force compliance? Where is the line? Dawson argues that since she complied once, and no officer indicated a problem with the first 'squat and cough,' requiring her to 'squat and cough' 'all night long' just to humiliate her is not a legitimate basis upon which to use force, such as a pepperball shot, to obtain compliance. I submit that we cannot and should not tolerate unnecessary harassment and humiliation of arrestees for the amusement of officers.")

Dawson v. Anderson County, Tex., 566 F. App'x 369, 370, 371 (5th Cir. 2014), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 769 F.3d 326 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Appellant first claims that the use of the pepperball gun constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Contrary to her jailers, Dawson stated she initially complied with their directive to 'squat and cough' during the strip search. This initial compliance removed any need for the pepperball gun (which left small marks and broke the skin) and, she contended, its use therefore was excessive. The defendants responded with a claim of qualified immunity. To overcome this defense, Dawson must show an injury caused by actions that were objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . 'The defendant's acts are held to be objectively reasonable unless all reasonable officials in the defendant's circumstances would have then known that the defendant's conduct violated the United States Constitution or the federal statute as alleged by the plaintiff.'. .We cannot conclude that all reasonable officers would believe that the use of force in this case violated the Fourth Amendment, because it is undisputed that Dawson did not comply with successive search commands given at her arrestee intake encounter. Even crediting her that she obeyed at first, Dawson admitted refusing a renewed command to 'squat and cough.' Law enforcement officers are within their rights to use objectively reasonable force to obtain compliance from prisoners. . . Measured force achieved compliance with the officers' search directives in this case, again, crediting, as we must, Dawson's contention that she complied at first but then refused a search order given twice believing it to be abusive. Measured force. . . used on an arrestee who refuses immediately successive search orders cannot be deemed objectively unreasonable under our qualified immunity caselaw. We next consider Dawson's argument that the search was conducted in an unreasonable manner. . . Dawson's assertion is that, in addition to using a pepperball gun, the defendants laughed at her and made abusive comments. We have held previously that verbal abuse by a jailer alone does not give rise to a § 1983 claim. . . We have already held that the use of the pepperball gun in this case was objectively reasonable, and we do not find that her assertions about laughter and taunts combine to overcome defendants' qualified immunity.") Dawson v. Anderson County, Tex., 566 F. App'x 369, 371-74, 376-79 (5th Cir. 2014), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 769 F.3d 326 (5th Cir. 2014) (Dennis, J., dissenting) ("The majority concludes that Dawson has failed to present a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the Defendants . . . violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law by repeatedly shooting at her with a pepperball gun during a strip search in which she was undressed, unarmed, and surrounded by multiple officers. The majority fails to view the evidence in the light most favorable to Dawson and disregards reasonable inferences that jurors could draw from the record to conclude that under clearly established law, the officers used excessive force and conducted a strip search in an unreasonable manner in violation of Dawson's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent and would reverse and remand for trial. . . .Although a summary-judgment motion premised upon qualified immunity shifts the burden to the plaintiff, this burden shift does not alter the requirement that a court view all evidence and make all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . The majority fails to view the evidence in the light most favorable to Dawson, as it must at this procedural posture. Employing similar reasoning as the district court, the majority affirms the summary-judgment order as to Dawson's excessive-force claim, . . . concluding that not all reasonable officers would have known that the use of the pepperball gun here violated the Fourth Amendment because it is 'undisputed that Dawson did not comply with successive search commands given at her arrestee intake encounter.'. . .When the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Dawson, the record establishes that she was initially compliant, was not yelling or arguing with the officers, and that after telling officers that she would not comply with a harassing request to squat and cough all night, she was met with near-immediate use of force, while she was undressed, unarmed, and did not pose any threat to the officers' safety. The majority improperly credits the Defendants' version of events when it concludes that Dawson's conduct was undisputedly non-compliant and thus reasonably warranted 'measured force' to 'achieve [ ] compliance with the officers search directives.'. . By describing Dawson's alleged non-compliance as 'undisputed' and characterizing the officers response as 'measured'—disregarding testimony that creates an inference that the officers' immediately resorted to force without sufficient negotiation—the majority, like the district court, fails to view the record evidence in the light most favorable to Dawson. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent and would reverse the grant of summary judgment on this issue. . . .Without applying the Graham factors, the majority summarily concludes that because Dawson was non-compliant, the officers' use of force was objectively reasonable to achieve compliance and thus the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. I disagree. Applying the Graham factors to the record evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Dawson, I would find that she presented sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact to dispute the Defendants' claims that the use of the pepperball gun was objectively reasonable under clearly established law. First, Dawson was in custody for two misdemeanor charges, neither of which involve accusations of violence. . . . Application of the second Graham factor—the individual's threat to officer safety—similarly supports a conclusion that Defendants' conduct was not objectively reasonable. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Dawson, she was compliant with the officers' instruction to submit to a strip search, obediently agreed to squat and cough upon the officer's first instruction to do so, was unarmed, unclothed, stood within one to two feet of the dress-out room's wall, was surrounded by multiple armed officers, and did not attempt to strike an officer. On this record, viewing the evidence in her favor, Dawson did not pose a threat to the officers' safety. Lastly, the third Graham factor—whether the plaintiff actively resisted the officers—also supports a conclusion that the officer's use of force was objectively unreasonable. Crediting all reasonable inferences in Dawson's favor, she presented record evidence that she never resisted the officers' lawful directives. Rather, the evidence regarding her refusal to squat and cough after she initially complied with officers' orders may reasonably be construed as a verbalized denial to consent to an unlawful, abusive order and thus would not qualify as 'active resistance' and would not justify the officer's resort to force. . . On this record, viewing the evidence in Dawson's favor, a jury could reasonably conclude that the officers resorted to the use of force without threat to their safety, in violation of Dawson's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, and that therefore, summary judgment for Defendants was improper. . . Under Graham, a reasonable officer would have sufficient notice that using a pepperball gun to repeatedly shoot a naked, possibly pregnant, compliant, non-threatening detainee who merely stated she would not comply with an abusive command, clearly constitutes excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Although Dawson was unable to point to case law forbidding this exact conduct, that alone is insufficient to warrant qualified immunity. . . .In addition to the excessive force-claim, . . . Dawson alleges that the strip search was conducted in an unreasonable, unconstitutional manner, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Dawson contends that the search was unreasonably conducted because she was verbally harassed, laughed at, and, despite her compliance with the officers' initial orders, shot repeatedly with a pepperball gun. The majority opinion reasons that the use of the pepperball gun was not objectively unreasonable and an unreasonable search claim may not be established by allegations of mere verbal abuse alone, and affirms summary judgment on this claim. Because I disagree with the majority's finding that the use of the pepperball gun here was not unreasonable, I would consider the allegations of verbal harassment in the context in which it occurred and not in isolation from the officers' use of the pepperball gun. While mere verbal threats and gestures may not be cognizable under § 1983, the combination of taunting and harassing language with the use of excessive force would violate clearly established law as an unreasonable manner of conducting a search. . . . Dawson has presented summary-judgment evidence that during the strip search, despite her compliance and non-threatening behavior, she was surrounded by multiple officers, was verbally abused, was seen undressed by a male officer, and was shot at repeatedly with a pepperball gun. . . . Rather than viewing the totality of the circumstances as alleged by Dawson, the majority again improperly discredits and disregards evidence that gives rise to a genuine issue of material fact regarding the reasonableness of the search. I respectfully dissent from the majority opinion and would hold that the district court's summary-judgment order in favor of the Defendants should be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings regarding Dawson's excessive-force and unreasonable-search claims.")

Ramirez v. Martinez, 716 F.3d 369, 379 (5th Cir. 2013) ("The district court properly determined that a reasonable officer would view Martinez's use of force under Ramirez's version of the facts to be clearly excessive and objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. Thus, a jury must determine the facts at trial. . . . Next, the district court did not misapply the law in holding Deputy Martinez's alleged excessive and unreasonable force under Ramirez's version of the events violated clearly established law. . . . Here, Ramirez alleged he posed no threat to the officers and yet was tased twice, including once after he was handcuffed and subdued while lying face down on the ground, in violation of clearly established law. Therefore, the district court did not err in denying Martinez qualified immunity on Ramirez's claim for excessive force. Ramirez's version of the facts, which the district court found supported by the summary judgment record, does not indicate the district court committed a 'purely legal' error, Kinney, 367 F.3d at 347, and we lack jurisdiction to review the district court's finding 'that a genuine issue of fact exists regarding whether [Martinez] did, in fact, engage in ... conduct [that was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law].'")

Ramirez v. Martinez, 716 F.3d 369, 380-83 (5th Cir. 2013) (Edith H. Jones, J., dissenting) ("With respect to my colleagues, I must dissent to the extent the majority opinion denies qualified immunity to Officer Ramirez for his alleged use of unconstitutionally excessive force against arrestee Martinez. Between this opinion and another recently issued in this court, Newman v. Guedry, 703 F.3d 757 (5th Cir.2012), we seem to have departed from the Supreme Court's clear and repeated statements regarding qualified immunity for law enforcement officers. In brief, the Supreme Court has held that given the perilous circumstances under which much law enforcement work is carried out and the inevitable need for split-second decisions, a plaintiff must overcome two levels of unreasonableness to get to the jury on a claim for a Fourth Amendment violation. . . The plaintiff must first create a genuine issue of material fact that the force used under the circumstances was objectively unreasonable. . . He or she must additionally show a genuine, material fact issue that the law was so 'clear,' under reasonably analogous circumstances confronted by the officer, that 'no reasonable officer' would have used that quantum of force. . . The standard thus shields all but the plainly incompetent officers or those who knowingly violate the law. . .The standard also explicitly operates to 'protect officers from the sometimes "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force."'. . What this court's recent decisions seem to suggest, however, is that officers can be liable even if they are well within that hazy border. . . . Fortunately, the majority does not treat this case as an indictment of the use of tasers, but rather an incident that must be considered in totality through the lens of Ramirez's self-serving testimony. . . But as I have noted, Saucier found qualified immunity appropriate even though there was a factual dispute concerning the suspect's degree of resistance. The totality of circumstances in Saucier furnishes strong support for granting qualified immunity as a matter of law here. First, there was reasonable cause to believe Ramirez violated Texas law. Second, Ramirez admits he resisted handcuffing and pulled his arm away, and thus actively resisted arrest. Third, Saucier reiterates that the right to make an arrest 'necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof.'. . Fourth, as in Saucier, the degree of force used here could not have been extreme; the majority opinion refers only to Ramirez's claims of cuts and bruises, taser burn marks, and temporary pain. Finally, the entire confrontation lasted about a half minute and included scuffling after Ramirez was on the ground. Officer Martinez had to react instinctively to a 'tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving' situation. . . Balancing all these circumstances, a jury could not find that no reasonable officer would have tased Ramirez two times. Even if Officer Martinez made a mistake on the second tasing, Saucier, echoing the line of consistent Supreme Court precedent, should shield his reasonable but mistaken conduct from suit as well as liability. . . Although I deplore official misconduct as much as does the majority, the bars to holding law enforcement officers personally liable for damages are necessarily and properly high. Taking this case to a jury, in my view, significantly erodes the protection of qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent.")

Poole v. City of Shreveport, 691 F.3d 624, 633 (5th Cir. 2012) ('The dissent effectively turns the qualified immunity analysis on its head by trying to contort this inquiry into one that evaluates the subjective merits of an officer's actions. The doctrine of qualified immunity, however, 'shield[s] [officers] from civil damages liability as long as their actions could reasonably have been thought consistent with the rights they are alleged to have violated.'. . Where a plaintiff resists as Poole did, and officers react with force that corresponds to the resistance, as both Stalnaker and Creighton did, it cannot be said that the officers' force is objectively excessive or clearly unreasonable; the Supreme Court therefore requires qualified immunity. . . Irrespective of the dissent's subjective evaluation of this excessive force case which indisputably resulted in a serious injury, summary judgment does not require us to accept absurd factual allegations that are contradicted by videotape evidence. . . Instead, it demands that we ask, ultimately, whether Poole has shown that Stalnaker's and Creighton's actions were objectively excessive and clearly unreasonable in light of Fourth Amendment law. . . Neither Poole nor the dissent persuade us that he has.")

Poole v. City of Shreveport, 691 F.3d 624, 635, 636, 644 (5th Cir. 2012) (Elrod, J. concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority opinion's disagreement about the videotape evidence only underscores why this case should go to a jury. Nowhere does the majority opinion indicate that Creighton would be entitled to qualified immunity under my understanding of the facts. Thus, at bottom, ours is a factual dispute, not a legal one, and thus a jury should resolve it. . . . It is true that we must 'view[ ] the facts in the light depicted by the videotape.' . . That does not mean, however, that we may usurp the jury's province to resolve factual disputes. . . . In summary, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Poole, Poole has demonstrated that Creighton's use of force violated his constitutional rights. Specifically, after Poole was pulled over for a minor traffic violation, put up no active resistance, and gave no indication that he intended to flee, . . . Creighton used clearly excessive and unreasonable force that undisputedly broke Poole's arm and dislocated his elbow. . . . Having demonstrated that Poole has satisfied prong one of the qualified immunity analysis under Graham and this circuit's case law, I turn briefly to prong two. The majority opinion does not decide prong two of the qualified immunity analysis because it concludes that Poole cannot show a constitutional violation, but it notes that the parties do not dispute that the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Poole has satisfied prong two because he has shown that 'at the time of the challenged conduct, [December 19, 2006,] "the contours of [the] right [were] sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right."'. . Several pre–2006 cases from our circuit put Creighton on notice that the actions Poole has alleged would have violated Poole's rights.")

Brown v. Sudduth, 675 F.3d 472, 482 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Brown's contention that the district court erred in presenting the issue of qualified immunity to the jury is meritless. A jury may be given the issue of qualified immunity if that defense was not resolved on summary judgment. Melear v. Spears, 862 F.2d 1177, 1184 (5th Cir.1989).")

Porter v. Epps, No. 09-60324, 2011 WL 4471051, at *1-*6 (5th Cir. Sept. 28, 2011) (In an appeal after a jury verdict for the plaintiff, where jury was instructed on qualified immunity and district judge denied motion for a jmol made by Commissioner of Mississippi Department of Corrections, the Court of Appeals reversed, noting "[t]he issue is whether Epps's actions, in light of his duty to ensure Porter's timely release from prison, were objectively unreasonable. . . Porter's § 1983 claim is predicated on Epps's conduct in (1) failing to promulgate adequate policies in the records department; (2) failing to train and supervise the employees in the records department; and (3) denying Porter's third-step appeal. . . .[W]e must consider whether Epps's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established law that a prison official must ensure an inmate's timely release from prison and that such an official may be liable for failure to promulgate policy or failure to train/supervise if he acted with deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. . . . [R]eview of the record reveals that there was insufficient evidence to support a jury finding that Epps's failure to promulgate policy was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. The evidence did not show that a reasonable person would have had actual or constructive notice that MDOC's policies with regard to the records department would result in instances of false imprisonment. . . . In sum, no reasonable juror could determine that it was 'obvious that the likely consequence[ ]' of not adopting more specific policies in the records department would be a deprivation of civil rights. While it is unfortunate that the records department erred in interpreting the sentencing order for Porter, this error does not support a finding that Epps's policies involving the records department were objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, Epps is entitled to qualified immunity in this regard. . . . There is insufficient evidence to support a finding that Epps's training or supervision of the employees in the records department was objectively unreasonable. . . . [T]he fact that an employee erred in one instance does not provide sufficient evidence to show that Epps's alleged actions in failing to train were objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, Epps is entitled to qualified immunity on this issue.")

Meadours v. Ermel, 409 F. App'x 784, 2011WL 334679, at *1-*3 (5th Cir. Feb. 3, 2011) ("This appeal raises a single issue: whether the jury instructions communicated, as they must, that qualified immunity is available only when police officers' actions are objectively reasonable. The parents of decedent Robert Meadours sued under § 1983 for his shooting death by police who were attempting to subdue him during a delusional outburst. In an earlier appeal, this court held that material factual issues surrounding the reasonableness of the officers' actions existed, which deprived this court of appellate jurisdiction. . . On remand, at the trial's conclusion, the district court read a jury charge based on the Fifth Circuit's pattern instructions. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the officers and answered the following interrogatory in the negative: 'Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the Defendant's use of force was clearly excessive to the need and was objectively unreasonable?' Meadours's parents appeal. . . . In the present case, the district court read an extended jury charge related to the officers' assertion of qualified immunity. The bulk of this instruction quotes the Fifth Circuit Pattern Jury Charge. Appellants take issue with the last paragraph:

> [If you find] either (1) that the Defendants were plainly incompetent or that (2) they knowingly violated the law regarding Robert Meadours's constitutional rights, you must find for the Plaintiffs. If, however, you find that the Defendants had a reasonable belief that their actions did not violate the constitutional rights of Robert Meadours, then you cannot find them liable even if Robert Meadours's rights were in fact violated as a result of the Defendants' objectively reasonable actions.

They contend that the district court could not express the words 'knowing violation' or ask whether 'the Defendants had a reasonable belief' without transforming the objective test for immunity into a subjective one. We disagree. Appellants argument divorces the contested language not only from the surrounding instructions, but also from the body of Supreme Court precedent defining qualified immunity. . . . First, assuming arguendo that the challenged language was potentially misleading, the other instructions dispelled any ambiguity. Considering the instructions as a whole, their repeated emphasis on 'objectively reasonable' conduct as assessed by 'a reasonable officer on the scene' leaves no room for a juror to apply a subjective test. Five instructions endorsing objectivity trump two that are at worst unclear. Second, the language with which Appellants take issue is rooted in Supreme Court precedent. The Court in Malley stated that qualified immunity is unavailable for 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .[A]s a substantive matter, this instruction favors plaintiffs. It allows the jury to reject qualified immunity on the basis of a particular defendant's knowledge, even where a reasonable officer would not have known that his actions violated the plaintiff's rights. Appellants also contend that the district court erred in stating that if 'Defendants had a reasonable belief' about the constitutionality of their actions, 'then you cannot find them liable even if Robert Meadours's rights were in fact violated as a result of the Defendants' objectively reasonable actions.'. . . Instructing the jury to evaluate the defendant's views does not affect the requirement of objective reasonableness. As an added precaution, the instruction repeats the objective standard at the end. If any doubt exists in a reasonable juror's mind about the 'belief' at the beginning of the sentence, it could not survive the clarification at the sentence's conclusion: 'objectively reasonable actions.'. . . Evaluated either in the context of the other instructions or in isolation, the challenged language in the jury charge is a correct statement of the law. It did not relieve the officers who shot Meadours from demonstrating that their actions were objectively reasonable.") Goodman v. Harris County, 571 F.3d 388, 400, 401 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Ashabranner seeks a new trial because the district court refused to submit his proposed interrogatory to the jury. The interrogatory he proposed, Ashabranner argues, set forth the second prong of qualified immunity–whether no reasonable officer could have believed that the use of deadly force against Michael was lawful. While admitting that the district court instructed the jury on qualified immunity, Ashabranner argues that, by failing to set forth a specific interrogatory on the second prong of qualified immunity, the district court committed an abuse of discretion. . . .As previously noted, the defense of qualified immunity is a two-step inquiry: the allegation that a 'clearly established constitutional right' was violated and the determination that 'the official's conduct was objectively reasonable under clearly established law existing at the time of the incident.'. . . The jury was asked: 'Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendant Deputy Constable Terry Ashabranner's use of force was clearly excessive to the need and was objectively unreasonable.' The jury answered 'Yes.' Ashabranner sought the following interrogatory: 'Do you find, from a preponderance of the evidence that no reasonable officer possessing knowledge of clearly established law and the information known by Deputy Ashabranner on April 14, 2002, could have believed that his use of force against Michael Goodman on April 14, 2002 was lawful?' A plain reading of the jury instruction belies Ashabranner's assertion of error. The instruction asks whether the use of force was objectively unreasonable, the very requirement set forth in step two of the qualified immunity analysis–the step Ashabranner now argues that the district court ignored. Furthermore, as Ashabranner admits, the district court instructed the jury on the defense of qualified immunity. Thus, when taken as a whole, it cannot be said that the district court failed to properly set the ultimate issues of fact before the jury. The district court therefore did not abuse its discretion.").

Lytle v. Bexar County, Tex., 560 F.3d 404, 409-15, 417, 418 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Although Saucier's rigid 'order of battle'–requiring courts to always address the constitutional issue of whether alleged conduct violated the constitution–is now advisory under Pearson, our ultimate conclusion that O'Donnell is not entitled to qualified immunity mandates a full Saucier inquiry. . . . [T]he reasonableness of an officer's conduct under the Fourth Amendment is often a question that requires the input of a jury. This is not only because the jury must resolve disputed fact issues but also because the use of juries in such cases strengthens our understanding of Fourth Amendment reasonableness. . . . Our standard of review on this interlocutory appeal–namely, whether a reasonable jury could enter a verdict for the non-moving party–emphasizes the importance of juries in cases of alleged excessive force. Indeed, we can find no constitutional violation when an officer's conduct, even viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, falls into that category of conduct that is reasonable as a matter of law. In such cases, we would hold that no rational jury could find that the officer acted unreasonably. But in those cases where the officer's conduct is less clear and an assessment of reasonableness mandates a number of factual inferences, the case falls within the province of a jury. Thus, when determining whether the officer's alleged conduct violated the constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizures, we must remain mindful of the role that the jury can play in this determination. This approach comports with the Supreme Court's decision in Scott. . . . [W]hen facts are disputed and significant factual gaps remain that require the court to draw several plaintiff-favorable inferences, ... we must consider what a factfinder could reasonably conclude in filling these gaps and then assume the conclusion most favorable to the plaintiff. What this means for the present interlocutory appeal is that we can only find no constitutional violation if, even under the version of the facts most favorable to Lytle, O'Donnell's conduct was objectively reasonable. In such a case, no rational jury could conclude that O'Donnell violated the Fourth Amendment, and any genuinely disputed fact issues would be thus immaterial because their resolution would not alter the ultimate conclusion. But if a factfinder could conclude that O'Donnell violated the constitution, we must move on to the qualified immunity question. . . . [B]ecause we must look at all of the facts and circumstances relevant to the reasonableness of O'Donnell's conduct, he is mistaken to focus entirely on the threat of harm. Even were we to agree with O'Donnell as to the threat the Taurus posed, we would be remiss not to consider O'Donnell's conduct in response to that threat. It is unclear how firing at the back of a fleeing vehicle some distance away was a reasonable method of addressing the threat. Indeed, there is some evidence in the record that O'Donnell had been previously informed of the potential danger and futility of shooting at a vehicle. Were a jury to accept Lytle's version of the facts, it might very well be troubled by O'Donnell's act of firing his sidearm at the back of a vehicle three or four houses down the block of a residential area when he was unlikely to have a shot at–and apparently was not aiming for–the driver. A jury might also find that O'Donnell's act of firing at a vehicle driving away from him in a residential area posed a risk that the shots might strike an unintended target. Thus, even if we assumed that the Taurus posed a significant threat of harm, a jury could conclude that O'Donnell's conduct in response to that threat was unreasonable. In other words, under the plaintiff's version of the facts, O'Donnell's conduct itself weighs against a conclusion of reasonableness. . . . Although it stated that '[a] police officer's attempt to terminate a dangerous high-speed car chase that threatens the lives of innocent bystanders does not violate the Fourth Amendment, even when it places the fleeing motorist at risk of serious injury or death,'. . . the Court's decision in Scott did not declare open season on suspects fleeing in motor vehicles. . . . Nearly any suspect fleeing in a motor vehicle poses some threat of harm to the public. As the cases addressing this all-too-common scenario evince, the real inquiry is whether the fleeing suspect posed such a threat that the use of deadly force was justifiable. . . .When we consider the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that O'Donnell's conduct may not have been objectively reasonable. A rational jury could conclude that the Taurus did not pose an especially significant threat of harm such that the use of deadly force was justified. Further, when weighing the threat of harm posed by the Taurus against O'Donnell's chosen course of conduct–firing at the back of the vehicle from some distance–the jury could conclude that O'Donnell's conduct was not a reasonable response to any threat. We emphasize this last point: the facts in this interlocutory appeal merely indicate that O'Donnell's conduct is not beyond question. We are holding only that a jury considering all relevant circumstances–O'Donnell's conduct, the threat of harm to O'Donnell and the public, etc.–could determine that O'Donnell acted unreasonably. The meager record at this point of the proceedings has mandated a number of inferences, and the factual assumptions on which we have decided this appeal might bear little resemblance to what the factfinder ultimately determines. But it is the job of the factfinder, not this court, to ultimately resolve the factual disputes and make the inferences that fill the gaps in the facts. . . . We therefore conclude that a jury could determine that O'Donnell acted unreasonably in firing at the back of the Taurus and thus violated Heather Lytle's constitutional rights. This is sufficient to affirmatively answer the constitutional violation question of our inquiry. We thus turn to the question of whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . It has long been clearly established that, absent any other justification for the use of force, it is unreasonable for a police officer to use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others. . . .This holds as both a general matter, see Garner, 471 U.S. at 11-12, and in the more specific context of shooting a suspect fleeing in a motor vehicle, see, e.g., Kirby, 530 F.3d at 484; Vaughan, 343 F.3d at 1332-33. The right in question was therefore clearly established on February 28, 2006, and this is sufficient to affirmatively answer the qualified immunity question of our inquiry.")

Lytle v. Bexar County, Tex., 560 F.3d 404, 418, 419 (5th Cir. 2009) (Smith, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The majority errs, primarily in light of Scott v. Harris. . . The situation faced by the officers in Scott and the instant case are not different in any way that should make a difference. Scott is the clearly-established law that governs here for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . For purposes of summary judgment, we cannot credit O'Donnell's disputed claim that the Taurus was backing toward him. The other facts, however, are not contested, and they closely mirror the considerations addressed in Scott, in which the Court asked whether, consistent with the Fourth Amendment, [an officer can] attempt to stop a fleeing motorist from continuing his public-endangering flight. . . . The same result [reached in Scott] is called for here. It makes no difference if the dangerous suspect was three or four houses away instead of backing toward the officer. The obvious risk to the public was the same, as was the need for the officer to take action. The blame for the passenger's death falls squarely on the suspect, not the officer, who had no intention of hitting an innocent occupant of the Taurus with his shot. Officer O'Donnell did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Mesa v. Prejean, 543 F.3d 264, 269 (5th Cir. 2008) ("The issue of qualified immunity is a question of law, but in certain circumstances where 'there remain disputed issues of material fact relative to immunity, the jury, properly instructed, may decide the question.' Presley v. City of Benbrook, 4 F.3d 405, 410 (5th Cir.1993).").

Sikes v. Gayton, 218 F.3d 491, 493, 494 (5th Cir. 2000) ("It is clear . . .that regardless of whether the trial court submits the issues of liability and qualified immunity in one or two interrogatories, the central focus is on whether the trial court correctly and clearly instructed the jury. In making this determination, jury interrogatories are considered 'in conjunction with the general [jury] charge' to determine if 'the interrogatories adequately presented the contested issues to the jury. . . . In the case at bar, the court was very clear in instructing the jury on the defense of qualified immunity' . . . . Thus, the question we must address is whether the court abused its discretion in deciding to combine the issues of liability and qualified immunity into a single interrogatory. . . . The court gave the following interrogatory:

> Considering all of the instruction in the jury charge, do you find that Plaintiff Robert D. Sikes proved by a preponderance of the evidence that on August 22, 1995, > Defendant Juan F. Gaytan violated Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment.

In denying the defendant's request for a separate jury interrogatory on qualified immunity, the trial court concluded that giving separate interrogatories created the possibility of confusing the jury, resulting in the return of 'irreconcilable' answers. It is plausible that a jury could be confused by an interrogatory asking whether the force Gaytan used against Sikes amounted to cruel and unusual punishment, and then being asked in an immediately following interrogatory whether the conduct of Gaytan was reasonable. Indeed, finding that the force used against Sikes was cruel and unusual would ordinarily seem to preclude the possibility of a finding that actions of Gaytan were reasonable. Still, we are constrained also to say that a plausible argument can be made that a separate interrogatory on qualified immunity, supported by a clear jury instruction, arguably could clarify rather than confuse the issue before the jury. In the light of this equipoise, we must conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in this case by giving a single jury instruction on the issues of liability and qualified immunity.").

Sikes v. Gayton, 218 F.3d 491, 494, 495 (5th Cir. 2000) (Garza, Reynaldo, J., dissenting) ("[S]everal failures to direct the jury's attention to the qualified immunity issue trouble me in this case. First, the jury instructions did not even use the term 'qualified immunity.' Second, the jury instructions merely used qualified immunity-type language as part of a single paragraph on liability. Third, there was no separate special interrogatory which told the jury to consider qualified immunity. Fourth, and perhaps most troubling, even if we give the instructions the benefit of the doubt, we will find that the jury charge and the interrogatories are inconsistent. Let us say we assume that the jury charge provided to the jury instructions on both excessive force and qualified immunity but an interrogatory only as to excessive force. The jury could well have understood the difference between the substantive claim of excessive force and defense of qualified immunity, but then could have been confused as to the odd disappearance of qualified immunity in the interrogatories. In other words, assuming that the jury instructions explain that liability in this case had two prongs, i.e. that Sike's Eighth Amendment rights were violated and that the officer's behavior was unreasonable, the interrogatory contradicted the instructions when it told the jurors that they only need find that Sike's Eight Amendment rights were violated in order to find Gaytan liable. . . . Given the facts of this case, we should require that qualified immunity be discussed in a separate special interrogatory. At a minimum, we should require that the jury instructions and interrogatories do not actively mislead the jury into believing that the qualified immunity issue has dropped out of consideration.").

McCoy v. Hernandez, 203 F.3d 371, 376 (5th Cir. 2000) ("McCoy argues that the district court erred when it submitted the question of whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity to the jury. McCoy contends that only the court may decide the qualified immunity issue. However, we have previously held that while qualified immunity ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial, if the issue is not decided until trial the defense goes to the jury which must then determine the objective legal reasonableness of the officers' conduct.").

Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 799, 800 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Snyder argues that the district court erred in submitting the question of Trepagnier's qualified immunity to the jury. We disagree. While qualified immunity 'ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial,'. . . if the issue is not decided until trial, the defense is not waived but goes to the jury, which 'must determine the objective legal reasonableness of [the] officer's conduct by construing the facts in dispute.' [citing Melear and Presley] Here, important factual questions remained for trial. Specifically, the jury needed to determine what sequence of events occurred, and, in particular, whether Snyder had a gun-or, if he did not actually have a gun, whether Trepagnier reasonably believed he did. Accordingly, there is no doubt that the district court properly decided to submit the issue of qualified immunity to the jury."), cert. dism'd, 119 S. Ct. 1493 (1999).

Hare v. City of Corinth, 135 F.3d 320, 327-29 (5th Cir. 1998) ("On this appeal, objective reasonableness has been confused with the separate subjective standard of deliberate indifference. . . . [I]n addressing qualified immunity, the test is objective reasonableness. And, again, objective reasonableness is a question of law for the court. . . . the subjective deliberate indifference standard serves only to demonstrate the clearly established law in effect at the time of the incident . . . . And, under that standard. . . the actions of the individual defendants are examined to determine whether, as a matter of law, they were objectively unreasonable. . . . It is important to underline our narrow holding: we do not address arguments concerning the material fact issues designated by the district court. Instead, we hold that the undisputed facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, do not constitute objectively unreasonable conduct when applied against the deliberate indifference standard.").

Pierce v. Smith, 117 F.3d 866, 871 (5th Cir. 1997) ("The issue of whether and when a right is clearly established is typically treated as a question of law. . . Likewise, to the extent that the relevant discrete, historic facts are undisputed, as they essentially are here, the question of the objective reasonableness of the defendant's conduct–i.e., whether at the time and under the circumstances all reasonable officials would have realized the particular challenged conduct violated the constitutional provision sued on–is also a question of law.").

Palmer v. Lares, 42 F.3d 975, 978-79 (5th Cir. 1995) ("In examining the jury instructions this Court has become aware of an error in the charge of which Appellant did not complain. Appellant argued that the lower court merely used the wrong standard of harm in instructing the jury. As discussed above the lower court did not err in this respect; however, the lower court improperly incorporated the inquiry of qualified immunity in its jury charge. . . . The magistrate judge failed to instruct the jury on the first prong of the [qualified immunity] inquiry. The magistrate judge should have first instructed the jury to determine whether Appellant had established a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights to be secure from excessive force. After this instruction, the court should have instructed the jury as to the law in effect at the time of the incident. The court omitted the first prong and instructed the jury to evaluate the reasonableness of the defendants' conduct under the law in effect at the time of the incident.").

Gibson v. Rich, 44 F.3d 274, 277 n.7 (5th Cir. 1995) ("The district court erred in believing that there were disputed facts which prevented the qualified immunity summary judgment from being granted. The district court held that Gibson's allegation that he was not drunk put the issue of intoxication in dispute. However, the district court errs in dwelling on the issue of whether or not Gibson actually was drunk instead of on the issue of whether Rich was reasonable in believing Gibson was intoxicated. Despite Gibson's allegation otherwise, all facts in evidence indicate that Rich was justified in believing that Gibson was intoxicated.").

Harper v. Harris County, 21 F.3d 597, 601 (5th Cir. 1994) ("[T]he evidence reveals that a genuine issue of material fact remains regarding the use of excessive force and the objective reasonableness of using such force, so [Defendant] is not entitled to summary judgment. Of course, [Defendant] still may assert qualified immunity at trial.").

Lampkin v. City of Nacogdoches, 7 F.3d 430, 435 (5th Cir. 1993) ("It must be recognized that even though Bryant diminished the jury's role in qualified immunity cases, it did not entirely abolish it . . . . Rule 56 still has vitality in qualified immunity cases if the underlying historical facts . . . that are material to the resolution of the [question] whether the defendants acted in an objectively reasonable manner in view of the existing law and facts available to them [are in dispute.] . . . . Because the record as it presently stands appears to suggest disputed issues of material fact relevant to the officers' qualified immunity defense, the defense cannot prevail as a matter of law, and this court is without jurisdiction to consider their interlocutory appeal.").

Presley v. City of Benbrook, 4 F.3d 405, 410 (5th Cir. 1993) ("Immunity's shield against suit is lost, of course, when police officer defendants go to trial. At that point, if–and this is a big if–there remain disputed issues of material fact relative to immunity, the jury, properly instructed, may decide the question.").

Enlow v. Tishomingo County, 962 F.2d 501, 510 (5th Cir. 1992) (where facts relied on to establish probable cause for arrest were in dispute, qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claim remains a fact-disputed issue.)

Fraire v. City of Arlington, 957 F.2d 1268, 1269-70 (5th Cir. 1992) ("Almost all excessive force cases are very fact intensive...[a]nd, although there are differing versions of some of the facts in this case, the discrepancies do not rise to the level of genuine issues of material fact.").

White v. Walker, 950 F.2d 972, 976 (5th Cir. 1991) ("The entitlement to qualified immunity may be established as a matter of law by the district court. But if there are triable issues of fact about whether an officer could reasonably believe his conduct legal, then a jury should evaluate the question.").

Harper v. McAndrews, No. 2:18-CV-00520-RSP, 2020 WL 6545134, at *12–13 (E.D. Tex. Nov. 6, 2020) ("If the facts are as Plaintiff asserts, relying on the statement of Lorine McAfee and the location of the taser after the shooting, . . . then Mr. McAfee did not pose a threat of serious physical harm to anyone at the time he was shot. Lorine McAfee states that Mr. McAfee was on his back with her arms wrapped around his legs, with Sgt. McAndrews above them both, when the shots were fired. She also states that the taser was off to the side, not in her brother's hands. Plaintiff's evidence describes Mr. McAfee as needing a walker, an elderly disabled man. On the other hand, Sgt. McAndrews testified that Mr. McAfee had wrestled free and was getting to his feet with the taser in one hand and the other grabbing for the deputy's pistol. Determining which of these competing scenarios is most accurate will require the weighing of evidence, a function that is reserved to the jury. The Court finds that if a jury accepts Plaintiff's version of the facts as true, during the two minutes not shown on the body camera video, the jury could conclude that Sgt. McAndrews violated Mr. McAfee's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. As the Fifth Circuit noted in its en banc opinion in Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 447 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc): 'We conclude that it will be for a jury, and not judges, to resolve the competing factual narratives as detailed in the district court opinion and the record as to the … excessive-force claim.'")

Matthews v. LeBlanc, No. CV 17-8800, 2018 WL 2198508, at *1–2 (E.D. La. May 14, 2018) ("Matthews contends that the issue of qualified immunity is a question of law for the Court to decide and that, as such, the issue cannot be presented to the jury. Matthews' counsel maintains that the defendants can 'cite to no law to support' the position that a jury may be instructed on qualified immunity. Further, she avers that she has been unable 'to find any case out of the Fifth Circuit in recent years wherein the Fifth Circuit found it appropriate for a trial court to direct the issue to a jury.'. .These statements are, quite simply, baffling, and possibly knowingly untrue. At the final pretrial conference on May 3, 2018, the Court directed Matthews' counsel to Fifth Circuit Civil Pattern Jury Instruction § 10.3, which—interestingly enough—provides an instruction for district court judges in the Fifth Circuit to use when instructing a jury on the issue of qualified immunity. Had Matthews' counsel taken the time to peruse the pattern instruction and the notes that follow, she would have discovered a citation to McCoy v. Hernandez, 203 F.3d 371, 376 (5th Cir. 2000), a case in which the Fifth Circuit explicitly disagreed with the very argument she now espouses. Further, had Matthews' counsel exercised even a bit more diligence by, for example, reading McCoy or conducting a modicum of legal research, she would have found additional cases like Waganfeald v. Gusman, 674 F.3d 475 (5th Cir. 2012), Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791 (5th Cir. 1998), Presley v. City of Benbrook, 4 F.3d 405 (5th Cir. 1993), and Melear v. Spears, 862 F.2d 1177 (5th Cir. 1989), all of which make perfectly clear that the issue of qualified immunity may be decided by a jury in certain circumstances. What makes Matthews' counsel's objection all the more egregious, however, is the fact that she did not even need to look past her own filing cabinet to find recent case law in which a federal judge flatly rejected the arguments she raises here. Matthews' counsel served as counsel for the plaintiff in Hill v. Kilbourne, No. 11-778, 2015 WL 1143074 (M.D. La. March 12, 2015) (deGravelles, J.). In that case, she filed a virtually identical objection and memorandum in support. The Court referred to the pattern jury instruction on qualified immunity and cited McCoy and Waganfeald in overruling the objection. Nevertheless, Matthews' counsel bizarrely continues to insist that there is no legal authority to suggest that the issue of qualified immunity may be submitted to the jury in some cases. In support of her position, Matthews' counsel points the Court to Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249, 253 (5th Cir. 2010), in which the Fifth Circuit observed that '[w]hether an official's conduct was objectively reasonable is a question of law for the court, not a matter of fact for the jury.' This, Matthews' counsel argues, is the end of the matter: qualified immunity simply cannot be decided by the jury. Brown, however, cannot be read in a vacuum. Despite the seeming clarity of its language, Brown can easily be reconciled with cases like Melear, Presley, Snyder, McCoy, and Waganfeald, all of which openly anticipate that qualified immunity may sometimes be appropriately submitted to the jury and none of which Brown purported to overrule. . .In stating that objective reasonableness in the qualified immunity context is a question of law to be kept from the jury, the Brown court relied on Williams v. Bramer, 180 F.3d 699, 703 (5th Cir. 1999), which in turn relied on Mangieri v. Clifton, 29 F.3d 1012 (5th Cir. 1994). In Mangieri, the panel differentiated between those cases in which the facts are well-established and those in which there are 'underlying historical facts in dispute that are material to the resolution of the question[ ] whether the defendants acted in an objectively reasonable manner.'. . With respect to the former, 'the district court is to make a determination of the objective reasonableness of [an] official's act as a matter or law.'. . With respect to the latter, the district court may find itself 'unable to make the determination of the objective reasonableness of the officer's activities "without settling on a coherent view of what happened in the first place,"' in which case qualified immunity may be addressed by the jury. . . Taken together, this family of cases stands for a rather straightforward proposition. When 'there is general agreement as to the factual events that gave rise to [the] lawsuit,'. . . the issue of qualified immunity should be decided as a matter of law by the court via pretrial motion at the earliest possible stage. When, however, the underlying facts of the case are in dispute and the issue has not been decided before trial, qualified immunity may be sent to the jury.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Meadows v. City of Walker, 46 F.4th 416, 424-28, 431 (6th Cir. 2022) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("The objective reasonableness of the officer's conduct is a legal conclusion that courts decide. . . . While Graham laid the foundation for the reasonableness inquiry, it stopped short of explaining whether judge or jury makes that determination. . . True, the multi-factor totality-of-the-circumstances language resembles common-law negligence. And at common law, a jury generally evaluates whether a person's conduct meets the standard of reasonable care. . . But in Scott, the Supreme Court clarified the inquiry in excessive-force cases involving a denial of qualified immunity. . . .The majority's decision to proceed with the reasonableness inquiry didn't go unnoticed. Indeed, Justice Stevens in dissent argued that the jury should be the one to evaluate the officers' reasonableness. . . But the majority explicitly rejected that view, responding that 'at the summary judgment stage ... once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record,' the reasonableness inquiry is a 'pure question of law.'. .Thus, in Scott, the Supreme Court assessed reasonableness de novo by weighing the underlying considerations (balancing the use of force with the level of threat) de novo as well. . . Of course, it did so after determining the historical facts and drawing inferences in the nonmoving party's favor that the video evidence supported. This fact-finding and inference-drawing is the work of district courts, and, with a few limited exceptions, we don't disturb that work on appellate review. . . To be clear, all of this foundation is well-established and uncontroversial. . . . Like the threat posed by a suspect, Graham also mentioned that courts should consider whether a suspect is resisting arrest. . . So we also review that consideration de novo. . . .Turning to the case before us, the district court denied qualified immunity for Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt because it found that a reasonable jury could conclude that Meadows was not actively resisting arrest. And if Meadows was not resisting arrest, the court continued, it was excessive force for the officers to take him to the ground. But whether Meadows was resisting arrest is not a question for the jury, but a mixed question that courts resolve and that we review as part of our reasonableness inquiry. And in reviewing the video, the level of Meadows's resistance is either active resistance or, at a minimum, in a grey area between active resistance and non-resistance. As a result, the officers' use of force was objectively reasonable. But even if it weren't, I don't think our caselaw provided enough notice to the officers that they used excessive force. . . . . The district court is correct that the standard is objective reasonableness, and that video evidence helps courts determine reasonableness. But unless the parties dispute historical facts, the court erred in believing that question is one for a jury. So let's examine the factual disputes the district court found. For starters, the district court pointed to no historical facts that the parties dispute. Everything 'in dispute' was an inference the district court made from clear video evidence about what a jury could find. But since this is an interlocutory appeal, the majority feels bound by the district court's determination that a reasonable jury could conclude the officers didn't perceive Meadows as resisting arrest since 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.'. . . That said, the majority recognizes that an exception exists (but doesn't apply here) when the district court's determinations are 'blatantly contradicted by the record.'. . Putting that exception aside, we've recognized, regardless, that when video captures all the material facts, we review the facts as depicted by the video. . . And as mentioned above, we have clear video evidence of what happened here. So even if the video doesn't 'blatantly contradict' the district court's inferences, it does capture everything material and thus obviates any deference to the district court's inferences. Deferring to the district court's inferences is especially problematic when it comes to the level of Meadows's resistance because that's a determination that we make de novo. . . Take Officer Dumond's confusing instructions. The district court found that Meadows was 'trying to be respectful, trying to comply, and [wa]s confused about how to do it.'. . But this conclusion is based on the video. True, asking Meadows to stick his hand out the window and then open his car door was not the clearest way to convey the instructions. But after Meadows put his hand back in the car for the first time and was admonished for it, Officer Dumond instructs Meadows to open the door from the outside and not to put his hands back in the vehicle. As seen from the video, Meadows violates that instruction. The district court inferred from that same video that Meadows was trying to comply and lamented: 'What's the citizen to do?'. . In doing so, the district court contradicted Graham. Remember, the reasonableness of the use of force 'must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. .So what if the district court had considered Officer Dumond's perspective? You have a suspect who committed a 'moderate[ly] sever[e]' crime, . . . and who reached back into his vehicle after a clear instruction not to. And while Meadows may have been confused, so too was Officer Dumond. After all, Meadows told Officer Dumond his car was unlocked. . . With these facts, which were clear from the video, Officer Dumond's decision to take Meadows to the ground and end the stop as quickly as possible was reasonable. . . .Even if Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt violated Meadows's constitutional rights (and I don't think they did), there is no case that clearly establishes the unlawfulness of the officers' specific conduct at the time of the traffic stop. . .The district court erred in denying summary judgment to the officers. It left mixed questions for the jury to answer and drew inferences in Meadows's favor that found no support from the video. But above all, it did not find a case that would have provided notice to Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt that the force used to arrest Meadows was unlawful. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.")

Svenski v. Artfitch, No. 21-1391, 2022 WL 2826818, at *5 n.3 (6th Cir. July 20, 2022) (not reported) ("While conceding that 'we must view the facts in Sevenski's favor,' the dissent contends that the majority 'ignore[s] the undisputed record evidence that already favors Artfitch' and in 'form[ing] its conclusion by drawing inferences favorable to Sevenski, it fails to show how those inferences are supportable by the record.'. . But here the two versions of events differ substantially from each other, which requires courts 'to view the facts and draw reasonable inferences "in the light most favorable to the party opposing the [summary judgment] motion.''. . And 'the defendant must be prepared to overlook any factual dispute and to concede an interpretation of the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff's case.". . Thus, a jury could interpret the largely undisputed facts as either suggesting that Sevenski was dangerous, and therefore Artfitch's response was justified, or a jury could interpret those same facts as suggesting that Sevenski was not a danger to Artfitch. That is the ultimate determination and is to be made by the jury. Despite the dissent's multiple arguments that a jury could find for Artfitch, the governing standard for summary judgment requires us to view the facts and inferences in favor of Sevenski.")

Svenski v. Artfitch, No. 21-1391, 2022 WL 2826818, at *12-14 (6th Cir. July 20, 2022) (not reported) (Suhrheinrich, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The question here is whether an objectively reasonable officer standing in Trooper Artfitch's shoes would have been justified in using a modest level of physical force to gain control of the situation. It's a pure question of law, not of fact. . . . Remember what our task is here: to determine whether, considering the totality of the circumstances (in a light favorable to Sevenski but from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene without the benefit of hindsight), Artfitch used force that was objectively unreasonable as a matter of law. . . If facts material to that question are genuinely disputed, such factual issues must be sorted out by the jury. But where, as here, the parties agree on every fact material to the reasonableness question, we may not affirm the denial of qualified immunity and simply leave for the jury to decide what was reasonable. . . But rather than earnestly analyze the degree of force that Artfitch used, the majority punts that duty to the jury. . . .The majority says it must delegate this case to the jury because 'a jury would likely be confronted with the parties' differing interpretations of the same material facts.' But mere differing interpretations of the same facts does not morph those facts into jury questions—otherwise, summary judgment would never be properly granted. . . Consequently, what the majority treats as genuinely disputed factual questions—e.g., how Sevenski's statements could be interpreted, whether he walked aggressively or placidly, among others—are nothing of the sort. Rather, when faced with an unrestrained, disobedient, and aggressive (both verbally and physically) driver during a traffic stop on a dark road, any reasonable officer would be justified in (a) fearing for his safety, and (b) physically overcoming the suspect's resistance. That leaves only the amount of force used, and nothing suggests Artfitch used more force than necessary; even if it did, we generally defer to the officer's split-second judgment as to the amount of force necessary. . . All told, when considering the totality of the circumstances, Artfitch's arm-bar takedown did not constitute excessive force. . . . Even if Artfitch used excessive force, that violation was far from clearly established under our cases, so he is entitled to qualified immunity on that ground. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.'. . . The rationale is a practical one: police officers often 'must make split-second decisions in dangerous situations,' and they 'don't have the time to pull out law books and analyze the fine points of judicial precedent.'. . It follows that, because excessive-force cases turn '"very much on the facts of each case," ... police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . Put differently, we must start in these cases with the presumption of granting qualified immunity—and deny it only if a prior case squarely demands otherwise. . . Moreover, we may not retreat to the safety of mushy legalese—or abdicate the legal question of reasonableness to the jury—by denying qualified immunity merely because we think a jury could find that an officer's actions were 'unreasonable.' 'Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness.'. . But that's what the majority does here, repeatedly swapping obfuscation for clarity. For example, was any force objectively unreasonable here, or was only the degree of force unreasonable? Cryptically, the majority appears to say both. . . .The majority's most specific framing of the issue is that 'an objectively reasonable officer would have been on notice that throwing Sevenski to the ground with enough force to cause the significant injuries he suffered constitutes excessive force.'. . What's wrong with that? First, it's still too general. . . Second, no case cited by the majority or Sevenski (nor any that I can find) clearly establishes such a constitutional violation. In fact, our cases point in the opposite direction.")

P.I. & I. Motor Express, Inc. v. RLI Ins. Co., 40 F.4th 398, 414 (6th Cir. 2022) ("In the context of constitutional claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, for example, district courts have sometimes wrongly asked juries to resolve constitutional or qualified-immunity questions that the courts themselves should have decided. See, e.g., Gerics v. Trevino, 974 F.3d 798, 803–06 (6th Cir. 2020); Young v. Bd. of Supervisors of Humphreys Cnty., 927 F.3d 898, 904 (5th Cir. 2019); Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 859–62 (10th Cir. 2009); Ansley v. Heinrich, 925 F.2d 1339, 1347–48 (11th Cir. 1991). But that does not mean that appellate courts must require a new trial in all these instances. Rather, courts have often held that instructing the jury to make a legal conclusion was 'harmless' error.")

Gambrel v. Knox County, Kentucky, 25 F.4th 391, 404-05 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[T]he Officers do not contest our view of the law: that an unnecessary beating would have violated Mills's clearly established rights. They instead contest our view of the facts: that Hobbs's testimony would allow a jury to find such a beating. Relying on Scott v. Harris, . . . the Officers ask us to ignore his testimony on the ground that it is 'blatantly contradicted' by the rest of the record. . . The Officers are correct that they will have plenty of evidence with which to impeach Hobbs. Their testimony—not to mention the testimony of other bystanders—starkly conflicts with the account Hobbs gave at his deposition. In his night-of-the-shooting interview, moreover, Hobbs himself corroborated the account told by the other witnesses. At the deposition, however, Hobbs changed his story and suggested that he had lied to the police during their investigation because he was afraid of them. Yet simply because Gambrel might find it difficult to convince a jury to believe Hobbs does not allow us to ignore his testimony now. . . Under the Supreme Court's summary-judgment rules, we must 'believe[ ]' the nonmoving party's 'evidence' at this stage, . . and 'disregard' the moving party's conflicting evidence 'that the jury is not required to believe[.]'. . When witnesses tell differing stories, therefore, we cannot credit the story of the witness that we find more believable. . . That is the jury's job. . . .Circuit courts have debated Scott's scope. Is it limited to situations in which a witness's testimony blatantly contradicts unchallenged video evidence? . . . Or is it a specific application of a general rule that allows courts to disregard 'incredible' testimony on the ground that the testimony does not create a 'genuine' dispute of material fact under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56?. . . We need not enter this debate. Even under the broader view of Scott, Hobbs's deposition testimony is not so 'inherently incredible' as to allow us to disregard it now. . . Hobbs seemingly is a disinterested witness. And his testimony does not conflict with objective (and indisputably authentic) evidence like a video or audio recording; it conflicts with other witnesses' testimony. The Officers identify no case that has allowed courts to reject one person's sworn testimony as 'incredible' simply because other witnesses had a different recollection. In addition, some circumstantial evidence supports Hobbs's revised account. The Officers testified that they suffered no physical injuries during the confrontation, save a knot on Ashurst's leg. They also had only Mills's blood (none of their own) on their clothes. In short, this factual dispute about what happened is for the jury at trial—not for us at summary judgment.")

Gerics v. Trevino, 974 F.3d 798, 803-08 (6th Cir. 2020) ("We can review summary judgment denials that raise only '"purely legal" issues'—those that 'typically involve contests not about what occurred, or why an action was taken or omitted, but disputes about the substance and clarity of pre-existing law.'. . Because the historical facts are undisputed, Gerics urges us to find that the probable cause question in his civil suit falls within this exception to our usual rule. Defendants contend otherwise. Both parties find support in our caselaw. This court has inconsistently treated the ultimate question of probable cause in civil cases as both a question of fact for the jury and as a question of law for the judge. [citing cases] And in fact, other courts of appeals have not spoken with one voice on this question. [collecting cases] . . . . This confusion is not unfounded. The probable-cause question is a mixed question of fact and law that 'deal[s] with the factual and practical considerations on which reasonable people act,' and that question 'looks a lot like negligence, a classic jury question.'. . . [W]e conclude that the ultimate question of probable cause (separate from the determination of historical facts) in a civil case when the historical facts are undisputed is a question of law for the court and not a jury. . . At summary judgment, the district court in this case determined that the historical facts were undisputed. . . Nevertheless, the court reserved the ultimate question of probable cause for the jury. . . But given the lack of disputed, historical facts, under Ornelas, the court should have resolved the probable-cause question as a matter of law. The case, however, proceeded to trial. And, of course, as part of that trial, the parties presented the facts to the jury through witness testimony and exhibits. The jury, however, was not specifically asked to resolve any disputes of historical fact. That's not surprising here, given that there really weren't historical fact disputes for the jury to resolve—consistent with what happened at summary judgment. Again, given that posture, the trial court should have resolved the probable-cause question. Instead, the court instructed the jury on the concept of reasonableness and asked the jury to resolve that issue as part of its verdict in the case. But asking the jury to resolve any question beyond disputes regarding historical facts on the probable-cause question was inappropriate. The jury found in favor of Defendants. But that ruling is not on appeal. . . Gerics doesn't challenge it because he believes that the trial court shouldn't have given the case to the jury in the first place. But despite the fact that we agree with Gerics on all of that, we are still left with the question of whether we can review the trial court's denial of summary judgment consistent with Ortiz. We conclude that we cannot. Although the probable-cause question involves a legal determination, it is not the kind of pure legal question (like the interpretation of a legal document, for example) envisioned by Ortiz because it depends on the resolution of historical facts. In other words, a mixed question of law and fact is not the same as a pure legal question for purposes of applying Ortiz even if the factual record is undisputed at summary judgment. As courts have noted in other contexts, summary judgment records are not trial records. . . . To be sure, our case does not present this scenario but, suffice it to say, courts recognize that trial records and summary judgment records are not the same. To us, this strongly suggests that we should not extend Ortiz's exception (allowing review of pure legal questions) to mixed questions that depend on the determinations of historical facts—even if those facts appear undisputed at summary judgment. So we 'lack appellate jurisdiction over this portion of [Gerics's] appeal.'. . As for Gerics's unlawful-seizure argument, he does not argue that Hall lacked probable cause—independent of the probable cause needed for the arrest—for the unlawful seizure claim. Instead, Gerics's unlawful seizure argument on appeal rests entirely on whether Hall had probable cause to arrest Gerics that morning. . . So, we lack jurisdiction to review that claim as well.")

Hood v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 827 F. App'x 464, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Even if it was reasonable for the Officers to open fire, . . . that does not automatically clear the entire encounter of the Constitution's prohibition against excessive use of force. We have analyzed similar claims in segments and found some parts of police officers' actions to be reasonable and other parts to be unreasonable. . . . Applying a segmented approach to this situation, the question is whether 'the officers' initial decision to shoot was reasonable but there was no need to continue shooting.'. . .

Both Rosen and Bare said they stopped shooting when Green fell to the ground. In cases involving the use of deadly force, the deceased suspect is unable to tell what occurred, and '[a] court may not simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer. It must look at the circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story.'. . Several witnesses discredit the Officers' claim. . . . Considering the totality of the circumstances as explained by the multiple witnesses, including expert witnesses, the encounter between the Officers and Green is similar to the circumstances in Russo and Margeson, where the police continued to shoot even after the suspects were incapacitated, on the ground, and no longer safety threats. Genuine issues of material fact exist as to when the Officers stopped shooting at Green. This dispute is material to whether the Officers continued to shoot at Green after he was no longer a physical threat, in violation of Green's constitutional rights. Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Hood, the nonmoving party, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Officers' use of force in this context was unreasonable. . . . Our precedents provide 'fair warning' to the Officers that shooting at Green after he was no longer a safety threat is unconstitutional. Officers Rosen and Bare are not entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment.")

Hood v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 827 F. App'x 464, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Guy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the majority opinion except for the conclusion that there is a genuine dispute whether the officers continued to shoot at Green after a reasonable officer would have known that Green no longer posed a safety threat. The exchange of gunfire was brief, and the officers fired all of their rounds within a period of approximately five seconds. I cannot agree that the officers had time 'to stop and reassess the threat level' before the last shots were fired. . . In my view, no reasonable juror could find there was a point at which an objectively reasonable officer would have known that Green was no longer a threat. I would affirm the district court's judgment in full.")

Zuress v. City of Newark, Ohio, 815 F. App'x 1, __ (6th Cir. 2020) C("[I]n plaintiff's briefing, she concedes that the facts are undisputed. There cannot be a genuine dispute of material fact if no facts are disputed. Second, plaintiff argues that whether a use of force was reasonable is a question of fact. But in our circuit, whether a use of force was reasonable is 'a pure question of law.' Chappell v. City of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 909 (6th Cir. 2009) (quoting Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007)); see Dunn v. Matatall, 549 F.3d 348, 353 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The Supreme Court ... clarified the summary-judgment standard for excessive-force claims, rejecting the argument that the question of objective reasonableness is 'a question of fact best reserved for a jury.' " (quoting Scott, 550 U.S.at 381 n.8)). The testimony of plaintiff's experts on a legal question cannot establish a genuine dispute of a material fact.")

Henry v. City of Flint, 814 F. App'x 973, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("The legal question before us turns, with regard to Henry's false-arrest claim, on only one issue. Could any reasonable officer have thought Henry violated City of Flint Code of Ordinance § 31-12 (Disorderly Conduct and Disorderly Persons)? Answering that question, in turn, depends on another: Did a neighbor turn on a light in his house? If so, a reasonable officer standing in the shoes of the Flint police might have had probable cause to think the ordinance had been violated, and thus qualified immunity would attach. If not, then no reasonable officer could have thought that arresting Henry was constitutional. Because this fact question was not captured on video and is disputed in the evidence, we reverse and remand for a jury to make that determination. . . . Qualified immunity is an officer-friendly doctrine, designed to ensure that police, who have to make snap judgments to protect themselves and others in uncertain conditions, will not face undue Monday-morning quarterbacking from courts afterward. Qualified immunity therefore limits success in such suits to only those situations in which no reasonable officer, of all the universe of reasonable officers, would make a given decision. Review of a grant of summary judgment, on the other hand, is extremely friendly to the party that did not move for it, which in qualified immunity cases is often, but not always, the plaintiff, as here. Because juries, not judges, are supposed to be the trier of contested facts, and summary judgment involves a judge disposing of the case before it gets to a jury, summary judgment is reviewed taking all inferences as to facts that can reasonably be disputed in favor of the non-moving party. Only if that party's claim cannot survive even with every factual inference in his or her favor, do we uphold the district court's decision to terminate the lawsuit before it reaches a jury. As one can imagine, the interaction of the standards for qualified immunity and for summary judgment can cause courts considerable difficulties. In one situation, however, this tangle falls away, yielding a simple question. Consider a stylized hypothetical. A candidate for governor is giving a speech denouncing the incumbent, during which he is arrested by the state police. The police claim that they arrested him because, during the speech, the candidate drew a gun and shot a member of the audience. The candidate sues, stating flatly that no such thing happened and that the police arrested him because of his criticisms of the governor. There is no question that if the politician did in fact shoot someone, the police were justified in arresting him and therefore qualified immunity should shield them from suit. Alternatively, there is no question that if the shooting did not happen, the politician was the victim of an unlawful arrest redressable at law. Absent sufficient proof to resolve on summary judgment whether the shooting did or did not happen, this presents a question of fact for trial. The case, in other words, turns not on the question of qualified immunity, but on a question of fact predicate to the question of qualified immunity. . . .Such cases and their disposition reflect our longstanding rule that 'where the legal question of qualified immunity turns upon which version of the facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.'. . The question thus becomes whether our case fits into this scenario (which we will call the Brandenburg rule) in which qualified immunity either clearly applies or clearly does not, and which it is turns on a disputed question of fact. If this is such a Brandenburg rule case, remand for trial is appropriate. For while the legal question is clear either way (qualified immunity either would or would not attach), the factual question predicate to qualified immunity remains unclear. We now turn to examine whether this is such a case. . . . We hold that there is a genuine issue as to these facts, and so qualified immunity must be denied [as to false arrest claim] at this stage. . . . Although we again emphasize that our ruling is not a judgment on the ultimate state of facts, only that questions of fact remain, nevertheless the officers are not, at this stage, entitled to qualified immunity. We therefore reverse on this point. . . . Henry's handcuffing claim is a closer call. We have clearly established law that '[t]he Fourth Amendment prohibits unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing during the course of a seizure.'. . . Under our circumstances, in which Henry's complaints were indistinct, the need to get him some water was pressing, the station was near, and the officers had a very upset arrestee, qualified immunity at the very least attaches to the officers as regards the handcuffing claim. Thus, the handcuffing claim cannot survive independently, though if the arrest is found unlawful, the handcuffing may form part of the damages as regards the arrest.")

Hernandez v. Boles, 949 F.3d 251, 257-58 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The Hernandez-Plaintiffs argue that the stop was legally improper because the Troopers 'were using a traffic stop as a pretext to fish for evidence of other crime.' It is well established, however, that police officers may stop a vehicle that commits a traffic violation and look for evidence of a crime, even if the traffic stop is merely a pretext and they do not have an independent reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. . .To be sure, the Hernandez-Plaintiffs were free to argue to the jury that the Troopers impermissibly extended the traffic stop by checking a second database or waiting 20 minutes to call BLOC because they were trying to uncover evidence of a crime. But Trooper Boles's admission that he was interested in ferreting out crime rather than merely issuing traffic tickets does not alter the Fourth Amendment analysis. It remains the case that an officer's subjective intent is generally immaterial; the stop, by contrast, is unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the duration of tasks incident to the traffic stop or 'beyond the time reasonably required' to address the traffic violation. . . .Certainly, the jury could have found that it was unreasonable to continue to detain the Hernandez-Plaintiffs after the initial warrant check of Hernandez and Betancourt came back negative because that was not necessary to carry out the traffic stop—especially given that no ticket was being written—or that the Troopers were unreasonably dilatory in waiting 20 minutes to call BLOC. But the Hernandez-Plaintiffs cite no authority mandating such a determination as a matter of law. And though the delay caused by checking two different databases is troubling, the Hernandez-Plaintiffs point to no bright-line rule that officers are limited to checking one database for warrants during a traffic stop. Whether the traffic mission was (or should have been) over by the time the dog arrived was a question properly submitted to the jury. In sum, the jury assessed all the facts and arguments and determined that the Troopers did not unreasonably prolong the traffic stop. The district court correctly determined that the question of whether the Troopers impermissibly prolonged the traffic stop was reserved to the jury. Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the Troopers, as we must, we cannot say that the Hernandez-Plaintiffs have met the high burden of showing that the jury's verdict was unreasonable as a matter of law. We therefore affirm the denial of the Hernandez-Plaintiffs' Rule 50(b) motion for judgment.")

Jones v. City of Elyria, Ohio, 947 F.3d 905, 917 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Jones, Weber and Chalkley employed excessive force in arresting Jones. By their own admission, the two officers tackled Jones to the ground, placed their weight on top of him, employed 'closed fist strikes' on his arms and sides, punched him in the face, and then tased him. They likewise concede that, when they first arrived on the scene, they were not investigating a crime. In fact, they had little more than a vague, generalized suspicion that Jones might be a threat to himself or others. And as these events unfolded, Jones says he neither resisted nor made any attempt to escape, while repeatedly asking the officers to stop. On Jones's version of the facts, these actions were objectively unreasonable. . . Of course, whether Jones was actually offering resistance or attempting to escape is critical to this matter's ultimate resolution. That factual dispute appears to be one for a jury to resolve. . . .It is well established that an officer may not use more force than is necessary to effectuate the arrest of a suspect who offers no resistance. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Jones, the force Weber and Chalkley employed against Jones appears to have been unnecessary, as the district court concluded. Whether the events truly unfolded this way, however, is not for us to decide at this stage.")

Bey v. Falk, 946 F.3d 304, 334-35 (6th Cir. 2019) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("This case is not about what my colleagues believe may have transpired on the evening of March 16, 2013. It is about whether a reasonable jury could determine that Defendants violated Bey's constitutional rights. As explained above, a jury could find that Defendants violated Bey's clearly established equal protection and Fourth Amendment rights by surveilling, investigating, and stopping him without any objective justification and solely because of his race. But in granting summary judgment to several of the officers who followed and stopped Bey despite having zero evidence of wrongdoing, the majority usurps the role of the jury and imposes its own misguided view of the facts. Even worse, the majority employs novel and indefensible legal reasoning that substantially and unjustifiably narrows the scope of the Equal Protection Clause. And, most egregiously, the majority turns a blind eye to race-based policing that violates the constitutional rights of black and brown Americans. I therefore dissent.")

Thames v. City of Westland, 796 F. App'x 251, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("The fundamental dispute here is whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Thames for her statements, but more specifically whether Thames's statements were 'true threats.' In a simplified sense, if they were 'true threats,' the officers had probable cause to arrest Thames and they win; if not, they arrested Thames without probable cause and she wins. Both sides insist this is not a question of fact for a jury but a strictly legal decision for the court. They are wrong. . . . Because Thames's false-arrest claim turns on this disputed question of fact for the jury to decide, the district court properly denied her motion for summary judgment on that claim. But whether that claim survives for trial is dependent on whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. And qualified immunity is different. . . .[T]he qualified-immunity question does not require a decision that the statements were or were not true threats, but only a determination of whether the officers' (even mistaken) belief that the statements were true threats was unreasonable. Moreover, because the dashcam videos provide the relevant facts, the panel does not need to defer to the district court's fact finding or construe inferences in favor of the non-moving party (Thames); the panel can decide for itself whether 'the events recorded on the tape justified the officers' conduct.'. . Because Thames does not raise as a genuine issue of material fact whether she made the statements as Parsley represented, but only contends that those statements could not be true threats, we accept here that she forewarned of a bombing of the Clinic building in the near future. She initiated the conversation with Parsley, the security guard, and, though perhaps coincidentally, made the statements to him when and where no one else could hear them. Afterwards, she refused Parsley's attempts to photograph her and immediately drove off, which was reported to the police even though she did return, explaining that she had gone to use the restroom. Parsley reacted as if he believed her, prompting the call to 911, identifying and accusing her for officers at the scene, and completing a written statement. . . And we see for ourselves in the video Thames's evasiveness and refusal to answer the direct and repeated question of what she had alternatively said to Parsley. . . Based on this, Sgt. Brooks's decision to arrest Thames for making a true threat was not unreasonable. The officers were entitled to qualified immunity on Thames's false-arrest claim.")

Butler v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 936 F.3d 410, 418-19 (6th Cir. 2019) ("By applying Franks to § 1983 claims in Vakilian, we implicitly recognized that, while police officers sometimes make mistakes, only 'deliberate falsehood ... or reckless disregard for the truth' should make an officer ineligible for qualified immunity. . . This gives an officer 'breathing room' to do her job. . . We must also remember that search warrants 'are normally drafted by nonlawyers in the midst and haste of a criminal investigation.'. . Implicit in Vakilian's demanding standard is the recognition that a police officer swearing out an affidavit can make mistakes and yet remain protected by qualified immunity. . . To overcome this immunity, a plaintiff must present 'substantial' evidence to show a more culpable mental state. Butler has not met this exacting standard. And even were we to indulge the assumption that he had, he has not shown that the warrant, when stripped of the false claims, would fail to establish probable cause. He has thus failed to meet either Vakilian prong.")

Butler v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 936 F.3d 410, 425-29 (6th Cir. 2019) (Merritt, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent as to the majority's conclusion that Butler has not made a 'substantial showing that [Benitez] stated a deliberate falsehood or showed reckless disregard for the truth,'. . . regarding the wrongful search of Butler's home at 12011 Bramell in Detroit. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Butler, as we must, a jury could find that Butler made the necessary substantial showing, and we should affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Benitez. The district court was correct to send the issues to the jury. The jury may find that the Fourth Amendment . . . has been seriously abridged in this case. . . . A jury could find that Benitez falsified the claim of observing the entry into Butler's home. We cannot say how it happened that Benitez drafted and was able to get a magistrate to approve a search warrant based on the erroneous and confusing affidavit, but we do not need to. At summary judgment, we do not decide the facts. What matters at this stage is that, accepting the account most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that Benitez's affidavit was drafted with, at the very least, a reckless disregard for the truth. A jury should weigh Butler's and Benitez's credibility and decide the issue. This 'is the epitome of a triable issue of fact, one over which our authority recedes and the jury's takes over.'. . .The facts surrounding this search, viewed in a light most favorable to plaintiff, are sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that Benitez acted with at least reckless disregard for the truth, and that there was no probable cause to search plaintiff's home. . . . Qualified immunity is not warranted for what is at best Benitez's irresponsible conduct, or, at worst, his deliberate falsehood in including an address in his affidavit for which he had no evidence of drug activity. If this case does not rise to the 'substantial showing' necessary to pass the Franks standard as articulated by the majority, it is difficult to imagine what evidence a homeowner could produce that would redress the serious Fourth Amendment violation suffered at the hands of a rogue police officer armed with a warrant as confusing and error-filled as the one here. While the majority wishes to chalk Benitez's affidavit up to mere sloppiness, a genuine issue of fact remains as to Benitez's state of mind and credibility. Because a triable issue of fact exists on Benitez's credibility concerning whether the faulty affidavit demonstrates a 'deliberate falsehood' or 'reckless disregard for the truth,' and whether the affidavit would support a warrant when stripped of the false information, I dissent.")

Vanderhoef v. Dixon, 938 F.3d 271, 279, 281 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[A]t the time of the confrontation defendant should have been on notice that his particular conduct was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Our precedent, as well as that of other courts in this circuit and our sister circuits, establishes that, without additional provocation, a plain-clothes officer may not hold at gunpoint an unarmed citizen suspected of a mere traffic violation. And there was no such provocation here. . . . In sum, and taking these cases together, at the time of this accident and confrontation defendant should have known that pointing his gun at plaintiff—a nonfleeing teenager whom he did not reasonably suspect of any prior crime beyond speeding and reckless driving—and holding him at gunpoint for roughly two minutes, violated plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, viewing the evidence presented at trial in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the jury was permitted under these facts to answer 'no' to the jury verdict form's question: 'Was [defendant]'s show of force objectively reasonable?' Given our deference to the jury's role in determining the facts and applying them to the law, Reeves, 530 U.S. at 151, 120 S.Ct. 2097, and our general view of the evidence in favor of the nonmoving party in qualified-immunity cases, Champion, 380 F.3d 893, 900, we conclude that the evidence presented to the jury was sufficient to overcome defendant's qualified-immunity defense. The district court's contrary ruling in granting defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law was in error.")

Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App'x 385, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e make no factual findings here. Instead, 'when the legal question of immunity is completely dependent upon which view of the facts is accepted by the jury, the jury becomes the final arbiter of a claim of immunity.'. . And at this early stage, we must accept Osberry's version of the arrest as true. Thus, Osberry was not actively resisting arrest when the Officers removed her from the vehicle and tased her. The Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . To be sure, we are deciding only that the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on a motion under Rule 12. This is an important point. At the pleadings stage, we must decide whether the complaint states a plausible claim that the Officers violated Osberry's clearly established constitutional rights. . . Considering only the complaint, this is an easy case: the Officers violated Osberry's rights when they forcibly removed her from the vehicle (with no probable cause to do so), threw her against the vehicle, and applied a taser to her stomach (even though she was not resisting arrest). But Osberry's complaint does not necessarily tell the full story. And if we consider the Officers' answer, this case potentially becomes more complicated because Osberry drove into the middle of 'an active crime scene that involved a barricaded subject who was potentially dangerous.'. . In other words, Osberry's clearly established rights—and the reasonableness of the Officers' conduct—may be tougher to determine if the Officers were actually dealing with an active crime scene and a dangerous, barricaded subject. At summary judgment, the Officers can establish these facts and will be free to raise the same argument.")

Harris v. Klare, 902 F.3d 630, 638, 641-43 (6th Cir. 2018) ("The parties agree that Klare was summoned to the scene after the initial stop and after the decision to summon the drug dog had been made by other officers, and Harris has presented no evidence that Klare actively participated in the investigation of the minivan. The question here, then, is whether a reasonable jury could infer that after arriving at the scene, Klare became aware that there was, at most, only a reasonable suspicion of drug activity and that she also became aware that the drug dog had failed to alert on the minivan prior to her search of Harris. Only if no reasonable jury could find that Klare knew both of these facts prior to the search is she protected by qualified immunity. Factual determinations of this sort are generally best left to the jury, and so it is here. Klare's uncontroverted deposition testimony was that when she arrived at the scene, she spoke with other officers about 'their investigation' and that, although she could not remember specifically what the officers told her, they had said that 'they had seen some things that they believed could be consistent with the possibility of a meth lab or some other drug activity.' Given that Klare was at least aware that the suspicion was based on having seen items in the minivan, and that she was in the vicinity of the minivan and the investigating officers, a reasonable jury could infer that she became aware of the basis of the suspicion, either by viewing the minivan herself or through discussion with the investigating officers. Nor can we say that a reasonable jury could not infer that Klare knew that the drug dog had failed to alert to the presence of contraband. Although the record contains no direct evidence regarding whether Klare observed the drug dog's inspection of the vehicle or was informed as to the results upon its conclusion, it does reveal that the relevant events all occurred within a small area and that Klare was within that area. The alerting of a drug dog to contraband, or the lack thereof, is an easily observable act in which Klare would have been quite interested, and a reasonable jury could infer that, standing nearby as she was, Klare observed the drug dog's activity. We conclude therefore that there is a sufficient factual basis on which a reasonable jury could find that Klare is unprotected by qualified immunity. Although the facts are disputed, Harris has sufficient proof from which a reasonable jury could find that at the time of the search, Klare did, in fact, know that the drug-dog's sniffing was completed, that the search of the minivan had failed to indicate the presence of any drugs, and that there was no other lawful basis to detain Harris. . . .When a minor, untutored in her Fourth Amendment rights, seized for over an hour and in the presence of numerous armed police officers, with her arms secured behind her back and facing the choice of consenting to a search or being kept from the restroom, fails to resist that officer's search of her person, a reasonable jury could find that this non-verbal consent was not voluntarily given. . . .That a reasonable jury could find that Harris's consent was involuntary does not entail, of course, that a reasonable jury could find that no reasonable officer in Klare's position could be mistaken about that fact. . . .That the facts surrounding Klare's search of Harris do not precisely match those in Beauchamp does not prevent our holding that a reasonable jury could find that Klare is unprotected by qualified immunity. Police officers are sometimes 'forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving,' and we must adjudge those decisions 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . But the situation in which Harris and Klare found themselves was neither tense, nor uncertain, nor rapidly evolving, and we ought not require a jury to be overly deferential to the decisions made by Klare that day. Because a reasonable jury could credit Harris's account of events, they could find that Klare unreasonably searched her without her voluntary consent and that Klare is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

McGee v. Knolton, 736 F. App'x 105, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Knolton 'must be willing to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts.'. . We thus exercise our jurisdiction to hear Knolton's appeal accepting McGee's version of the facts. 'However, where the legal question of qualified immunity turns upon which version of the facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.' [citing Pouillon v. City of Owosso] . . . .Knolton points to one undisputed fact that he argues entitles him to qualified immunity: the short time between his visual identification of McGee's vehicle and Stewart radioing 'shots fired.' Knolton argues that because he faced a 'tense and highly uncertain' situation and 'only had mere seconds to make a life or death decision,'. . . his conduct was reasonable as a matter of law. However, eyewitnesses testified that there was a pause of several seconds between Knolton's first two shots and his second set of three shots. Even assuming arguendo that Knolton's initial shot was reasonable, that does not mean his fifth shot was as well. . . Additionally, '[e]ven a split-second decision, if sufficiently wrong, may not be protected by qualified immunity.'. . We lack jurisdiction to resolve factual disputes. . . and must view the facts in the light most favorable to McGee: i.e., that the officers did not identify themselves as law enforcement; that McGee was at all times turning to the right, and away from Knolton, to exit the parking lot; and that McGee was driving slowly as Knolton walked twenty-three feet beside the vehicle and then shot McGee through the side window. If the jury believes Plaintiff's version of the facts, Knolton's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, the district court did not err in denying summary judgment.")

Knowlton v. Richland County, Ohio, 726 F. App'x 324, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("These facts put the Court in the unusual situation where the testimony of all three deputies involved in the deadly shooting contradicts the objective facts of that event. . . Because Brian Garber was unarmed and produced no 'pop,' the Court can only conclude that one of the deputies fired the first shot and that none of the deputies fired in response to any gunshot sound from Brian Garber. Thus, each of the deputies is either mistaken or lying about shooting in response to a gunshot sound from Brian Garber or otherwise. This is not a question of law for the Court, but a question of fact and credibility for a jury to decide. . . We agree. We lack jurisdiction to resolve factual disputes, . . . and we must view the facts in the light most favorable to Knowlton: i.e., that although the Officers did not perceive that deadly force was necessary, one of the Officers nevertheless shot Garber, and the other Officers fired in response to that Officer's shot. . . The record contains adequate evidentiary support for Knowlton's theory, under which Garber's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force was violated. . . . Pollard and Simmonds are both distinguishable. In both cases, the officers' belief that they faced immediate danger did not rest only on indications that Bynum and Simmonds were armed; the belief also rested on Bynum's and Simmonds' menacing gestures, which were reasonably interpreted as demonstrating an intention to shoot. In the absence of that indicium of immediate threat here, the Officers point to the 'pop' sound as the factor precipitating the shooting. However, because Garber did not have a gun, and investigators were unable to find a source or explanation for the 'pop' or 'bang,' whether the Officers actually heard the sound, and whether it was coming from Garber, as opposed to one of their fellow Officers or some other source, are disputed material facts that preclude summary judgment. . . .Given the Officers' testimony that the threat Garber posed was not imminent and did not justify using deadly force until the Officers heard the 'pop' sound, together with the evidence that one of the Officers fired at Garber without hearing any sound, the district court did not err in in denying summary judgment on the qualified immunity issue.")

Wesley v. Campbell, 864 F.3d 433, 441-42 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Rigney contends that the district court did not provide adequate instructions on the defense of qualified immunity. Specifically, Rigney proposed that the jury be instructed that '[i]f you find that Officer Rigney could have reasonably believed that probable cause existed based on the content of her warrant application, then you will find in her favor on the unlawful arrest claim.' She also proposed the following special verdict: 'Considering Instructions 6 and 7, do you find that Officer Rigney could have reasonably believed she had probable cause to apply for a warrant for Mr. Wesley's arrest?' The district court denied both proposed instructions. The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Rigney's motion for a new trial based on the omission of this jury instruction, because qualified immunity is a question of law to be determined by the judge. Pouillon v. City of Owosso, 206 F.3d 711, 718 (6th Cir. 2000). 'Questions of fact may be relevant to this determination, but the ultimate question is one of law: if the finder of fact determines that the officers undertook certain actions, could any reasonable police officer have believed that those actions did not violate [the plaintiff's] constitutional rights?'. . . Further, Rigney's proposed instructions are inconsistent with the objective nature of the qualified immunity analysis.")

Jackson v. Washtenaw County, 678 F. App'x 302, 307-09 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Based on the evidence before us, a reasonable officer on the scene could have believed that Jackson was actively resisting and no longer suffering from the Taser-induced shock. Although we assume the truth of the non-moving party's evidence, as the district court below noted, Plaintiff submitted no 'other witnesses' statements to the contrary' and '[t]he expert reports ... do not go to whether Mr. Jackson was resisting at the time he was arrested.'. .The closest evidence that Plaintiff provides is her expert's report that states 'Mr. Jackson was struggling for his life, not against the deputies' and that a 'person being Tased thrashes around from pain and the inability to breath[e].' That report relies entirely on the police and hospital reports for its factual basis, and cannot create new evidence from the old. It can, of course, suggest the best reading of that evidence for Plaintiff that we may adopt when reviewing a motion for summary judgment, but conclusory statements are insufficient. Jackson's initial physical reaction to the Taser was to lock up and become immobile. The deputies realized that this state was a result of the tasing and reacted sympathetically and helpfully. But when Jackson's status changed and he began to pull against their grip to bring his arms forward, the deputies believed that he had '[re]gained control of himself.' Then, minutes later, Jackson began to 'thrash[ ] around.' If Jackson was still, or once again, reacting to the shock of the first Taser, it would not have been 'objectively apparent to a reasonable observer.'. . The third tasing took place fifteen seconds later, after continued struggling on the floor. The record before us shows that the Taser was used contemporaneously with Jackson being rolled onto his stomach. Unfortunately, Jackson is not available to provide his account, which may or may not have differed from that in the police reports and the audio tape. We have found in other cases that the accounts of the plaintiff or a witness can sustain a case beyond summary judgment where a court might have been compelled to grant qualified immunity based solely on the facts given by the reporting officers. . . But based on the facts provided, even in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we cannot say that the force used was unreasonable. . . . Shortly after this Taser use, Jackson moved his head toward Farmer's trapped arm and attempted to bite her. She punched Jackson in the jaw to prevent the bite. Farmer's actions were reasonable given there existed probable cause to believe that harm was imminently threatened. . . The fourth and final use of a Taser came just over a minute after the third tasing. By this time, the deputies had managed to secure one of Jackson's hands by handcuffing it to his belt. But Jackson continued to pull away from the deputies. Urban tased Jackson again before Farmer and Reich were able to handcuff Jackson's right arm to the other pair of handcuffs on his left arm. We have found that where resistance continues, repeated attempts to induce compliance are permissible. . . Thus, there is no genuine issue of material fact that the actions taken by Defendants were reasonable responses to the resistance (real or perceived) made by Jackson, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Washtenaw County, 678 F. App'x 302, 309-13 (6th Cir. 2017) (Donald, J., dissenting) ("Accepting as true the facts presented by Plaintiff, as we must when faced with a motion for summary judgment, I believe that there remain material issues of fact as to whether Jackson actively resisted and whether the Defendants' actions were reasonable. I would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment as to the excessive force claim, and remand the case for further proceedings. I respectfully dissent. . . .As the majority correctly notes, the Fourth Amendment clearly establishes the right to be free from excessive force. What is less clear is whether an individual, who becomes incapacitated by taser-induced effects and subdued, has a constitutional right to be free from subsequent tasings; and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of this incident. . . . I agree with the majority that the major question presented in this case is whether Jackson actively resisted arrest. Where we part ways is with the finding that the record conclusively shows that Defendants' continuous tasing of an already-incapacitated and pinned-down suspect was a reasonable response to the resistance they perceived. . . .[A] jury could conclude that Jackson's uncontrollable convulsions, as described by Defendants, caused him to only passively resist the officers after he was tased. This case does not appear to be the type of case that lends itself to a summary review of a police incident report to yield a one-sided conclusion as to whether a suspect actively resisted arrest. The fact that Jackson was suffering from taser-induced effects at the moment he started resisting is telling as to his volitional capacity to resist, which, as Plaintiff argues, creates a question of fact for a jury. . . .As the majority notes, we do not have testimony from decedent Jackson describing, in his own words, which movements he could and could not control as we have had in previous cases. Regardless, considering the facts of the incident in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, both the expert report and the timing of Jackson's resistance are sufficient to suggest that Jackson may not have been actively resisting arrest. Therefore, I cannot agree that the interaction at issue follows the typical course of active resistance that would justify multiple tasings. . . . This Court's precedent denouncing the use of excessive force on subdued and involuntarily resisting individuals has dated back to at least 2002. . .Therefore, a reasonable officer would have known that repeatedly tasing someone who had already exhibited all the signs of being incapacitated and in distress would violate the right to be free from excessive force. Defendants could not have reasonably believed that their repeated tasings of Jackson, after recognizing Jackson's dire need for medical assistance and pinning him down, was not wrong. This is not a case where the evidence is so objectively compelling that no reasonable juror could believe Plaintiff. The Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence for a jury to rationally determine that Defendants used excessive force against Jackson and should be denied qualified immunity. . . This case is not as clear-cut as the majority would make it seem. The record viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, Jackson, demonstrates that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to the reasonableness of Defendants' decision to continuously tase Jackson. For this reason, I respectfully dissent.")

Pennington v. Terry, 644 F. App'x 533, 548-51 (6th Cir. 2016) (Karen Nelson Moore, J., dissenting) ("I would hold that there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the use of force was excessive, that appellant has not waived his argument on appeal, and that neither officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The majority's error is in treating the videotape as if it depicts all details clearly such that the majority can simply view the videotape, compare it to Pennington's version of the incident, and conclude that the videotape forecloses his claim. . . .What the majority has done is make its own factual determinations. And in making these determinations, the majority has overlooked the genuine disputes of material fact that the videotape creates. Because it is not clear whether the taser touched Pennington or whether he reacted to it, these questions deserve to go to a jury. It is not our place to decide them. Taking the evidence, blurry as it is, in the light most favorable to Pennington, the majority should have concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Harris's taser touched Pennington and that Pennington reacted with two cries. The videotape is far too unclear and Pennington's claim far too nuanced for the videotape to warrant summary judgment.")

Withers v. City of Cleveland, 640 F. App'x 416, 422 (6th Cir. 2016) ("In light of its holding that Zola committed no constitutional violation, the District Court did not reach the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis, and the City of Cleveland made no arguments regarding this prong on appeal. Although we only decide the issue before us, we emphasize that the law was clearly established that an officer may not use deadly force against a suspect unless 'the officer has probable cause to believe the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Because there are disputes of fact that relate directly to this issue, it appears that Zola cannot establish that he is entitled to qualified immunity based on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. In Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S.Ct. at 1866, the Supreme Court explained that a court should not resolve disputes of fact in the qualified immunity analysis, just as our court observed in Lopez v. City of Cleveland, quoted in the introductory paragraphs of the opinion.")

Withers v. City of Cleveland, 640 F. App'x 416, 428 (6th Cir. 2016) (Griffin, J., dissenting) ("For all the majority's efforts at manufacturing disputed issues of fact, the record makes two things unalterably clear: (1) officers stopped instructing Withers to come out as they proceeded to search the basement, and (2) Zola acted quickly in response to a suspicious movement by a potentially armed fugitive. I would hold that under the totality of the circumstances, which include a suspected armed and dangerous felon lying in wait in a dark basement making a sudden and unexpected movement without announcing an intention to surrender, Zola acted reasonably in using deadly force. I would therefore affirm the district court's decision to grant Zola summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Ortiz ex rel. Ortiz v. Kazimer, 811 F.3d 848, 851-54 (6th Cir. 2016) ("On appeal, the officers concede (quite refreshingly) the relevant facts for immunity and summary-judgment purposes: that Kazimer 'slammed' or 'tackled' a 'surrendered' suspect, then 'pinned' him down while Crisan watched nearby. . . We consider each claim against each officer in turn. . . . This use of force was clearly established as excessive before 2010. The just-cited cases support the point, as do many others saying that the gratuitous use of force against a suspect who has 'surrendered' is 'excessive as a matter of law.'. . .These facts may have justified the use of some force against Juan. But they do not justify the amount of force allegedly used here. Kazimer's purported level of force—slamming Juan (rather than, say, grabbing him) and pressing Juan against the hot car for fifteen minutes (rather than, say, removing him from the scene)—rises to the level of clearly excessive for summary-judgment purposes. . . . Kazimer adds that much of what the eyewitnesses purported to see is unlikely. Could Kazimer actually have slammed a disabled boy half his size against an SUV? Could he actually have pressed him against the hot car for fifteen minutes, even after giving the 'ALL OK' signal to the police dispatcher? We have wondered the same thing. But the eyewitness accounts aren't 'blatantly contradicted by the record,' and that means we cannot disregard them on summary judgment. . . We thus follow the time-tested Civil Rule 56 standard, accept the eyewitness accounts, and affirm the denial of Kazimer's qualified immunity defense. . . .It is well to remember that the officers may not have done anything wrong. They may have diligently pursued an armed-robbery suspect, used a reasonable amount of force in a chaotic situation to detain him, and eased up seconds later once they found out he did not commit the robbery. That's exactly what their testimony suggests, and they will have the chance to give their version of events to a jury. But because we must accept the plaintiffs' evidence-supported story at this stage of the case, we agree with the district court that the officers do not deserve summary judgment on these claims.")

Lopez v. City of Cleveland, 625 F. App'x 742, 747 (6th Cir. 2015) ("'This Court has established that summary judgment is inappropriate where there are contentious factual disputes over the reasonableness of the use of deadly force.'" Sova v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 142 F.3d 898, 903 (6th Cir.1998). Thus, where the reasonableness of the officers' use of force depends on which version of the facts one accepts, 'the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.'. . In this case, there are contentious factual disputes about the nature of Lopez's movements just before the shooting. Those disputes go to the heart of whether it was reasonable for Defendant Officers to use deadly force. Because the reasonableness of their actions depends on which version of the facts one accepts, the question must go to the jury. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Defendant Officers on Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Newman v. Twp. of Hamburg, 773 F.3d 769, 772-73 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Newman responds that only a jury may make the probable cause determination. He is half right. If he presents sufficient evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to find that no probable cause existed for his arrest, he indeed may take his claim to a jury. But the point of Civil Rule 56 is to prevent claims from going to a jury when the court, after drawing all inferences in favor of the non movant (here Newman), determines that no reasonable jury could make such a finding. That is this case. Where the requisite material facts are not in dispute, as is true here, probable cause 'retains its legal character' and must be decided by the court. . . As shown, ample uncontradicted evidence supported Newman's arrest and prosecution for murder. In this instance, no reasonable jury examining all the evidence—the guns, the hair, the walkie-talkies, the drug connection—could find that the authorities lacked probable cause. Newman persists that the Sixth Circuit's habeas decision based on insufficiency of the evidence shows that probable cause did not exist. But this argument conflates two standards of proof—the modest requirement that probable cause exist to prosecute someone and the stringent requirement that proof beyond a reasonable doubt exist to find him guilty. . . The court granted Newman's petition because, without more evidence placing him at the scene of the crime, reasonable doubt remained. . . To be sure, the panel said the evidence amounted only to a 'reasonable speculation' Newman was present. . . But, contrary to Newman's reading, this was not a reference to the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonable suspicion' standard. Read in context, the panel was referring to reasonable doubt in the sense of whether the State had met its burden of establishing proof beyond a reasonable doubt of Newman's guilt—the only issue before it. In a malicious-prosecution action, however, reasonable doubt is not the question. . . 'Because there is no requirement that the defendant to a malicious-prosecution charge must have evidence that will ensure a conviction, not every failed criminal prosecution will sustain a subsequent malicious-prosecution suit.'. . That perfectly describes Newman's case. Our prior opinion held only that there was insufficient evidence to convict Newman beyond a reasonable doubt. It said nothing about probable cause.")

Cook v. Bastin, 590 F. App'x 523, 529 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The closest the police reports come to implying that Hatter was on top of Campbell is Wallace's statement that Hatter was 'on' Campbell's back. . . Dickey's ADC report uses similar language. . . The Estate assumes that being 'on' Campbell's back unequivocally means that Hatter was on top of Campbell. It could mean that, but it could also mean that Hatter was off to Campbell's side with his arms wrapped around Campbell's waist and his body hovering above Campbell's back. Wallace's and Dickey's statements simply do not establish what the Estate wants them to establish. If all the record contained were statements about Hatter being 'on' Campbell, we might be inclined to find a genuine dispute. But these statements are not all we have to rely upon. The depositions make clear that while Hatter was 'on' Campbell, he was not lying on top of Campbell or pressing his weight into Campbell. Hatter testified that he was kneeling on the floor, holding Campbell by the waist. . . . Dickey's testimony also places Hatter near Campbell's waist and confirms that Hatter did not place his body weight on Campbell. . . Smith testified that Hatter was on his knees with his arms wrapped around Campbell and that Hatter was not on top of Campbell. . . Lastly, Wallace testified that Hatter was not on top of Campbell. . .In short, there is no evidence to suggest that the officers or Hatter were on top of Campbell, as the accounts consistently place them kneeling and squatting beside Campbell.")

Cook v. Bastin, 590 F. App'x 523, 532 (6th Cir. 2014) (White, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The district court improperly found as fact that 'the officers positioned themselves in a way that they were not applying direct pressure to Campbell's back or blocking his airways,'. . . when the evidence on that point was conflicting. Several hours after the incident, Officer Bauman, who had arrived on the scene after Defendant Smith, stated that Hatter was 'straddling' Campbell and 'holding his shoulders to the ground.'. . Defendant Smith stated on the day of the incident that Hatter 'bear hugged Mr. Campbell holding him to the floor.'. . And Defendant Wallace stated that Hatter 'was on Campbell's back, Officer Smith was holding Mr. Campbell's feet, and I was knelt down on the blanket holding Mr. Campbell's right shoulder. Mr. Campbell was struggling harder and harder to get up.'. . Summary judgment was improper given the conflicting testimony regarding whether weight or pressure were applied to Campbell's back as he lay in prone restraint.")

Standifer v. Lacon, No. 14-3055, 2014 WL 5286618, at *4-6 (6th Cir. Oct. 16, 2014) ("Standifer finally alleges that Lacon performed an unconstitutional 'takedown' on her after she kicked him in the groin. The district court disagreed, relying on the dash-cam video to find that Standifer actually just lost her balance and fell after kicking Lacon. . . For us to affirm on this ground, the video would have to unequivocally show that Standifer merely fell and was not pushed down—so unequivocally, in fact, that any reasonable jury would necessarily conclude that Standifer fell down on her own. . .The video is not so unequivocal. Rather, a reasonable jury could accept either side's story: Lacon may have pushed Standifer down; or she may have merely fallen. It matters not what we would conclude if we were jurors; it only matters that reasonable minds can differ. And they can. Thus, the video here, unlike the one in Scott, does not 'utterly discredit[ ]' Standifer's side of the story, . . . and the dispute over whether Standifer was in fact pushed down is not for us to decide. We must instead adopt Standifer's plausible version of the facts as we ordinarily do in this context, and, after doing so, we must assume that Lacon pushed her to the ground. But a point Standifer seems to miss: 'Not every push ... violates the Fourth Amendment.'. . Standifer barely addresses this part of Lacon's argument. . . Assuming arguendo that Standifer was pushed down, the question of whether Lacon's conduct was 'objectively reasonable' is a pure question of law for us, as judges, to decide. . . . Even if Lacon pushed Standifer to the ground, it was objectively reasonable to do so. Although serious injury resulted, the video shows that Lacon did not slam, shove, or throw Standifer to the ground; at most he guided her down by pulling her arms up and pushing the rest of her body down—a reasonable response after being kicked in the groin. . . . . No case that Standifer cites or that we found changes this conclusion. Her cases all deal with police 'slamming' people—even when they did not resist. . . . Thus, unlike some other Sixth Circuit cases, there are no 'factual disputes' as to whether Standifer 'posed a threat or actively resisted arrest . . . she undisputedly did. As a matter of law, none of Lacon's actions violated the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments.")

Cass v. City of Dayton, 770 F.3d 368, 373-74 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Cass asserts that summary judgment was improper under Tolan v. Cotton, which held that where material facts are disputed—when, for example, there is contradictory testimony concerning a fact—a court must resolve that dispute in favor of the nonmoving party at the summary judgment stage. . . Unlike in Tolan, the material facts in this case are not disputed; this dispute centers on whether those facts, when viewed in Cass's favor, amount to a violation of Jordan's clearly established constitutional rights. This type of dispute is apt for disposition at summary judgment because the only question is whether the defendants were entitled to judgment as a matter of law.")

Margeson v. White Cnty., Tenn., 579 F. App'x 466, 471-73 (6th Cir. 2014) ("In the instant case, the issue is not whether the Officers' use of deadly force was reasonable in the first instance—it is undisputed Mr. Margeson pointed a rifle at them from his front door, and that any objectively reasonable law enforcement officer in that situation might fear for his own life and respond with deadly force. The issue, rather, as the district court correctly observed, is whether the amount of force used was reasonable, given the allegation that the Officers continued to shoot Mr. Margeson after he no longer posed any reasonable threat, and given the evidence suggesting that as many as 43 shots were fired at Mr. Margeson between the three officers. . . . Appellants argue that 'Plaintiff [has failed] to establish any proof that Mr. Margeson was shot while incapacitated or while he no longer posed a threat.' We disagree. Among other things, the proffered evidence in this case includes two independent reports suggesting that the Officers fired 43 shots at Mr. Margeson and an audio recording of the incident that undermines the Officers' deposition testimony about the sequence of events after the initial volley of shots. While the number of shots fired is not itself dispositive, the large number in this case is certainly relevant, since a jury could reasonably infer that Mr. Margeson became incapacitated, and was therefore unable to pose a threat after having been shot with the first few bullets. . . We do not intend to suggest that any number of shots is categorically reasonable or unreasonable; our reasonableness analysis hinges on the totality of the circumstances. We acknowledge, however, that such a high number of shots factors into those circumstances. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Margeson, a jury could certainly conclude that shooting at a man 43 times, including at least 12 shots after he had fallen to the ground, amounts to an unreasonable and excessive use of force, under the circumstances described here. A jury could also conclude, on the other hand, that the Officers' actions were reasonable, based on Mr. Margeson's alleged failure to surrender, even after having been shot down. Either way, there are disputed facts at issue that only a jury can properly decide. Based on the disputes on the timing and sequence of the shooting in the recording which, when viewed favorably to Mr. Margeson, seem to suggest that at least twelve additional shots were fired at Mr. Margeson after he had fallen to the ground with multiple gunshot wounds, the district court was correct to conclude that the reasonableness of the Officers' actions was a question of fact that should be submitted to a jury. The factual disputes in this case including the total number of shots fired, the circumstances that led the Officers to continue shooting at Mr. Margeson, and whether the Officers continued to shoot at him after any reasonable threat had dissipated—are critical to the ultimate reasonableness inquiry. Accordingly, because the law regarding use of force is clearly established, and because genuine issues of material fact abound in this case, summary judgment is not appropriate.")

Sheffey v. City of Covington, 564 F. App'x 783, 796 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Essentially, in each of the cited cases, while the reviewing court took the mental illness of the arrestee into account, the totality of the circumstances was considered with regard to the reasonableness of the force utilized by the arresting officers. We acknowledge that, pursuant to Champion, the mental illness of Mr. Hughes should be considered to some extent, but it also appears clear that the district court did consider this from the viewpoint of what the officers knew and could perceive at that time of the incident. The officers' actions cannot be said to be unreasonable based upon the mental illness or perceived mental disturbance of Mr. Hughes, due to the fact that Mr. Hughes was known to be armed in a school zone with children present, that he consistently acted as if he was reaching for his waistband, that he attempted to flee the area, and also that he violently physically resisted arrest. . . . For the foregoing reasons, the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the responding officers is AFFIRMED.")

Sheffey v. City of Covington, 564 F. App'x 783, 796-99 (6th Cir. 2014) (Donald, J., dissenting) ("Let us recall, for a moment, that a man is dead; that the cause of his death was the use of 'electrical stun devices,' or tasers, by three different officers, at twelve different times, in five undifferentiated minutes. Recall that eight of those times occurred in less than one minute and that one officer alone used his taser on the man six times. Neither the two officers who originally joined that officer, nor the two others who later arrived, interceded on the man's behalf. Recall further that the man was fifty-two years old. Let us consider that the deceased was mentally ill; that he had lived alone in Covington, Kentucky for twenty-five years with no arrests, indictments, or convictions. Consider that in responding to a 911 call about his unusual behavior, police officers failed even to notice the deceased, much less to register him as a threat, and drove benignly by him without stopping despite his six-foot, six-inch, four-hundred-pound frame. Only after a second call did police officers finally search out, repeatedly shock, and forcefully subdue Leroy Hughes. The suspected crime that precipitated their conduct was a misdemeanor. Let us bear in mind that when police officers encountered Leroy Hughes, he did not appear armed—the misdemeanor at issue was, after all, concealment. Yet upon encountering him, the officers asked no questions. Instead, the encounter that ended in a man's death began with an order to get on the ground, issued by an officer crouching behind a car door with his gun drawn. Bear in mind that only after officers had delivered more than 14,400 volts to his body, driven him to the ground, and shackled his arms and legs did they 'sp[eak] to [Leroy] Hughes in an effort to find out his name and other identifying information[.]'. . Let us acknowledge the obvious tension between the inference that Leroy Hughes sought to flee and the fact that he 'took several fast-paced steps' toward one of the officers. . . Even assuming that Leroy Hughes sought to flee, quickness was not likely a defining characteristic of his six-foot, six-inch, four-hundred-pound frame. Acknowledge the irony in the representation that Leroy Hughes 'violently resisted arrest' when he had not fully turned to view the second officer who shocked him before he was tackled by two or three others. Acknowledge further that his lone attempt to use any of the ordnance later recovered from his pockets—a handgun, a speed loader, four magazines, two boxes of ammunition, assorted loose bullets, and a knife—came after the first two of the twelve taser shocks and consisted of his throwing a box of ammunition at an officer as he stated that the handgun was not loaded. . . . If we recall, consider, bear in mind, and acknowledge the totality of the circumstances that led to the death of Leroy Hughes, we cannot fail to recognize that it is error to affirm the grant of summary judgment in favor of the officers who seized him. We who sit in relative safety behind a bench, garbed in black robes and guarded by federal marshals and county sheriffs sworn to protect us, must never forget 'that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force necessary in a particular situation.'. . . That Leroy Hughes was allegedly armed, mentally ill, and in the vicinity of two elementary schools is a searing indictment in an age framed by horrific tragedies in Aurora and Columbine, Colorado; Tucson, Arizona; and Newtown, Connecticut. And combined with his uncommonly large size and continuous reaching toward his waistband, it is little wonder that police officers found it necessary to intervene. Less clear, however, is whether the officers' chosen intervention, which resulted in the death of Leroy Hughes, was reasonable. For as much as the deaths in Colorado, Arizona, and Connecticut thread the tapestry of rapidly evolving circumstances that police officers must consider, so, too, do the deaths of Amadou Diallo, Sean Bell, Oscar Grant, and Jonathan Ferrell. And while a hundred reasonable arrests may go unmentioned for every egregious exception, we cannot ignore the seeds of systemic inequalities sown in our Nation's history and lain bare by diligent review. [citing Floyd v. City of New York] Nor can we fail to mourn the bitter fruit those seeds have spawned, even as we strive to root it out. Leroy Hughes may have been confused, due to his schizophrenia, rather than resistant or non-compliant. This is a factor that the trier of fact must weigh along with all the other evidence. . . When confronted by police, Leroy Hughes, who moved toward, rather than away from, an arresting officer, may or may not have attempted to flee. Although Leroy Hughes carried considerable concealed ordnance, he neither threatened nor attempted to use it. And any violence attributable to Leroy Hughes appears to have been precipitated by, rather than having provided a reason for, the use of force against him. But Leroy Hughes is dead. Whatever actually happened on December 3, 2008, the determination of the facts on which the reasonableness of the police officers' conduct in this case depends is reserved for the jury, as the finder of fact. . . And even assuming a definite set of facts, until all inferences have been drawn in favor of Leroy Hughes, whether the officers' conduct was reasonable remains, itself, a material question of fact. . . My colleagues in the majority fail to respect the role that the jury should play in this matter and, consequently, endorse the usurpation of that role in the face of genuine issues of material fact. Because I cannot reconcile such an endorsement with the distinct roles of the trial judge and the jury, I respectfully dissent." footnotes omitted)

Krause v. Jones, 765 F.3d 675, 681 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The concurrence questions the officers' decision to enter the bedroom with their weapons set to fire automatically. But it is not clear why. Krause had shown no concern for his own safety or that of others and had threatened many times to shoot the officers if they entered. Once Krause delivered on his threat and fired at Officer Jones, all agree that Officer Jones could reasonably fire back and could keep firing 'until the threat [was] over.' Plumhoff, 134 S.Ct. at 2022. And all agree that nothing in the record suggests that Officer Jones kept firing even after he knew Krause no longer posed a threat. If it is true that officers may fire '15 shots' in a '10–second span' when the suspect is not even shooting at the officers, as Plumhoff allowed, id., it must be true that officers may return fire with an automatic weapon when they are being fired upon. Indeed, Krause does not argue that, accepting that Krause shot at Office Jones, Officer Jones could not respond with shots from an automatic weapon. Not one of the cases cited by the concurrence contradicts this rule. The concurrence adds that 'There was no need for Matthew Krause to die.' We agree and have considerable sympathy for his family. But as the record confirms, the reason Matthew Krause died was that he fired first. Officer Jones had every right in such a dangerous situation, proved dangerous the minute he entered the room, to engage the automatic-fire function on his gun before entering the room and to use it after entering the room and being fired upon. The plaintiffs offer no evidence, case law, custom or anything else that says otherwise.")

Krause v. Jones, 765 F.3d 675, 682-85 (6th Cir. 2014) (Marbley, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I write separately . . . to express my disagreement with the court's conclusion that it was reasonable for Officer Jones to shoot Krause twenty times. . . The majority flatly announces that the number of rounds fired by Jones 'flow[ed] from the reasonable decision' of the officer to engage the automatic-fire function of his weapon. . . I find such a decision to be neither reasonable nor inevitable. The majority notes that, if an officer is justified in firing, he may continue to fire until the threat has ended. . . But this analysis ignores any consideration of the decisions—and the reasonableness thereof—made by police in the run-up to their entrance. Indeed, the majority has no trouble concluding that, after waiting ten hours for Krause to exit his house, waiting a minute longer was unnecessary. True, the majority concedes, 'the plan did not end well.'. . But the majority appears to sanction the officers' conduct in arriving with blood and thunder, detonating a flash bang despite the fact that Krause was sleeping, and pre-engaging the automatic-fire modes on their weapons, thereby ensuring that a single trigger pull would result in a fusillade. . . .Once Krause fired, it is clear that the officer's decision to return fire was reasonable. But surely this court is able to question also the pre-shooting conduct by law enforcement. [collecting cases that consider pre-shooting conduct] If officers had decided, for example, to carry with them a grenade launcher, or call down a strike from a Predator drone, or take other actions which recklessly created excessive risk, this court would be justified in asking whether officers acted unreasonably in their preparations. . . It is equally appropriate that we inquire why officers were justified in entering with their weapons set to fully-automatic fire. I cannot accept the blind conclusion that this action was reasonable. What is more, it is deeply troubling to see that, before launching their raid against the sleeping Krause, police considered other options, including the truly outrageous possibility of 'using the SWAT team's tank to bring down the exterior wall of the bedroom and to seize Krause in that way.'. . This deliberation is disturbing not for the fact that police opted for a different choice, but because such a shockingly militarized option was even a consideration in the apprehension of a low-level drug dealer. In comparison, the officers' choice merely to use fully-automatic rifles, riot shields, and flash-bang grenades seems almost reserved. . . . This court cannot condemn the actions of officers 'from the peace and safety of [our] chambers with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . . But it is equally incumbent on us, in discharging our duty to 'say what the law is,' that we craft a jurisprudence that will empower officers to eliminate a threat while still encouraging them to preserve life. . . . There was no need for Matthew Krause to die. Despite his threats that he might 'come out shooting,' as officers prepared to enter his bedroom he was asleep, posing a danger to no one. In facing such a suspect, police must do more than merely select from an array of deadly options that threaten an unreasonable risk of death—at least when safer, simpler options remain. It is not our duty to second-guess law enforcement. But is emphatically our duty to ensure that the law reflects our society's commitment to saving lives, not meaninglessly taking them. For these reasons, I respectfully concur in part and concur in the judgment.")

Simmonds v. Genesee County, 682 F.3d 438, 446, 447 (6th Cir. 2012) (Merritt, J., dissenting) ("The court predetermines the facts of this case by finding as a fact that Kevin Simmonds yelled, 'I have a gun' and pointed a silver object out of the window as though he were firing a pistol at the five officers who had his truck blocked. . . These so-called 'facts' on which it upholds the summary judgment are very much contested by the parties. They are the most crucial, contested facts in the case. The police officers testified as a unit that they believed Kevin had a silver gun because he had his hands and arms extended in a firing position out of the driver's side of the truck and appeared to be pointing a shiny object at one of the officers. They testified that, at that point, two of the officers immediately opened fire and killed Kevin. The problem is, of course, there was no gun at all. The officers and the court respond that Kevin must have been pointing his cell phone at them out of the window. But this seems highly unlikely because the cell phone was found resting inside the truck on the seat, not where it would have dropped from Kevin's hands when he was killed. At least one officer conceded that any weapon would likely have fallen onto the ground outside the driver's side door of Kevin's truck. A neutral fact finder could easily find that there was no gun and no threat of deadly force. As to the officers' claim that Kevin yelled, 'I have got a gun,' our court finds as fact that this statement was made but was 'inaudible.' But two facts could easily lead a jury to find that the officers' claim is false and that its falsity completely undermines the defense. . . .Based on the clarity of these other sounds, it is unlikely that the victim ever said he had a gun. But this issue is not for me to decide or for the court to decide because it is a classical example of a factual issue for the jury. Anyone who listens to the audio recording could certainly doubt that the officers are telling the truth. They may have simply invented a story in order to claim that they were in mortal danger. It would not be the first time police have invented such a defense. We should not just accept as gospel the word of witnesses who have a strong motivation to lie when other evidence calls their veracity into question. The question for the jury is whether the claimed "I have a gun" statement was 'inaudible,' as the majority argues, or simply 'invented' falsely by the officers as a defense. There is a second piece of evidence that weighs strongly against the majority's 'inaudible' thesis. Officer Shanlian, a sixth officer, who remained back down the farm road near the Simmonds' home, some 400 feet away, testified that he also heard Kevin's 'I have a gun' statement. Kevin's voice would have carried through trees at least the distance of a football field for Shanlian to hear it. If Kevin's voice was that loud, it seems highly unlikely that the statement could have been "inaudible." More likely, it was simply invented. Thus, I would reverse and remand the case for trial. Our Court's effort to predetermine the facts in favor of the officers and prevent a trial of the case is inconsistent with the Seventh Amendment and our long, common law tradition of calling on juries to resolve factual disputes. This principle is particularly important when an individual is killed by state officers and the issue is one of whether there was a gross abuse of governmental power. Judges, like others, are sometimes predisposed to believe what they want to believe, but we should resist that temptation here and let the jury decide after the parties have fully developed the case. At present, the case remains a puzzle. Why did the police rush so quickly, aggressively, and impulsively to hem Kevin in, surrounding him like an animal with guns drawn? Why was his family back at his house not allowed to intervene to avoid such a confrontation? Were reasonable steps taken by the police to consider the situation carefully and avoid shooting a man who was perhaps mentally ill and, in fact, unarmed? These are relevant questions unmentioned by the majority that would be better considered by the jury after the full development of the case by competent counsel.")

Green v. Throckmorton, 681 F.3d 853, 866, 867 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Green was pulled over for committing two fairly common traffic violations, Throckmorton did not claim to have seen or smelled any drugs or alcohol during the stop, and Green was able to substantially complete all the field sobriety tests given to her except for the HGN test—and her performance on that test cannot be ascertained from the video because her back was facing the camera. These differences, when combined with Green's seemingly rational behavior during the stop, could lead a jury to conclude that there was no probable cause to arrest Green for driving while impaired and that Throckmorton was plainly incompetent in thinking that there was. We understand, of course, the difficulty inherent in making on-the-fly determinations regarding possible driving impairments, just as we recognize the severity of drunk driving and 'the potential consequences of an incorrect call had [Green] ultimately proven to be impaired.'. . But this difficulty and these consequences always exist when an officer stops someone for a traffic violation. Yet officers do not have free rein to administer field sobriety tests to whomever they please and then to arrest that person for making the slightest misstep while performing the tests. Whether that is what happened in this case is a question for the jury.")

Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249, 253 (6th Cir. 2010) ("If the defendant's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, the court then asks whether qualified immunity is still appropriate because the defendant's actions were 'objectively reasonable' in light of 'law which was clearly established at the time of the disputed action.'. . Whether an official's conduct was objectively reasonable is a question of law for the court, not a matter of fact for the jury.")

McKenna v. Edgell, 617 F.3d 432, 439-43, 445 (6th Cir. 2010) ("We conclude that whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity depends on whether they acted in a law-enforcement capacity or in an emergency-medical-response capacity when engaging in the conduct that McKenna claimed violated the Fourth Amendment. . . If the officers acted as medical-emergency responders, then McKenna's claim would amount to a complaint that he received dangerously negligent and invasive medical care. Under a function-dependent view of Peete, if any right to be free from such unintentional conduct by medical-emergency responders exists under the Fourth Amendment, it is not clearly established. . . If the defendants acted in a law-enforcement (e.g., investigative or prosecutorial) capacity, however, McKenna's claim does not 'look[ ] like a medical malpractice claim,'. . rather, his claim is that he was subject to an unreasonable seizure and search. It is certainly clearly established that police violate the Fourth Amendment when they handcuff people whom they neither suspect of criminal wrongdoing nor believe to be a danger to themselves or others. . . . We stress that whether the officers acted as law enforcement or as medical responders is an objective inquiry. . . It is not relevant, therefore, whether Officers Edgell and Honsowetz had a law-enforcement or a medical-response intent; the focus must be on what role their actions reveal them to have played. . . . The issue is then whether this objective determination of the role that the officers played at McKenna's home is for the jury or for the court. . . We hold that it is properly a jury question because 'the legal question of immunity is completely dependent upon which view of the [disputed] facts is accepted by the jury.'. . . The dissent insists that the ultimate characterization of the historical facts found by the jury–that is, whether the conduct looked like law-enforcement or medical-emergency-response work–is a legal question for the court. One complication with this approach is that we have sometimes reserved for the jury determinations that appear to be legal in civil-rights suits under the Fourth Amendment. The reasonableness of officer conduct in excessive-force cases is a question for the court. Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n. 8 (2007); Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 99 (2005). But we ask the jury to determine whether a set of facts amounted to exigent circumstances. . . And, inconsistently, we have at times asked the jury and at times reserved for the court the issue of whether a set of facts provided officers with probable cause. . . . It may be questioned why we have assigned some Fourth Amendment inquiries in civil suits to the court and others to the jury, but we need not reach into that thicket to resolve the instant case. The objective question in this case involves a highly factual characterization, not a legal concept at the center of Fourth Amendment law like reasonableness in the use of force, exigent circumstances, or probable cause. The law enforcement/medical-emergency responder distinction matters only in the narrow class of cases in which Peete [v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville & Davidson County, 486 F.3d 217, 219 (6th Cir.2007)] might bar suit. And while this question involves more than determining what acts took place, juries are often asked to go beyond the finding of historical facts and to make objective characterizations in their role as factfinders. . . . We also hold that even if the question of the officers' objective role is viewed as a question for the judge and not the jury, qualified immunity still does not apply. On the most plaintiff-friendly view of the facts that could have been found by the jury, we too conclude that the officers acted in a law-enforcement capacity. . . . We could hold as a matter of law that police officers who are dispatched to a location by a 911 call for medical attention–a fact emphasized by the dissent–always act in a medical-response capacity, regardless of the other facts in the record. This proposal would be an illogical and dangerous rule. It cannot be that an officer receives Peete protection simply because he was invited to the scene of a medical emergency. This proposition overlooks the possibility that an encounter that begins as medical in nature may evolve into one that is investigatory. More importantly, such a rule would give officers who respond to 911 calls free rein to rifle through callers' homes in search of incriminating evidence and to physically abuse callers in ways unrelated to anyone's safety. We decline to immunize misconduct of this sort; instead, we allow this case to stand on the judgment of the jury, in whose hands qualified-immunity cases that turn on disputed facts have traditionally rested.").

McKenna v. Edgell, 617 F.3d 432, 446, 447 (6th Cir. 2010) (Rogers, J., dissenting) ("I agree that the relevant inquiry in this case is whether, viewed objectively, the actions of Officers Edgell and Honsowetz indicated that they acted as law enforcement officers or as emergency medical responders. Because the nature of the officers' actions is a mixed question of law and fact, this court should review the legal aspect of that determination de novo. Under de novo review, Officers Edgell and Honsowetz acted as emergency medical responders, and thus they are entitled to qualified immunity. Officers Edgell and Honsowetz are entitled to qualified immunity if their activities, objectively viewed, indicate that they were acting as medical responders as opposed to law enforcement officers. . . The jury's determination does not control the legal aspect of this issue. The Supreme Court has held: In determining whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred we draw all reasonable factual inferences in favor of the jury verdict, but as we made clear in Ornelas v. United States, [517 U.S. 690, 697-99 (1996)], we do not defer to the jury's legal conclusion that those facts violate the Constitution.")

Jefferson v. Lewis, 594 F.3d 454, 461-63 (6th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, Officer Lewis asserts that he saw a person standing in the doorway with a hand holding something shiny outstretched toward him and, at the same time, saw a flash that he believed to be a muzzle flash from a gun. Jefferson, however, asserts that her hand never left the doorknob, that there is no evidence of a car passing that could have produced the flash, and that there was no ambient light source that could have produced the flash. We believe that whether Officer Lewis had probable cause to believe that he was in danger of serious harm turns, in large part, on the resolution of this factual dispute. Because Jefferson has produced adequate evidentiary support for her version of events and because we must accept her version of events as true for purposes of this interlocutory appeal, we agree with the district court that the jury must decide whether Jefferson's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. . . . The second Katz inquiry is whether the right was clearly established and whether Officer Lewis's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of that clearly established right. In other words, in light of the undisputed facts and viewing any factual disputes in the light most favorable to Jefferson, was Officer Lewis's decision to fire at the individual standing in the doorway objectively unreasonable in light of a clearly established right to be free from deadly force? In this case, this turns on whether (a) Officer Lewis actually did see a flash in the doorway that he believed to be a muzzle flash from a gun and, (b) if so, whether that belief and his response were reasonable. If the answer to those two questions is an unequivocal 'yes' even under Jefferson's version of events, then Officer Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether there was a constitutional violation. However, absent an unequivocal affirmative, the question of qualified immunity must be submitted to the jury. . . . In light of the competing inferences one might draw from [the] facts and their effect on the question of whether Officer Lewis's actions were objectively unreasonable, we agree with the district court that the jury should find the facts that determine whether Officer Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Based on the record as it currently stands, we find that the district court did not err in denying Officer Lewis qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. My colleagues concur in this conclusion but not necessarily in the full opinion. We therefore AFFIRM the district court's decision and REMAND this case for trial.").

Dunn v. Matatall, 549 F.3d 348, 352-55 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Although conceding that the videotape is an accurate account of the events surrounding the arrest, Dunn argues that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the Officers because the question of whether the Officers used excessive force should be answered by a jury. . . . The Supreme Court recently clarified the summary-judgment standard for excessive-force claims, rejecting the argument that the question of objective reasonableness is 'a question of fact best reserved for a jury.' . . . Dunn does not contest the events as seen on the video, and, in fact, asserted at oral argument that the video must control. Instead, Dunn argues that a jury must watch the video and decide whether the Officers used excessive force. This argument, however, is directly contradicted by Scott, which instructs us to determine as a matter of law whether the events depicted on the video, taken in the light most favorable to Dunn, show that the Officers' conduct was objectively reasonable. . . .Considering the Graham factors, from the Officers' perspectives on the scene and not using hindsight, we conclude that the video shows that the Officers acted reasonably in attempting to neutralize a perceived threat by physically removing Dunn from his vehicle after he led Officer Matatall on a car chase and then appeared to refuse the Officers' commands to exit the car. . . . Overall, given the heightened suspicion and danger brought about by the car chase and the fact that an officer could not know what other dangers may have been in the car, forcibly removing Dunn from the car to contain those potential threats was objectively reasonable. Contrary to Dunn's suggestion, nothing in our opinion today gives officers carte blanche to use unjustified force every time a suspect flees. Officers may use only an amount of force that is objectively reasonable under the circumstances, and there is no indication that the Officers did anything other than just that.")

Phillips v. Roane County, Tenn., 534 F.3d 531, 539 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The district court concluded that the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry–whether the Estate had shown a constitutional violation–and the merits of Phillips's deliberate indifference claims were identical, since both concerned the reasonableness of the correctional officers' conduct in light of the circumstances the officers faced. On this basis, the district court found summary judgment based on qualified immunity inappropriate. . . But we believe that the district court erred in deferring the qualified immunity analysis to the jury. . . . [I]n a suit against government officials for an alleged violation of a constitutional right, the court–not the jury–must consider the 'threshold question' of whether 'the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right.' . . We review de novo whether those facts as alleged by the Estate establish a prima facie case of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, and whether that right was clearly established.")

Carpenter v. Bowling, No. 07-3100, 2008 WL 1931360, at *5 (6th Cir. May 2, 2008) ("The resolution of Carpenter's excessive-force claim in the end turns on several genuine issues of material fact, including at a minimum these: Was Carpenter walking toward, cursing at or otherwise threatening Kirby at the time of her arrest? Did the officers repeatedly body slam or crush Carpenter against the van and jerk back unreasonably hard on her arms? And did Carpenter resist the arrest or the officers' attempt to handcuff her? '[W]hen the legal question of immunity is completely dependent upon which view of the facts is accepted by the jury, the jury becomes the final arbiter of a claim of immunity.' Bouggess v. Mattingly, 482 F.3d 886, 888 (6th Cir.2007) (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted).").

Humphrey v. Mabry, 482 F.3d 840, 846 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The issue of qualified immunity may be submitted to a jury only if 'the legal question of immunity is completely dependent upon which view of the [disputed] facts is accepted by the jury.'").

Sell v. City of Columbus, 127 F. App'x 754, 2005 WL 742745, at *10(6th Cir. Apr. 1, 2005) ("Given this conflicting evidence, we have a case where 'the jury becomes the final arbiter of [the officer's] claim of immunity....' . . . Qualified immunity is ultimately a question of law properly addressed by the judge, but a jury trial is nonetheless necessary where, as here, 'the legal question of immunity is completely dependent upon which view of the facts is accepted by the jury.' . . The question before us is complicated, however, by the fact that the district court did in fact conduct a jury trial on the plaintiffs' claims against the City of Columbus. In that trial, the jury was explicitly asked whether the plaintiffs' due process rights were violated and, in particular, whether 'an emergency existed, and [whether an] immediate vacation of the premises [was] necessary to protect the plaintiffs' health and safety....' The jury returned a verdict for the city, unanimously agreeing that the Code Enforcement Officers did not 'violate Plaintiffs' constitutional due process rights by ordering an immediate vacation of the premises .' In light of this finding by the jury, the question becomes whether the grant of qualified immunity was harmless error. . . The jury considered the same question with regard to the City of Columbus as it would have considered with regard to the Code Enforcement Officers. Its implicit finding that the defendants had demonstrated that 'an emergency existed, and [an] immediate vacation of the premises [was] necessary' leads to the conclusion that the individual defendants were indeed entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. The district court's grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants, in sum, was erroneous. But in light of the jury's verdict in favor of the City of Columbus, we conclude that the grant of qualified immunity was a harmless error.").

Hale v. Kart, 396 F.3d 721, 728 (6th Cir. 2005) ("When no material dispute of fact exists, probable cause determinations are legal determinations that should be made by a court. . . . All of these Sixth Circuit cases stand for the proposition that a jury trial is appropriate where reasonable disputes of material fact exist on facts underlying a probable cause determination. However, where only one reasonable reading of the facts is possible, i.e., where the facts that relate to probable cause are not in dispute, the question of probable cause retains its legal character and should be decided by the judge. We admit that some of these Sixth Circuit cases are confusing and many of the factual recitals in them do not lend themselves to a clear understanding of exactly what facts were in dispute. Nevertheless, the rule that probable cause is a legal question seems clear. If disputed factual issues underlying probable cause exist, those issues must be submitted to a jury for the jury to determine the appropriate facts. Similarly, with qualified immunity, a court can submit to the jury the factual dispute with an appropriate instruction to find probable cause and qualified immunity if the factual inquiry is answered one way and to find probable cause and qualified immunity lacking if the inquiry is answered in another way. However, the jury does not decide whether the facts it has found are legally sufficient to amount to probable cause or entitlement to qualified immunity.").

Sallier v. Brooks, 343 F.3d 868, 873 (6th Cir. 2003) ("The determination of whether particular kinds of correspondence qualify for the constitutional protection accorded a prisoner's 'legal mail' is a question of law properly decided by the court, not one of fact that can be submitted to a jury. . . Had the court found certain correspondence to be constitutionally protected legal mail, it should then have granted qualified immunity on any claims involving those items of correspondence that the defendants could have opened without violating constitutional rights that were clearly established at the time and of which a reasonable person would have known. . . After dismissing the claims for all correspondence that was either not legal mail or for which the defendants had qualified immunity, the court should have submitted the remaining claims to the jury for a verdict on the factual dispute of whether such correspondence was actually opened outside of Sallier's presence.").

Vakilian v. Shaw, 335 F.3d 509, 517, 518 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Where qualified immunity is asserted, the issue of probable cause is one for the court . . . . Only where the evidence creates a genuine issue of material fact should the matter proceed to trial. Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we find there is no dispute of material fact as to the events leading up to Vakilian's arrest.")

Fisher v. City of Memphis, 234 F.3d 312, 317 (6th Cir. 2001) ("While the issue of qualified immunity normally rests with the court, in cases arising under the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard the applicability of qualified immunity will often turn on the resolution of contested factual issues. . . . In this case, the district court charged the jury to consider whether Officer Taylor's use of deadly force had been objectively unreasonable; that is, to resolve the continuing factual dispute as to the car's behavior as it came towards Officer Taylor. There was no error in such instructions.").

McCloud v. Testa, 227 F.3d 424, 432 (6th Cir. 2000) ("As the district court repeatedly noted, there may remain trial issues as to whether the plaintiffs' positions actually do or do not fall outside the Branti exception. Once those questions have been decided, if Testa is not saved by a Branti exception, he may still be entitled to a verdict in his favor if, based on the jury's factual findings, the court determines he could not have reasonably known he was violating a given plaintiff's rights." citing Pouillon).

Boyd v. Baeppler, 215 F.3d 594, 599, 602-04 (6th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he issue that is material here is not whether Boyd was fleeing, but whether Boyd pointed his weapon at the officers and thus posed an immediate threat to them. The district court did not address this issue at all. . . . Whether Boyd actually fired the weapon is wholly immaterial here. The issue is whether or not he threatened to do so. . . . That the defendants did not see or hear Boyd fire the weapon does not affect whether the police officers, acting reasonably under the circumstances known to them, acted in defense of their own safety and the safety of officers through the use of deadly force. . . . The question of law on this case is clear–it is about the conduct of police acting in self-defense, not about pursuit of a fleeing felon or suspect, reasonably thought to be armed and dangerous. . . . The speculation of plaintiff's expert is not sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact. In view of the uncontroverted evidence in support of the testimony of both officers Baeppler and Wilsman, any jury conclusion to the contrary would necessarily be founded on mere speculation, not on the evidence. Therefore, we REVERSE the denial of summary judgment for both officers Baeppler and Wilsman and find as fact that Boyd, as perceived by reasonable police officers in the circumstances presented here, was armed and remained an imminent threat and a danger until he finally dropped his weapon after officer Baeppler fired his last shots.").

Boyd v. Baeppler, 215 F.3d 594, 604-06 (6th Cir. 2000) (Daughtrey, J., dissenting) ("The majority awards summary judgment to officers Baeppler and Wilsman because it finds, as a matter of law, that Adolph Boyd posed a threat to their safety that made the use of deadly force objectively reasonable. In so doing, the majority discounts the plaintiff's evidence suggesting the existence of genuine issues of material fact that should, under Johnson v. Jones . . . preclude our assertion of jurisdiction here. Because I believe that our court lacks jurisdiction to decide this appeal . . and therefore that our decision today preempts the jury's role in deciding the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence, . . . I must respectfully dissent. . . . The majority dismisses Dr. Tucker's testimony as based on mere probabilities, and any conclusions a jury might reach from it as mere speculation. In so doing, the majority again makes a determination as to which evidence it finds most credible, and thus again wrongfully assumes the role of factfinder. To my mind, this is a classic battle of the medical experts, the outcome of which we must leave to the jury to decide at trial. . . . Today the majority holds otherwise, and its decision continues the unfortunate trend noted by other members of this court of a panel 'arrogating unto itself the role of resolving on appeal the factual disputes presented by a qualified immunity defense in a § 1983 action.'. . . Because I believe that the record supports the district court's conclusion that genuine disputes remain regarding whether the defendants' conduct was reasonable, I therefore dissent.").

Pouillon v. City of Owosso, 206 F.3d 711, 718 (6th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he question of qualified immunity, which was improperly submitted to the jury under general instructions, is rather a question of law for determination by the judge. Questions of fact may be relevant to this determination, . . . but the ultimate question is one of law: if the finder of fact determines that the officers undertook certain actions, could any reasonable police officer have believed that those actions did not violate Pouillon's constitutional rights?").

Scott v. Clay County, 205 F.3d 867, 881 (6th Cir. 2000) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("This Circuit's unfortunate practice of arrogating unto itself the role of resolving on appeal the factual disputes presented by a qualified immunity defense in a § 1983 action, as represented by the majority opinion herein, continues the troubling trend followed by this Court in the improperly decided case of Claybrook v. Birchwell.").

Kain v. Nesbitt, 156 F.3d 669, 671-73 (6th Cir. 1998) ("When making a qualified immunity analysis, it is important to remember that the defendant is, in essence, saying: 'If the plaintiff's version is credited, what I did, judged today, arguendo would be wrongful, but at the time I acted, no reasonable officer would have known he was acting wrongfully.'. . If an officer committed no wrong, then qualified immunity is not implicated. Defendants often reply to suits of this nature by seeking dismissal or summary judgment. The summary judgment request often asserts qualified immunity as one basis for granting the motion. If the defendant's motion is granted on any of the grounds asserted, the plaintiff has an immediate right of appeal. If the motion is denied, however, the defendant may appeal only as to the qualified immunity issue. . . It is for this reason that the analytical compartments must be kept relatively watertight and the trial court in its rulings must differentiate between the various theories advanced by the defendant for dismissal. An illustration may be helpful. If a plaintiff in a § 1983 action alleges she was the victim of the use of excessive force by the police, this would be adequate initially under a notice pleading analysis to state a claim. If the defendant responded by making a claim of qualified immunity, then, at this point, plaintiff's complaint does not meet the heightened pleading requirement we enunciated in Veney . . . . If plaintiff were to then amend by saying that the excessive force consisted of handcuffing her in connection with an arrest, the claim would fail because it would be apparent on its face that no constitutional violation had been pleaded. In such an instance the claim would be subject to dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or summary judgment. It would not be necessary to make a qualified immunity analysis. If, however, the plaintiff were to amend and state the excessive force consisted of the defendant intentionally and maliciously handcuffing her so tightly that she lost circulation in both her wrists and suffered physical injury, then the qualified immunity analysis would have to be made. Part of the analysis would be a determination as to whether there were any genuinely disputed questions involving material facts. It would matter not, for example, that the officer denied handcuffing her tightly. This would merely generate a genuinely disputed question of fact, which is for the trier of fact to resolve, not the judge. This would be true notwithstanding that the trial judge found the officer to be more credible than the plaintiff, because it is not for the court to make credibility determinations at this stage of the proceeding. . . . If plaintiff's version as to the nature and degree of force used is credited, which the district court failed to do, a jury question is created as to whether the force used was excessive. The law as to excessive force has been long-settled, and Officer Nesbitt may not advance a claim that he did not know the force he could use must be reasonable. What Officer Nesbitt argues, in essence, is that the degree of force he used was objectively reasonable. However, where the force used and the manner in which it was used is as plaintiff alleges here, the issue of reasonableness is a fact question, not a legal issue to be decided by the court. We would emphasize that we are not concluding that every excessive force claim creates a jury issue. We reference the example given earlier where the only excessive force claimed was being handcuffed in the course of an arrest. Such an allegation does not state a claim on which relief can be granted.").

Greene v. Reeves, 80 F.3d 1101, 1105-06 (6th Cir. 1996) ("The district court opinion does not strictly follow the Hunter mandates against placing qualified immunity in the hands of a jury and against requiring the most reasonable interpretation of events. . . . The court's unfavorable comparison of the officials' investigation to more thorough investigations in other child pornography cases further manifests questionable logic. . . . The comparison is not relevant to the issue of whether the officials reasonably concluded from the one photo that there was probable cause to arrest Greene and Hill for violating Kentucky law, and it is certainly not relevant with respect to whether any reasonable officer would have known that in so concluding, a matter over which many persons could honestly disagree, the actions taken plainly violated established constitutional rights. This is and, since Harlow, has been the single ultimate standard for applying qualified immunity. To the extent that the district court's holding represents the application of some other or lesser standard, it is in error.").

Williams v. Pollard, 44 F.3d 433, 435 (6th Cir. 1995) ("If the material facts regarding the objective reasonableness of Pollard's actions had been disputed, then the trial court would have been correct in holding that the issues of fact must go to the jury, with the ultimate question of qualified immunity, of course, then to be determined by the court.").

Cameron v. Seitz, 38 F.3d 264, 273 n.2 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[T]he district judge appears to have instructed the jury on the issue of qualified immunity. The issue of qualified immunity is a question of law and generally should be decided by the judge . . . .").

Jeffers v. Heavrin, 10 F.3d 380, 381 (6th Cir. 1993) ("[P]robable cause determinations, even if wrong, are not actionable as long as such determinations pass the test of reasonableness.Reasonableness is a question of law to be decided by the trial judge.").

Reynolds v. Addis, No. 18-CV-13669, 2020 WL 4260768, at *6-8 (E.D. Mich. July 24, 2020) ("It is well settled that where multiple shots are fired and some of those shots are to a suspect's back, even a suspect armed with a knife and allegedly charging an officer, creates a question of fact for the jury on whether excessive force has occurred. . . . Specifically, Addis never observed Mr. Reynolds with a knife nor did Mr. Reynolds attempt to stab Addis and Addis was the only officer on the scene. Thus, the shots to Mr. Reynolds's back support that he was shot while unarmed, fleeing, and when he no longer posed a threat to Addis. . . . Here, there is a question of material fact for the jury to decide whether Addis was justified in firing all of the shots, including the shots to Mr. Reynolds's back, when he clearly saw Mr. Reynolds had nothing in his hands and did not make any gestures as if he was reaching for a weapon. Although Defendants would like the Court to adopt wholesale Addis's version of the deadly encounter, this is antithetical to Rule 56. Plaintiff has presented evidence calling into question Addis's version of events with Dr. Spitz's findings, the autopsy report, DaFoe's report and the video from Addis's patrol car. Based on the foregoing analysis, the jury must decide material questions of fact in order to assess whether Officer Addis's actions amounted to an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. Finally, the law is well settled that shooting an unarmed fleeing suspect is excessive force when the officer and nearby persons are not in immediate danger. . . Based on the foregoing considerations, Defendant Addis is not entitled to qualified immunity from civil liability damages.")

Sherrod v. Williams, No. 3:14-CV-454, 2019 WL 267175, at *14–16 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 15, 2019) ("In the deadly-force context, the Supreme Court has held that it is not enough that the law is clearly established that deadly force may be used only when the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm to the officer or others. Rather, the appropriate question is whether it is clearly established that use of deadly force is unconstitutional in the particular or specific situation confronted by the officer. . . In addressing the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, however, the Court must draw all inferences in favor of the non-moving party and cannot resolve any genuine issues of material fact. . . The Court must deny qualified immunity where factual disputes are critical in determining whether an officer's use of deadly force violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . The Court concludes that, until a jury resolves the critical factual dispute of whether Crawford rotated his body or the rifle toward the officers or made some other 'furtive movement' or 'harrowing gesture,' giving rise to a reasonable belief that he posed an imminent threat of serious bodily harm, . . . it cannot be determined whether Williams' use of deadly force violated a clearly established right. If, as Officer Williams claims, Crawford took an aggressive stance and rotated his body or the rifle toward the officers, then Crawford had no clearly established right to be free from the use of deadly force. In fact, quite the opposite is true. . . The Sixth Circuit has recently rejected a 'categorical rule' that the use of deadly force is reasonable only if the suspect raises his weapon. . . But, on the other hand, deadly force is not justified merely because the suspect is holding a gun. This is just one factor to be considered in assessing the totality of the circumstances. . . Williams argues that, even if the Court views the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and resolves all factual disputes in their favor, existing precedent did not put him on notice that the use of deadly force in the situation he encountered was unconstitutional. The Court disagrees. Although Plaintiffs have not cited any case directly on point, the law is clearly established that, even when officers respond to a report that a suspect is brandishing a loaded gun, the use of deadly force is not justified unless the suspect either points the gun at the officers or makes some other kind of movement, gesture or verbal statement giving rise to a reasonable belief that the officers or others were in imminent danger of serious bodily harm. . . . Although the officers responded to a 911 call that Crawford was allegedly pointing a loaded gun at people inside a crowded Wal-Mart store, nothing appeared to be amiss when the officers arrived. They found Crawford standing by himself, looking at the shelves. The rifle, which he held in his right hand, was pointed at or near the floor.

In his left hand, Crawford was holding a cell phone to his ear, although this fact apparently went unnoticed by the officers. When Sergeant Darkow gave the verbal command to drop the gun, Crawford turned his head to look at him. Less than two seconds later, Williams fired two shots at Crawford. Until a jury determines whether Crawford rotated his body or the rifle toward the officers or made some kind of movement or gesture that created a reasonable belief that he posed an immediate risk of serious harm to the officers or others, it cannot be determined whether existing precedent made it clear to a reasonable officer that the use of deadly force was constitutionally impermissible in the situation with which Williams was faced. . . . Williams maintains that unless Plaintiffs can identify a case holding that the use of deadly force in a substantially similar situation actually violated the Constitution, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established. The Court rejects this argument. Implicit in each of these holdings is that, if the disputed facts are resolved in the plaintiffs' favor at trial, then the officers would be deemed to have violated clearly-established constitutional rights and would not be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wheatt v. City of East Cleveland, No. 1:17-CV-377, 2019 WL 4071646, at *6 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 29, 2019) ("When the Court considers the legal question of qualified immunity in light of a plaintiff jury verdict, the court 'must review the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, making all reasonable inferences in their favor.'. .Here, the jury has found that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. The only remaining issue is whether the rights in question were 'clearly established' in 1995. Plaintiffs' first claim was that Defendants violated their due process rights to a fair trial by using an unduly suggestive photo array. The Supreme Court's 1977 Manson v. Braitwaithe decision held that an identification procedure violates due process when it is unnecessarily suggestive and unreliable. . . Manson itself held that using only a suspect photo in an out-of-court identification was unnecessarily suggestive. Here, Defendants did just that. . . And when the Court instructed the jury on the factors bearing on the identification's reliability, the Court cited Manson's reliability factors verbatim. . . Because the jury found that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights applying legal standards established in 1977, the Court finds that the rights were clearly established at the time of the 1995 suggestive identification. Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. Plaintiffs' second claim was that Defendants knowingly fabricated evidence or withheld evidence favorable to Plaintiffs. The 1963 Brady v. Maryland decision ruled that evidence must be turned over to defense counsel where it 'would tend to exculpate [the defendant].' Here, Defendants have stipulated that the Petty brothers' report was exculpatory. Furthermore, the Sixth Circuit has held in Moldowan v. City of Warren that police officers' shared obligation to turn over exculpatory materials was clearly established in August 1990. . . Thus, the Court finds that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim either.")

Henderson ex rel Henderson v. Jackson, No. 15-10807, 2016 WL 3125214, at *2, *9-10 (E.D. Mich. June 3, 2016) ("After the crash, Otis Henderson, the plaintiff's decedent, immediately exited the vehicle from the rear passenger seat and fled on foot. According to Jackson, Henderson was holding his waistband as he ran, which gave the impression that he may have a weapon. The 13-second video taken from a nearby store confirms that Henderson's left hand was at his waistband; however, it is not clear whether he is holding a weapon or merely holding up his pants. Jackson jumped out of his vehicle and gave chase. . . .The defendants argue that Jackson's actions were reasonable because he believed that Henderson had pointed a gun at him as he was fleeing. But that version of the events does not account for the plaintiff's evidence, discussed earlier, that Henderson did no such thing. The plaintiff posits that Jackson, without warning, fired at an unarmed man who was running away from officers, and there is evidence to support that contention. Fact questions presented by the record preclude the qualified immunity defense at this summary judgment stage of the case.")

Peabody v. Perry Tp., Ohio, No. 2:10–cv–1078, 2013 WL 1327026, *5-*7 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 29, 2013) ("It is not for this Court to conclusively decide whether the force used was deadly force—only whether a reasonable jury could, or could not, find that the amount of force used created a substantial risk of serious bodily injury or death. The Court further notes that if this case is not viewed as one in which a reasonable jury could find lethal force, then Officer Bean would be entitled to qualified immunity. That is, if the situation were the exact same but Hook's flight from arrest was not over an eight foot fence, no reasonable jury could find that the amount of force used was excessive. The Court would not second guess Officer Bean's split-second decision to tase Hook instead of tackling him or letting him escape. . . Even if the Court were to conclude that the reasonableness of Officer Bean's choice to use the Taser on Hook as he fled across a flat parking lot was a close call, it would defer to the Officer's choice. . . This situation, however, is different. Because a reasonable jury could find that Officer Bean utilized deadly force, this Court reviews his decision in a broader sense in that it considers the use of lethal force in the absence of an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Bean or the public. In this respect, the law is clear that deadly force requires a suspect to pose an 'immediate threat either to the officer or others.'. . The Court here does not ignore Officer Bean's contention that it was reasonable for him to consider that Hook posed a threat to the public in and around Dick's Sporting Goods. . . Nevertheless, the type of threat posed by Hook is not of the nature or quality of that in which an officer may employ lethal force. . . .Therefore, if a jury determines that Officer Bean utilized lethal force, he violated Hook's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .Having determined that the evidence as to whether Officer Bean utilized deadly force presents sufficient disagreement to require submission to a jury, the Court turns to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis which considers whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established. A government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, the contours of a right are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he or she is doing violates that right. . . It is clearly established constitutional law that an officer cannot shoot a fleeing felon in the back in the absence of the suspect posing an imminent threat to the officer or others. . . The Court finds that the contours of the right to be free from lethal force in the circumstances before it are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that the use of lethal force on Hook violated his constitutional rights.")

Jones v. Graley, 2008 WL 343087, at *4 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 6, 2008) ("It is the Court's duty to answer whether the officer's actions were objectively reasonable. . . As the Scott Court explained, 'At the summary judgment stage ... once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the non-moving party to the extent supportable by the record, ... the reasonableness of [the officer's] actions ... is a pure question of law.'").

Fuller v. Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Auth., 2008 WL 339464, at *6 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 6, 2008) ("Post-Scott . . . the question of whether a § 1983 plaintiff's Fourth Amendment constitutional rights were violated is generally not a question of fact best reserved for a jury, as Fuller repeatedly argues. . . . [T]he Sixth Circuit has concluded, 'the standard articulated by the Supreme Court in Scott clearly dictates that it is a pure question of law for the court to determine whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the officers' actions were objectively reasonable under the circumstances.'. . Previous Sixth Circuit authority instructing 'that such a determination is for a jury in the first instance is directly contrary to subsequent Supreme Court authority.'. . Accordingly, the threshold determination on Fuller's § 1983 claims–whether a constitutional violation occurred–is one the Court must determine as a matter of law."), aff'd., 2009 WL 1546372 (6th Cir. June 3, 2009).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Jerger v. Blaize, 41 F.4th 910, 915 (7th Cir. 2022) ("The facts before us are so disputed as to limit what we can do on appeal. All we can say for sure is that a jury—accepting Lelah and Jade's version of events—could conclude that Garrett and Blaize acted in violation of the Jergers' clearly established rights. A reasonable case worker would have known that threatening expedited CHINS proceedings with a predetermined outcome—one that terminated Lelah and Jade's rights to make medical decisions for J.J.—and leaving no time for the Jergers to seek legal advice went too far in procuring the blood test. Of course, the defendants disagree—and strongly so—with the Jergers' portrayal of the facts. But that is precisely our point. Summary judgment is not available in the face of this factual tug-of-war. Nor is qualified immunity where the parties dispute facts material to the consent question. Everything depends on whose version of the facts to credit, whose account is most credible, and whose perspective aligns best with the totality of the difficult circumstances all parties found themselves in as the underlying events played out over those couple of days in September 2017. . . In the final analysis, 'it is for a jury, and not for us, to weigh all the evidence and choose between competing inferences.'. . To be sure, '[t]his is not the final word on qualified immunity for this case.'. . The mess of facts concerning the Jergers' consent only 'precludes a ruling on qualified immunity at this point.'. . The jury's ultimate resolution of the facts may allow the district court to grant qualified immunity to the DCS case workers at trial. . . Until then, however, the record before us leaves no choice but to vacate the entry of summary judgment for the defendants.")

Taylor v. City of Milford, 10 F.4th 800, 812 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Though rare, trial courts may consider qualified immunity after trial. . . And although the Supreme Court has urged lower courts to determine the applicability of qualified immunity as soon as practicable, . . . it is sometimes impossible to resolve the qualified immunity question before trial. . . This is one such case. There may be a set of facts, established at trial, under which Garrett's use of force was not excessive, or was not clearly established as excessive. But taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff at this stage, we cannot agree with the district court that Garrett's use of force did not violate Steven's clearly established constitutional rights. We thus reverse. Assuming this case goes to trial, the district court would be well-advised to use a specific jury verdict form to probe the facts that the jury finds to aid in any post-verdict determination of qualified immunity. See Smith v. Finkley, —— F.4th ——, ——, 2021 WL 3660880, at *19 (7th Cir. Aug. 18, 2021) ("When the issue of qualified immunity remains unresolved at the time of trial, ... the district court may properly use special interrogatories to allow the jury to determine disputed issues of fact upon which the court can base its legal determination of qualified immunity.") (quoting Warlick v. Cross, 969 F.2d at 303, 305–06 (7th Cir. 1992)).")

Estate of Green v. City of Indianapolis, No. 19-3464, 2021 WL 1904871, at *5–7 (7th Cir. May 12, 2021) (not reported) (" The Estate does not quarrel on appeal with the rationale underlying the district court's qualified immunity determination—specifically, that it was not clearly unconstitutional for the officers to shoot at a fleeing driver whose maneuvering of the vehicle posed a danger to one or more of the officers themselves—but rather challenges the factual premise of the court's holding. The Estate asserts that if one resolves all disputes and inconsistencies and draws all inferences in its favor, one may reasonably infer that the Nissan had come to a halt, and that Green was outside of the vehicle or emerging therefrom when he was struck with the fatal bullet. The Estate bases its assertion on both the path of the fatal bullet as described in the coroner's report and the damage that bullet did to Green's heart. If the car was no longer moving and Green was no longer behind the wheel, the Estate posits, he posed no danger to any of the officers and there was no need to employ lethal force against him. Because Green is dead and we have only the officers' accounts of their fatal encounter with him, we must engage in a 'fairly critical assessment' of the evidentiary record. . . Nevertheless, the Estate as the party opposing summary judgment retains the burden of presenting evidence that creates a dispute of material fact for a finder of fact to resolve. . . We disagree with the Estate that, on the limited record before us, the factfinder could reasonably conclude that the Nissan had come to a stop and Green had already emerged from the car (or was in the process of doing so) when the fatal bullet struck him. The defendants themselves all testified to the contrary. They were present at the scene, observed the relevant events first-hand, and testified based on their personal knowledge. Their testimony, however self-serving it may have been, was affirmative evidence that Green was still inside of the Nissan, and was driving it toward the officers, when they shot at him. The fact that the fatal bullet entered Green's back (as did the bullet that struck his lower leg) makes it a possibility that he was already out of the car, but it was only one possibility among several. Green might have remained inside the car but turned his body away from officers defensively as they began to shoot at him. He might have been preparing to exit the car and turning toward the car door for that purpose. Or the bullet might have ricocheted within the car so as to strike him in the back. . . These additional possibilities are consistent with the officers' testimony. Setting aside for a moment that testimony, which unequivocally places

Green inside of the car, we can only speculate as to the likelihood of any of the various alternative possibilities, including the possibility that Green had already emerged or was emerging from the car. Expert testimony may not always be necessary to enable a factfinder to make an assessment as to the likely trajectory of a bullet, but this strikes us as the sort of case in which such testimony is essential to support the Estate's factual theory. . . Without expert opinion on this subject, there would literally be no evidence to guide the jury in any direction in assessing the likelihood that Green was not inside the car, as the officers testified, but rather outside of the car, as the Estate presupposes, when the fatal bullet struck him. On the record as it stands, a jury could only do what we can, which is to speculate. As the Estate itself concedes, speculation is not a valid basis for a judgment in the Estate's favor or for defeating the officers' motion for summary judgment. . . Nor can we say that the damage done by the bullet that pierced Green's heart rules out the possibility that the bullet struck him while he was still in the car. The Estate presumes, based on the coroner's finding that the bullet transected Green's heart and disrupted coronary blood flow, that Green's death must have been virtually instantaneous and that it would have been impossible for him to open the car door and get to his feet, 'as if nothing had happened,' before collapsing, as Stewart testified. But this, again, is a subject on which expert testimony is required. We ourselves can only speculate on the record before us as to how quickly the injury to Green's heart would have disabled and killed him. Again, the coroner's report is silent as to how quickly death would have resulted. The same is true with respect to the injuries to Green's lower leg, which the Estate likewise suggests would have made it impossible for Green to get out of the car and rise to his feet. Without medical testimony as to the likely effects of such injuries, we, like the factfinder, can only guess as to what Green could or could not have done. In a further effort to call into doubt the officers' exculpatory recounting of the events, the Estate has flagged certain inconsistencies among the officers' accounts and between those accounts and certain other evidence in the record. None of the discrepancies, however, is sufficient to establish a dispute of fact material enough to preclude summary judgment. . . . For the reasons we have set out above, the district court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the report of the Estate's expert. Nothing in the remaining evidence presents a material dispute of fact precluding summary judgment and requiring a trial. In the absence of admissible expert testimony supporting the Estate's theory that Green was emerging from or outside of the car when he was fatally shot by the defendant police officers, a jury could only speculate that Green was exiting the car and no longer plausibly posed a danger to the officers.")

King v. Hendricks County Commissioners, 954 F.3d 981, 985-87 (7th Cir. 2020) ("To ensure fairness to a deceased plaintiff whose representative alleges an impermissible use of deadly force, given the impossibility of victim testimony to rebut the officers' account, we scrutinize all the evidence to determine whether the officers' story is consistent with other known facts. . . . We appreciate the difficulty King faces in countering the officers' testimony, but most of this evidence does not undermine the officers' account. King in the end is forced to rely on the theory that the officers shot Bradley for no reason and planted the knife on him. But the evidence supporting that version of events does not rise above speculation or conjecture. It creates only metaphysical doubt and requires us to make logical leaps rather than reasonable inferences. . . . Ultimately, we are left with substantial testimonial and physical evidence supporting Hays's version of events, and no concrete evidence rebutting it. King did not present enough evidence to raise a genuine dispute of fact for trial, and so summary judgment for Hays on the section 1983 claim was appropriate. In light of our ruling on the merits, we have no need to address Hays's back-up assertion that he was entitled to qualified immunity.") Strand v. Minchuk, 910 F.3d 909, 913-19 (7th Cir. 2018) (as amended on pet. for rehearing, Dec. 6, 2018) ("In answering whether a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, we must avoid resolving contested factual matters. . . If we detect a 'back–door effort' to contest facts on appeal, we lack jurisdiction. . . Aware of this jurisdictional limitation, Officer Minchuk emphasizes that he is not contesting any facts and indeed, for purposes of this appeal, accepts them in the light most favorable to Strand as the non–moving party. We take him at his word and proceed to evaluate whether Officer Minchuk is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . In traveling this path, we cannot retreat from our obligation to avoid trying to answer (as a factual matter) the question the district court emphasized remains unresolved: whether enough time went by between Strand's surrender and Minchuk's use of deadly force such that Strand was subdued at the moment Minchuk fired the shot. The Supreme Court has underscored the necessity for this exact discipline in this exact context—appellate review of a denial of qualified immunity on summary judgment. [citing Tolan v. Cotton] In evaluating Officer Minchuk's entitlement to qualified immunity, we undertake the twofold inquiry of asking whether his conduct violated a constitutional right, and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . .We are free to choose which prong to address first. . .The first prong of the inquiry, whether Officer Minchuk used excessive force and thereby violated Strand's Fourth Amendment rights, is governed by the Supreme Court's decisions in Tennessee v. Garner. . .and Graham v. Connor[.] . . . Whether we approach Officer Minchuk's request for qualified immunity by first assessing the merits of Strand's claim or instead by evaluating whether Minchuk's conduct violated clearly established law, we come to the same barrier: we cannot—as we must—view the facts in Strand's favor and conclude as a matter of law that Minchuk is entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment. Officer Minchuk resorted to the use of deadly force at a time when Strand had stopped fighting, separated from Minchuk, stood up, stepped four to six feet away from Minchuk, and, with his hands in the air, said, 'I surrender. Do whatever you think you need to do. I surrender, I'm done.' The record shows that Strand was unarmed at all points in time. Furthermore, upon standing, raising his hands, and voicing his surrender, Strand never stepped toward Minchuk, made a threatening statement, or otherwise did anything to suggest he may resume fighting or reach for a weapon. Recall, too, the broader circumstances that led to the shooting. The police were not in hot pursuit of an individual known to be armed and dangerous. Nor had the police responded to a report of violent crime or otherwise arrived at a location only to find an individual engaged in violent or menacing conduct or acting so unpredictably as to convey a threat to anyone present. To the contrary, the entire fracas leading to Officer Minchuk's use of deadly force began with his issuance of parking tickets. After Strand declined to make an on–the–spot cash payment and instead sought to take pictures to show the absence of no–parking signs, Officer Minchuk allowed the situation to escalate and boil over by slapping Strand's cell phone to the ground and then tearing Strand's shirt from his body. The fist fight then ensued, with Strand choosing to stop throwing punches and stand up and offer his express surrender, including by raising his hands above his head. It was then—with no direction to Strand to keep his hands in the air, to fall to his knees, or to lay on the ground—that Officer Minchuk drew his gun and fired the shot. A reasonable jury could find that Officer Minchuk violated Strand's constitutional right to remain free of excessive force. On these facts and circumstances, considered collectively and in the light most favorable to Strand, Strand no longer posed an immediate danger to Officer Minchuk at the time he fired the shot. The Fourth Amendment does not sanction an officer—without a word of warning—shooting an unarmed offender who is not fleeing, actively resisting, or posing an immediate threat to the officer or the public. . . . The district court correctly observed that additional fact finding was necessary to determine whether "the rapidly–evolving nature of the altercation" justified Officer Minchuk's use of deadly force or whether 'he had time to recalibrate the degree of force necessary, in light of [Strand's] statement of surrender.' This fact finding cannot occur on summary judgment (or appeal), so we cannot conclude that the district court committed error in determining a genuine issue of material fact prevented a resolution of the merits of Strand's claim. . . . What Officer Minchuk sees as undisputed—whether Strand continued to pose a threat at the moment Minchuk deployed deadly force—is actually unresolved and indeed vigorously contested by Strand. For Minchuk to prevail at this stage, the record must show that he fired while Strand still posed a threat. Instead, the record shows that Strand had backed away, voiced his surrender, and up to five, ten, or fifteen seconds may have elapsed while Strand stood with his hands in the air. And that is why the district court rightly determined, after a close and careful analysis of the record, that Minchuk was not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law at summary judgment on the merits of Strand's claim. This same factual dispute also prevents us from concluding, as Officer Minchuk urges, that Strand's clearly established constitutional rights were not violated, the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. We analyze whether precedent squarely governs the facts at issue, mindful that we cannot define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. Yet we can look at the facts only with as much specificity as the summary judgment record allows. It is beyond debate that a person has a right to be free of deadly force 'unless he puts another person (including a police officer) in imminent danger or he is actively resisting arrest and the circumstances warrant that degree of force.'. . But the district court could not determine whether—at the point Minchuk used deadly force—Strand posed an imminent harm to Officer Minchuk. The record left unclear precisely how much time went by from the moment the fist fight stopped to the moment Officer Minchuk pulled the trigger. . . . And this is the hurdle—the unresolved material question of fact—that Officer Minchuk cannot clear on summary judgment. . . .The existence of the substantial factual dispute about the circumstances and timing surrounding Minchuk's decision to shoot Strand precludes a ruling on qualified immunity at this point. This is not to foreclose the availability of qualified immunity to Officer Minchuk at trial. At trial a jury may resolve these disputed facts in Officer Minchuk's favor, and the district court could then determine he is entitled to qualified immunity as matter of law. . . . But we cannot make such a determination at this stage on this record.")

Edwards v. Jolliff-Blake, 907 F.3d 1052, 1062-63, 1067 (7th Cir. 2018) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("Plaintiffs' claims against defendant Jolliff-Blake should be remanded for trial. As recognized by Judge Chang, the first district judge to handle this case, both Officer Jolliff-Blake and the 'John Doe' informant who testified have significant credibility problems. Those credibility problems call into question the foundation for the search warrant. A jury should decide the claims against Jolliff-Blake. . . . The central claim in this lawsuit is that Officer Jolliff-Blake made false statements, either knowingly or recklessly, to the judge who issued the search warrant. . . The plaintiffs contend that Officer Jolliff-Blake was at least reckless in obtaining a search warrant for their home based on what he was supposedly told by an unreliable heroin addict, one who was desperately 'dope-sick' and desperate to tell the police something—or anything. It's not surprising that heroin addicts are sources of information about where to buy heroin. But the key questions are what Officer Jolliff-Blake knew when he sought the warrant, and whether he had obvious reasons to doubt the information he reported to the judge. . . . To be clear, if we accept the defendants' final version of the facts here, then all defendants were entitled to summary judgment. The majority's account of the law applicable to the defense's final version of the facts is correct. The search of the plaintiffs' home was a fruitless fiasco, but it did not violate the Fourth Amendment if it was based on a mistaken but honest judgment to trust what the informant told the police. But I disagree with my colleagues because two genuine issues of material fact are at the heart of plaintiffs' claims against Officer Jolliff-Blake. Conflicting testimony from Jolliff-Blake and 'Doe' means that neither's testimony can or should be accepted for purposes of summary judgment. The first issue is the sheer identity of the 'John Doe' informant upon whom the search warrant application was based. The second is which house 'John Doe' supposedly told Jolliff-Blake was where he had bought heroin. The majority accepts as undisputed the final answers provided in discovery by Jolliff-Blake and then by Doe. As explained below, however, those final answers conflicted with repeated, sworn testimony from both Jolliff-Blake and John Doe on the same subjects. . . . I do not contend that trivial variations in a witness's testimony always require denial of a summary judgment motion based on his testimony. The contradictions here, however, go to the heart of the case: who was 'John Doe,' where did he say he bought the heroin, and did the police have any business trusting him? If Jolliff-Blake cannot keep his sworn testimony straight on these matters, it is a mistake to say the courts must accept the final, defense-friendly version of his testimony. Consistent with our pattern instructions, this case presents issues for trial, not summary judgment. The majority's decision to accept Jolliff-Blake's explanations for his conflicting testimony and impeachment takes this court well outside the proper role for summary judgment. Maybe this fiasco of a search was the result of an honest but too-credulous officer's mistake in crediting 'Doe.' That's what my colleagues believe. But that's not our decision to make. Maybe we are just seeing a cover-up for the fiasco. The evidence also permits a reasonable inference that Jolliff-Blake's and Doe's defense-friendly account of any facts simply does not deserve to be believed. Plaintiffs' claims against Jolliff-Blake should be tried. To that extent, I respectfully dissent.")

Beal v. Beller, 847 F.3d 897, 905 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Once again, the question before us is not whether the evidence seized from Beal as a result of the Detectives' stop-and-frisk should be suppressed. That question arose in the state criminal proceeding, and it was resolved favorably to Beal. (The Detectives are not bound by that ruling, since they are being sued in their individual capacity; but it bears noting that the state court's conclusion is of no help to them.) The question we must resolve is whether summary judgment in the Detectives' favor in this section 1983 suit was proper. We conclude that it was not. The validity of their decision to stop Beal will depend on the trier of fact's resolution of a number of disputed facts: Was the tip anonymous? Did Beal take any action that was sufficiently suspicious to justify the stop? Did the Detectives have any other information that provided at least reasonable suspicion to stop (and then frisk) Beal? The existence of these disputed facts is also enough to defeat the Detectives' assertion of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995). We make no predictions about the ultimate outcome of a trial. For present purposes, it is enough to say that summary judgment for the Detectives should not have been granted.")

Miller v. Gonzalez, 761 F.3d 822, 827-29 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Sometimes the heftiness of the evidence on one side, or the credulity of a particular litigant makes our task of suspending factual and credibility determinations difficult, but whatever the difficulty, we must stick to the task on summary judgment. . . That is, summary judgment is not appropriate 'if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party.'. . We must therefore construe the record in the light most favorable to the nonmovant and avoid the temptation to decide which party's version of the facts is more likely true. . . The district court concluded that Miller lacked sufficient evidence that Gonzalez's blow was intentional. But it is difficult to imagine—short of an admission from Gonzalez—what other evidence Miller could present of Gonzalez's intent. The district court discredits Miller's assertion that Gonzalez could see him when he jumped over the fence, reasoning that Gonzalez had no reason to know where in the 'dark, overgrown yard' Miller was hidden. But according to Miller, Gonzalez could see him from outside the yard and knew that he was subdued. Miller asserts that the officer was considerably taller than the chain-link fence, the area was illuminated by nearby lighting, and Gonzalez had enough time to see Miller on the ground because Miller was prostrate for ten to twelve seconds before Gonzalez jumped over the fence and struck him. Under this version of events, it is an unremarkable stretch to conclude that Gonzalez may have, as Miller alleges, deliberately dropped his knee with his body's full weight onto Miller's jaw, even though Miller was no longer resisting arrest. The district court appears to have been crediting Gonzalez's version of the facts instead. The district court concluded that 'Officer Gonzalez was in pursuit on foot and followed the plaintiff and another officer over the fence and into a yard. In doing so, he stumbled and fell and his knee landed on the plaintiff's jaw.'. . But this was Gonzalez's account of events from his affidavit, not Miller's. A jury could also infer from the exchange immediately thereafter that Gonzalez did indeed intend to injure Miller. Miller exclaimed, 'You ain't have to break my jaw!' and Gonzalez replied 'I told you not to run.' Of course one interpretation is that Gonzalez was merely stating the unremarkable truism that [he] had ordered Miller to halt and he disobeyed. But Miller's alternate interpretation—that Gonzalez was implying that he was retaliating against Miller for his decision to run—is not inherently implausible. . . Deciding which inference to draw from the conversation is the task of a fact finder. . . The district court also concluded that it is too implausible that Gonzalez could have aimed for and struck Miller's face in the dark, but the question of implausibility begs the question: According to Miller, when Gonzalez arrived at the enclosed yard, he could see for at least ten seconds that Miller lay motionless on his stomach, at gunpoint, and with his arms outstretched. Despite Miller's exhibited and observed passivity, Gonzalez jumped the fence and used the weight of his body to strike Miller's jaw. The district court's decision ultimately rests on the proposition that an accidental use of force cannot be excessive under the Fourth Amendment. But whether Gonzalez's use of force was accidental is precisely the disputed question-a question that cannot be resolved on this record given the competing versions of the event. . . . If Miller is believed, Gonzalez saw him subdued at gunpoint, lying motionless and spread-eagled on the ground, and then deliberately brought down his knee on Miller's jaw with enough force to break it. The officers concede that under Miller's version of events (which we must credit at this point) he demonstrated only 'passive resistance,' that is, lying with his arms outstretched and obeying every order except for the order to move his hands behind his back. . . Under the aforementioned factors elucidated by the Court in Graham (suspected crime, threat to officers, and resistance), the law is clearly established that police officers cannot use 'significant' force on suspects who are only passively resisting arrest. . .This prohibition against significant force against a subdued suspect applies notwithstanding a suspect's previous behavior—including resisting arrest, threatening officer safety, or potentially carrying a weapon.")

Miller v. Gonzalez, 761 F.3d 822, 830 (7th Cir. 2014) (Cudahy, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree that the judgment for Officer Stange must be affirmed. But, I am also convinced that there is insufficient evidence supporting Mr. Miller's claim that somehow Officer Gonzalez jumped over the fence in an obscure area and deliberately broke Mr. Miller's jaw while he was lying on his stomach. The evidence Mr. Miller has presented simply does not create a plausible story, even viewing the skimpy evidence in Miller's favor as we must on summary judgment review. Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment for Officer Gonzalez as well.")

Estate of Escobedo v. Martin (Escobedo II), 702 F.3d 388, 398 n.4 (7th Cir. 2012) ("This case presents the rare instance where judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds is granted after a jury verdict. The Supreme Court has "'stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'". . . Here, prior to trial the record was not sufficiently developed to grant qualified immunity to the defendants. As facts came to light at the trial, it became appropriate to grant qualified immunity to Officers Straub, Martin and Brown at the close of the Estate's case, and later to grant qualified immunity to the defendant commanders after the jury verdict in their favor.")

Vinning-El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591, 595 (7th Cir. 2011) ("For the reasons we have explained, to decide whether chaplain Sutton has qualified immunity, the district judge must determine whether he reasonably attempted to determine whether Vinning-El has a sincere belief that his religion requires a vegan diet. To put this slightly differently, the judge needs to know whether Sutton used the tenets of Moorish Science to disqualify Vinning-El, or only as a reason to suspect that Vinning-El may have been seeking a vegan diet for personal rather than religious reasons. Qualified immunity poses a question for the court, not a jury. See Hunter v. Bryant, 502 U.S. 224, 228 (1991). The district judge must hold a hearing and make whatever findings are required to resolve the qualified-immunity defense. If the judge concludes that Sutton based his decision on the tenets of Moorish Science, rather than his understanding of Vinning-El's own religious beliefs, then Sutton is not entitled to immunity, and it will be necessary to hold a jury trial to determine whether Vinning-El actually had a sincere religious belief in the necessity of a vegan diet. (Even if Sutton acted for the wrong reason, and thus lacks immunity, Vinning-El cannot prevail unless he establishes that his sincere religious beliefs require a vegan diet.)")

Purtell v. Mason, 527 F.3d 615, 622, 623, 626 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The district judge declined to decide whether Officer Mason was entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim because she thought 'there [was] a genuine issue of material fact as to whether [the officer] acted in an objectively reasonable manner when he asked Jeffrey Purtell to take down the tombstones.' This was error. The historical facts were undisputed. Whether Officer Mason's actions were reasonable is the second half of the qualified-immunity inquiry. Whether the facts established a constitutional violation (the first half of the immunity inquiry) requires a determination and application of the proper legal standard for fighting words. These were questions for the court, not the jury. . . . Officer Mason's mistake in thinking he could constitutionally order Purtell to dismantle the tombstone display on pain of arrest was one a reasonable officer might make in this situation. Although the fighting-words doctrine has been with us for decades, it has not been entirely clear (as we have explained) whether speech that injures but does not incite an immediate breach of the peace is protected or unprotected. And Officer Mason reasonably may have misunderstood the immediacy requirement of the fighting-words doctrine in the context of this case. He did have a fight on his hands, and he reasonably believed he had the authority to force the removal of the irritant in order to keep the peace. In misapprehending the constitutionally protected status of the Purtells' tombstone speech, Officer Mason did not violate clearly established rights. . .First Amendment line-drawing is often difficult, even in hindsight. Officer Mason's on-the-street judgment, though mistaken, is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bell v. Irwin, 321 F.3d 637, 640, 641 (7th Cir. 2003) ("The Bells' principal theme on appeal is that, however these things may appear to the police and federal judges, only a jury is empowered to determine whether the officers' conduct was reasonable. Plaintiffs seek to equate constitutional-tort litigation to common-law tort litigation, in which negligence is a matter of degree to be resolved by a jury even if all of the facts have been stipulated, provided that a reasonable argument may be made both for or against the view that the defendant was negligent. Here is where the phrase 'constitutional tort' may mislead, for the Constitution is not a form of tort law. It creates legal rules. Permitting the jury freedom to determine for itself whether particular conduct was reasonable within the meaning of the fourth amendment would introduce the ex post reassessment that Graham decried. . . . When material facts are in dispute, then the case must go to a jury, whether the argument is that the police acted unreasonably because they lacked probable cause, or that they acted unreasonably because they responded overzealously and with too little concern for safety. But when material facts (or enough of them to justify the conduct objectively) are undisputed, then there would be nothing for a jury to do except second-guess the officers, which Graham held must be prevented. Since Graham we have regularly treated the reasonableness of force as a legal issue, rather than an analog of civil negligence. . . This appears to be the accepted rule; the Bells do not cite, and we could not find, any post-Graham appellate opinion holding that the reasonableness of using force is a jury question even if no factual disputes require resolution. . . . Judges rather than juries determine what limits the Constitution places on official conduct.").

Jones v. Johnson, 26 F.3d 727, 728 (7th Cir. 1994) ("The magistrate judge . . . concluded that plaintiff had not adduced sufficient evidence to dispute the officers' version of the arrest – which, if accepted, entitles them to immunity if not to prevail outright. But the judge concluded that because the excessive force claim had to be tried, and because the plaintiff might come up with more evidence before trial, the false arrest claim also should be tried. This approach is mistaken. Summary judgment is not a discretionary remedy. If the plaintiff lacks enough evidence, summary judgment must be granted. Immunity claims should be resolved as early in the case as possible– and by the court rather than the jury."), aff'd on other grounds, 115 S. Ct. 2151 (1995).

Nelson v. Streeter, 16 F.3d 145, 149 (7th Cir. 1994) ("An official is entitled to immunity only if uncontested or uncontestable facts reveal that his acts did not invade the plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights. . . The motion [for summary judgment] can be granted only if there is no genuine issue of material fact bearing on the entitlement to immunity. [cites omitted] It is unresolved whether the official can ask the district judge to find the facts, if they are contested, rather than letting the factual issues that bear on immunity be resolved by the jury . . . along with the merits. [cites omitted] The question has not been raised in this case so we leave it for another day.").

Ellis v. Wynalda, 999 F.2d 243, 247 (7th Cir. 1993) ("[W]hile we do not foreclose the possibility that [the officer] did not use excessive force to seize [plaintiff], we believe that the case should be settled by a jury, based on whether a reasonable officer in [defendant's] place could believe that [plaintiff] presented a danger to his safety or the safety of others."). Compare id. at 247 (Bauer, C.J., dissenting) ("On the uncontested facts of this case, I believe the police officer acted in an objectively reasonable manner.").

Maxwell v. City of Indianapolis, 998 F.2d 431, 435, 436 (7th Cir. 1993) ("[N]o one disputes that the constitutional right to be arrested without probable cause is well established, as it was prior to [plaintiff's] arrest. Therefore, rather than alleging the violation of some broad constitutional right, such as the right to be free from unreasonable seizures, [plaintiff] must demonstrate that reasonable officers confronting the specific facts and relevant law in this case would have known that their conduct violated [plaintiff's] constitutional rights. The rub here lies in the substantial, if not complete, overlap of the issue of immunity and the principal issue on the merits. The three officers attempt to draw a distinction by contending that the relevant inquiry is into 'arguable probable cause,' which is another way of asking whether they had probable cause to think they had probable cause. . . . This assumes, however, that probable cause, itself measured on a shifting scale, is independent of what an arresting officer could reasonably have known. If that were true, the belief of the three police officers that the match between [plaintiff] and [fugitive] created probable cause would be grounds for granting immunity, irrespective of the actual existence of probable cause. But the conduct of the police officers would then depend on their subjective good faith, rather than an objective standard. We require the latter.").

Warlick v. Cross, 969 F.2d 303, 305 (7th Cir. 1992) ("The question of a defendant's qualified immunity is a question of law for the court, not a jury question . . . Apostol v. Landau, 957 F.2d 339, 342 (7th Cir. 1992) (when considering issue of qualified immunity on motion for summary judgment, district court should consider all undisputed evidence in record, in light most favorable to non-movant; if undisputed facts indicate defendants' conduct did not violate clearly established law, then defendants entitled to qualified immunity; if there are issues of disputed fact upon which immunity turns, or if defendants' conduct found to have violated clearly established law, not proper to grant summary judgment for defendants).

Rios v. City of Chicago, No. 15 CV 03119, 2021 WL 809735, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 3, 2021) ("[T]he Court need not resolve at this stage precisely how much Redelsperger needed to know or observe of Rios and his revolver during the chase in order to bring this case within at least the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force[.] . . A trial is necessary because the jury could reasonably find that Redelsperger did not see the revolver or have reason to know that Rios carried any kind of gun (as opposed to some sort of non-dangerous contraband) and lacked sufficient reason to fear that Rios represented a threat to his safety or the safety of the public. . . The Court notes that this decision does not 'foreclose the availability of qualified immunity' to Officer Redelsperger at trial; it merely leaves to a jury the resolution of the disputed facts concerning Redelsperger's knowledge and whether Redelsperger's use of force was reasonable under the circumstances, which will permit this Court to determine, if necessary, whether he is entitled to qualified immunity. See Strand v. Minchuk, 910 F.3d 909, 918-19 (7th Cir. 2018) (citing Warlick v. Cross, 969 F.2d 303, 305 (7th Cir. 1992) ("When the issue of qualified immunity remains unresolved at the time of trial, as was the case here, the district court may properly use special interrogatories to allow the jury to determine disputed issues of fact upon which the court can base its legal determination of qualified immunity.")).")

Childs v. City of Chicago, No. 13-CV-7541, 2017 WL 1151049, at *6-9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 28, 2017) (" 'The award of summary judgment to the defense in deadly force cases may be made only with particular care where the officer defendant is the only witness left alive to testify.'. . The Seventh Circuit has repeatedly cautioned district courts to grant summary judgment sparingly and look at the evidence with a critical eye in deadly force cases in which, as in this case, the witness most likely to tell a different story cannot speak from the grave. [collecting cases] Mindful of the caution with which summary judgment should be approached in deadly force cases, the court determines that genuine disputes over facts material to whether Mariano's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable preclude summary judgment on the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim. The plaintiff argues that Mariano undisputedly lost sight of the person he was chasing several times and so could not be sure that Childs was the person he and Gonzalez initially pursued. The court need not determine whether the plaintiff is correct because even if Mariano was objectively reasonable in his identification, a jury could find that he lacked an objectively reasonable basis to believe that Childs had a gun or otherwise posed a physical threat to Mariano or others. . . . Viewing this record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, Mariano had not been told that Childs had a gun. Nor had Childs shot at him. Childs, who did not comply with Mariano's orders to stop, turned toward Mariano then turned away and fled. Mariano fired at the head of the retreating Childs. Much of the forensic evidence can be reasonably viewed as contradicting Mariano's testimony on key aspects of the chase, though the defendants dispute that account. Because a reasonable jury considering the circumstances in their totality could credit the plaintiff's version of the facts and find that Mariano's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, summary judgment is inappropriate on the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Williams v. Vill. of Maywood, No. 13-CV-8001, 2016 WL 4765707, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 13, 2016) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, as must be done here, the Court concludes that there is sufficient evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could find that McCord was unarmed when he was shot, which would mean (in this case) that the shooting constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. This conclusion also means that Babicz's argument for qualified immunity, which depends entirely on the assertion that McCord was armed, . . . must be rejected. Accordingly, summary judgment on Plaintiff's excessive force claim is denied.")

Estate of Paul Heenan ex rel. Heenan v. City of Madison, No. 13-CV-606-WMC, 2015 WL 3460647, at *14 (W.D. Wis. June 1, 2015) ("Where factual disputes exist, a defendant must adopt plaintiff's version of the facts in asserting his right to be free from the excessive force inflicted on him was not sufficiently clear at the time of the shooting. . . Adopting plaintiff's version of the facts as the jury would have to do to find Heimsness liable at the time of the shooting, it has been clearly and long established that shooting an individual in the chest three times who did not pose an imminent threat to the safety of the officer or others violates that individual's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Accordingly, while it is an arguably higher standard of proof for plaintiff and, therefore, a closer question, the court denies Heimsness's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds for the same reason the motion is denied on the merits—factual disputes preclude a finding under the first prong that plaintiff has not made out a constitutional violation, and those same factual disputes similarly preclude a determination of whether the particular constitutional right at stake was clearly established at the time of the shooting. . . Certainly, where the facts are sufficiently clear, it is preferable to grant qualified immunity at summary judgment to spare a state actor the added disruption and expense of trial, and this court is willing to revisit the question of qualified immunity after trial, but in a case this heavily fact intensive, and more importantly heavily laden with material factual disputes, Heimsness's entitlement to qualified immunity must await trial.") After these disputes have been resolved by the jury, the City defendants are free to reassert their entitlement to qualified immunity in light of the jury's findings.")

Marshbanks v. City of Calumet City, No. 13 C 2978, 2015 WL 273221, at *5-6 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 20, 2015) ("Keeping in mind that police officers often make quick decisions in tense situations, a police officer's use of deadly force to apprehend an unarmed individual is not a 'legally hazy area.' As the Supreme Court held in 1985, '[w]here the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so.'. Therefore, at the time Defendant Officers discharged their firearms at Chambers, it was clearly established that '[a]n officer's use of deadly force to apprehend a suspect is unreasonable, absent probable cause that the suspect is dangerous or has committed a violent crime.'. . Here, the factual disputes discussed above preclude a finding of qualified immunity at summary judgment. More specifically, viewing the facts and evidence in Plaintiff's favor, at least one Defendant Officer used deadly force after Chambers dropped his weapon and Chambers did not shoot at the police officers or the crowd creating a immediate threat of danger. Furthermore, a witness told one of the officers that the individuals who had committed the violent crime had departed from the scene. Defendant Officers' version of the facts, namely that Chambers' conduct was sufficiently threatening to warrant the use of deadly force, is a question for the jury to decide. Accordingly, summary judgment is inappropriate under the circumstances because the parties tell different stories of what happened on April 21, 2012. Indeed, Defendant Officers' testimony is inconsistent, especially as to when Chambers dropped his gun and the circumstances leading up to Defendant Officers discharging their weapons. As the Seventh Circuit instructs, 'since the Graham reasonableness inquiry "nearly always requires a jury to sift through disputed factual contentions, and to draw inferences therefrom, we have held on many occasions that summary judgment or judgment as a matter of law in excessive force cases should be granted sparingly."'. . The Court therefore denies Defendants' summary judgment motion as Plaintiff's excessive force claim alleged in Count I.")

Moore v. City of Chicago, No. 13 C 483, 2014 WL 2457630, *6, *7 (N.D. Ill. May 30, 2014) ("Defendants assert that a reasonable officer standing in Officer Castelli's position 'could have believed, based upon the specific facts confronting her, the use of deadly force was permissible.'. . Although qualified immunity is an entitlement not to stand trial, the general rule of summary judgment still applies: 'courts may not resolve genuine disputes of fact in favor of the party seeking summary judgment.' Tolan, 134 S.Ct. at 1866. As discussed at length above, Officer Castelli's sole basis for using deadly force–Jamaal's possession of an object she believed to be a gun–is in hot dispute. Absent Jamaal's possession of an object, this case does not fall in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force'; a reasonable officer in Officer Castelli's position would have understood the use of deadly force to be excessive. . . Accordingly, because the question of immunity rests on a disputed fact, the court cannot grant summary judgment in Defendants' favor on the basis of qualified immunity.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Burbridge v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 2 F.4th 774, 781 (8th Cir. 2021) ("While the district court could have been clearer, we interpret its statements and citations to mean that it found a reasonable jury could find that the amount of force applied to Drew by each officer, including Officer Biggins, was unreasonable. Officer Biggins does not challenge the district court's statement that the officers undisputedly participated in Drew's arrest and used force during it. Rather, he argues that video evidence blatantly shows that his involvement in the arrest was limited to kneeling on Drew's legs and that therefore his use of force was de minimis. We have carefully reviewed the videos of the incident, and we are unable to clearly see that Officer Biggins's involvement was limited to kneeling on Drew's legs, nor are we able to otherwise parse the actions of individual officers. We therefore conclude that the videos do not blatantly contradict Drew's version of events or the district court's determinations regarding the record.")

McManemy v. Tierney, 970 F.3d 1034, 1040 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Construing the facts in McManemy's favor, Deputy Tierney still did not violate a clearly established right. McManemy does not suggest that this is the 'rare[,] obvious case,' in which the violation is so clear that it is unnecessary to identify an 'existing precedent.'. . So to prevail on this claim, McManemy must point to a case that 'squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . He believes there are two: Gill v. Maciejewski, 546 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2008), and Krout v. Goemmer, 583 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2009). Neither, however, 'squarely governs' this case. The first, Gill, is the closer of the pair. There too, an officer slammed his knee into an arrestee's head. . . The arrestee, who was lying on the ground at the time, suffered five facial-bone fractures, a concussion, and a brain bleed after the officer performed a standing knee-drop maneuver on him. . . We upheld the jury's finding that this level of force was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . For two reasons, however, Gill is still not close enough. First, Gill offered 'no resistance,' whereas McManemy led deputies on a 10-minute, high-speed chase and, by his own admission, put up some resistance once he was captured. . . Second, the level of force was different. By jumping on Gill from a standing position, the officer used near-deadly force and caused life-threatening injuries. . . Although what happened here was violent, it is not in the same league as the knee-drop maneuver from Gill. . . The second, Krout, is not even close. It involved extreme levels of 'gratuitous' force against a 'fully[-]subdued,' non-resisting arrestee who eventually died. . . An officer 'hip toss[ed]' him to the ground, and then, together with other officers, beat him. . . The use of force in this case, by contrast, falls well short of Krout. And perhaps most importantly, McManemy admits that he suffered his injuries during a struggle to handcuff him, not when he was 'fully subdued.'. .This analysis extends to the other deputies, too. To hold them liable for their failure to intervene, McManemy had to establish that they knew 'or had reason to know that excessive force would be or was being used.'. . If Deputy Tierney did not violate a clearly established right, then the other deputies would not have had 'fair notice' that he was using unconstitutionally excessive force against McManemy either.")

McManemy v. Tierney, 970 F.3d 1034, 1041-42 (8th Cir. 2020) (Grasz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Viewed in a light most favorable to McManemy, the facts establish Deputy Tierney repeatedly — twenty to thirty times — kneed McManemy in the eye area after he was subdued and restrained. Therefore, I do not believe Tierney is entitled to qualified immunity for this gratuitous use of force and I dissent from Section II.B. of the court's opinion. When defining the context surrounding the challenged use of force for purposes of either prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we are required to grant inferences in favor of the non-moving party. . . Failure to do so results in the impermissible invasion into the province of the fact-finder by weighing the evidence. . . Here, I believe the context surrounding Tierney's use of force is particularly important. McManemy led police officers on a long, high-speed chase. This put both the participants and the public at risk. But ultimately he laid facedown in the middle of the road with his arms and legs spread, giving himself up for arrest. According to McManemy, the resulting melee occurred because the officers incorrectly thought he was resisting arrest when they tried to handcuff him, when in fact a preexisting shoulder injury and an involuntary response to tasing caused the appearance of resistence. Regardless of the reason for the struggle, I agree with the court it was reasonable for the officers to believe otherwise and this justifies some of the physical force used. But I do not believe Tierney's repeated kneeing of McManemy in the eye was within that justified use of force. The video evidence presented showed Tierney arrived at the scene after McManemy had laid down and after at least four officers were already on top of him. Tierney arrived, first kicked or stomped on McManemy's leg, and then moved to the left side of McManemy's head. As the court explains, the video does not show what Tierney then does for the next minute or so. But if we are to believe McManemy, Tierney repeatedly — up to twenty or thirty times — kneed him, resulting in demonstrable injury to the eye. The court distinguished what happened to McManemy from cases like Gill v. Maciejewski, 546 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2008), and Krout v. Goemmer, 583 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2009), by noting that the plaintiffs in those cases were subdued and offered no resistence. But in light of the above-mentioned evidence and our duty to draw inferences in McManemy's favor, a jury could conclude that some of the strikes from Tierney's knee occurred after McManemy was handcuffed and after any reasonable belief in resistance would cease. That is, a jury could find that Tierney struck McManemy's face when he was subdued and offered no resistence. If true, such actions were completely unnecessary to effect the arrest. This circuit has clearly established that gratuitous force after a subdued suspect no longer poses a threat violates the Fourth Amendment. [citing cases] Thus, I believe there is sufficient evidence of a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation and would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of Tierney.")

Henderson v. City of Woodbury, 909 F.3d 933, 939-40 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The officers' deposition testimony and much of their BCA testimony states that Mark had not fully complied with their commands. They assert that while he was on the ground, his hands were not visible to them. They believe that their obscured vision of one his Mark's hands supported an objectively reasonable belief that he posed a significant threat of death or serious bodily harm. However, considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, Officer Krech's BCA statement supports a contrary finding: that Mark fully and unequivocally surrendered to police, lay still, and was shot and killed anyway. If true, such action would have violated Mark's clearly established constitutional rights. . . The resolution of the conflicting testimony between one officer's more or less contemporaneous description and all the officers' subsequent unified deposition testimony is best left to a jury. Therefore, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity. . . . What Officer Krech meant in her BCA statement and the weight it should be given are matters for a jury to decide. That fact, once determined, will be material to determining whether the officers' use of deadly force was reasonable. Therefore, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment on the § 1983 claim.")

Patterson v. Kelley, 902 F.3d 845, 853 (8th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e conclude that Patterson failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent to a general risk of harm to inmates in Barracks 13 and 14. The district court did not err in granting the defendants qualified immunity. . .Accordingly, we affirm the denial of Patterson's request for appointed counsel and the grant of summary judgment to the defendant-officials.")

Patterson v. Kelley, 902 F.3d 845, 853-58 (8th Cir. 2018) (Grasz, J. concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in part because, while the appointment of counsel would have been appropriate in this case, I agree with the majority that the district court's failure to do so was not reversible under our deferential abuse of discretion standard of review. I respectfully dissent with respect to the district court's grant of summary judgment and corresponding qualified immunity to the prison official defendants. Under our Constitution, Patric Patterson is afforded the right to protection against cruel and unusual punishment, including protection from violence at the hands of other prisoners. . . Claims brought to enforce this constitutional right are protected against summary dismissal where there is a genuine dispute of material fact. . . Because this procedural protection has been denied, any chance of Patterson vindicating his Constitutional right has been lost as well. Security video shows Patterson was brutally and repeatedly assaulted in an open prison barracks. The attacks were so violent he was left with only one eye and must now walk with the aid of a cane. Although the attacks were recorded by a security camera, no prison official was watching. Neither did they hear his cries, even though the video shows the attacks roused virtually the entire barracks. . . . I believe there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk of violence by inmates in the prison's open barracks, resulting in the lengthy and brutal beating openly inflicted on Patterson at the hands of another inmate, all unnoticed by any prison official. . . .My disagreement with the majority is based on its application of the summary judgment standard. Regardless of whether Patterson would ultimately prevail, at this stage of the litigation we are required to resolve factual disputes in his favor and grant him the benefit of all reasonable inferences. . . . I would conclude there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the risk of inmate violence in the open barracks in this particular prison constituted a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Patterson, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that the defendants knew about the obvious risk of violence inmates like Patterson faced at the hands of other inmates in this barracks. Patterson's verified complaint states that the defendants knew of the substantial risk of inmate violence and knew that this risk was exacerbated by a lack of sufficient security and supervision. . . . The applicable legal standard here does not allow for summarily rejecting Patterson's claim without a trial. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure contain a clear requirement that a movant seeking summary judgment must show that 'no genuine dispute as to any material fact' exists. The 'material fact' provision is a textual standard authorized by Congress. . . and this Court, under de novo review, must apply the rule as written. Under this standard, I believe Patterson's claim should survive. In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Patterson and granting him the benefit of all reasonable inferences, I would conclude there is a genuine dispute of material fact precluding summary judgment. I would affirm the district court's denial of Patterson's motions for appointed counsel under our abuse of discretion standard of review, but reverse its grant of the defendants' motion for summary judgment.")

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 661-62 (8th Cir. 2017) (Colloton, J., dissenting) ("We have said that a prosecutor's pre-arrest advice that a seizure is permissible 'can show the reasonableness of the action taken,'. . . and a prosecutor's post-arrest judgment to press a charge similarly can shed light on whether the officers were objectively reasonable. The majority concludes that it is

'now for a jury to decide' whether the officers 'acted constitutionally.'. .. Respectfully, this conclusion confuses the roles of judge and jury. Juries find facts; as the majority acknowledges, 'we have no historical facts in dispute.'. . The district court thought there were factual disputes about whether Hoyland 'intended to interfere' with the performance of duties and whether Hoyland's conduct 'substantially frustrated' the officers. But the majority does not embrace these questions, and rightfully so. The facts of the incident are recorded on videotape and are undisputed. What Hoyland intended or whether the officers were substantially frustrated is not at issue. The question is whether a reasonable police officer could have believed there was probable cause that Hoyland acted with the requisite intent and that his conduct substantially frustrated or hindered the officers in the performance of their duties. This is a legal determination for the court. By confirming that there are no disputed historical facts and concluding on those facts that the police officers violated Hoyland's clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment, the court effectively grants judgment as a matter of law for Hoyland on that claim. Police officers have a tough job. Decisions like this one make it tougher. By denying qualified immunity on undisputed facts, the majority necessarily concludes that the officers here were plainly incompetent or knowingly violated the law. In my view, the limited clearly established law concerning the Minnesota statute does not justify that conclusion when the analysis is properly particularized to the facts of this case. I would reverse the order of the district court and direct entry of judgment in favor of the officers based on qualified immunity.")

Hosea v. City of St. Paul, 867 F.3d 949, 959-60 (8th Cir. 2017) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Because I believe there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers used excessive force against Hosea, I respectfully dissent from Part II.B of the court's opinion. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Hosea and 'giving him the benefit of all reasonable inferences,' . . . each Graham factor weighs in his favor. First, although Hosea testified in his deposition that he and Steines were arguing and that Steines was crying when the officers entered, there was no indication that Hosea had committed any physical violence against Steines. . . Second, no reasonable officer could have concluded that Hosea 'pose[d] an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others.'. . The officers tackled Hosea after he had begun to lower himself to the floor, three feet away from where Steines sat. Even if it was hypothetically possible for Hosea to stand back up and attack Steines, a reasonable officer would not have believed this mere possibility represented a realistic, immediate threat to Steines' safety. Finally, no reasonable officer would have concluded Hosea was 'actively resisting arrest.'. . Hosea testified he had already put his left knee and right hand on the floor when the officers tackled him. The court concludes that because Hosea was not yet completely on the floor, the officers could have believed he was passively resisting arrest. I disagree that a reasonable officer would think Hosea's seconds-long delay in fully reaching the floor—after informing the officers of his leg injury—constituted any form of resistance. 'It is the province of the jury to assess the credibility of the evidence, and if the jury accepts [Hosea's] account, it could fairly conclude that' the officers used excessive force against him. . . Accordingly, I would reverse and remand Hosea's excessive-force claim to the district court for trial.")

Wealot v. Brooks, 865 F.3d 1119, 1128 (8th Cir. 2017) ("In many cases, we have affirmed the grant of qualified immunity to officers who applied deadly force to an unarmed suspect because we concluded the officers held a reasonable belief the suspect was dangerous. . . .Yet, 'the record here does not conclusively establish the reasonableness of the officer[s'] actions.'. . The officers' key testimony about the gun is controverted by other witnesses, some of their own inconsistent statements, and some physical evidence. Wealot has sufficiently demonstrated there are at least two genuine disputes of material fact . . . Disputed factual issues and conflicting testimony should not be resolved by the district court.")

Partlow v. Stadler, 774 F.3d 497, 502-03 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Faced with these 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' circumstances, the officers made a split-second decision to apply deadly force. Even if Partlow intended to do no harm to the officers as he moved the shotgun, the officers' use of force was objectively reasonable. They had no way of knowing what Partlow planned to do. In his brief, Partlow does not argue that in turning to set down the shotgun, his movement was so obviously an attempt to comply with the officers' commands to drop the shotgun that a reasonable officer would have known that opening fire would constitute excessive force.")

Partlow v. Stadler, 774 F.3d 497, 503-04 (8th Cir. 2014) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("I disagree the officers are entitled to qualified immunity for the shooting of Michael Partlow. Instead, I believe a jury should determine whether the officers violated Partlow's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. I therefore respectfully dissent from Part II.B. of the decision reversing the district court. The officers argue, and the majority agrees, it is undisputed the officers perceived themselves to be in danger, and thus they were warranted in shooting Partlow. In determining whether there is any genuine factual dispute, this court is supposed to 'view all of the evidence in the light most favorable to [Partlow], drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor.'. . In addition, '[w]e are prohibited from weighing evidence or making credibility determinations at this stage.'. . The majority fails to consider the evidence in the light most favorable to Partlow and improperly makes credibility determinations. For example, the majority credits the officers' testimony and announces, as if a non-disputed fact, that the officers observed Partlow move the gun and reasonably interpreted such movement as a threat. Partlow's evidence, however, raises a question of fact regarding whether Partlow did, in fact, move the shotgun in a way which the officers could have reasonably perceived as threatening. While it is true an act taken on a mistaken perception or belief, if objectively reasonable, does not violate the Fourth Amendment, if the mistaken perception or belief is not objectively reasonable, then a constitutional violation occurs. . . Reasonableness is determined from the point of view of a reasonable officer in the situation, . . . but the facts most favorable to Partlow demonstrate a question of fact remains whether a reasonable officer would have shot Partlow without warning. A jury should determine whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to have the allegedly-mistaken perception or belief Partlow posed an immediate threat to their safety, i.e., whether it was reasonable for the officers to believe Partlow was going to imminently shoot them. Evidence presented by Partlow indicates he was not threatening the officers; he was not holding the gun in a shooting position; he was talking on the phone rather than aiming the gun; he was turning his back to the officers at the time he exited the building; the officers were tactically hiding themselves; the officers failed to give Partlow any meaningful verbal warning before employing deadly force; Partlow responded to the officers by turning to place the gun on the ground rather than firing; and the most senior and experienced officer did not fire his weapon. Even given the fact Partlow was holding a gun, Partlow's 'evidence create[s] genuine issues of material fact concerning whether the force used was objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting [the officers].'. . A jury should also determine whether a warning under these circumstances was feasible. Partlow has presented evidence showing the officers failed to warn Partlow of their presence and failed to meaningly [sic] warn Partlow they intended to shoot. An officer's failure to assess the situation and give any feasible warning 'adds to the unreasonableness' of an officer's actions. . . Because the officers' actions are not protected by qualified immunity, I would affirm the district court.")

Williams v. Holley, 764 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Holley contends there is insufficient evidence for a reasonable juror to find his decision to use lethal force against Cletis was unreasonable. Holley, in essence, contends the court is bound to accept his version of events because he is the only surviving eyewitness of the altercation. Holley, however, overlooks the circumstantial evidence which shows possible inconsistencies with Holley's account of the shooting. As the district court found, the circumstantial evidence raised questions of fact regarding material aspects of Holley's account of the event. We must view these inconsistencies in the light most favorable to Roseetta, giving Roseetta the benefit of all reasonable inferences. [citing Tolan]")

Smith v. City of Brooklyn Park, 757 F.3d 765, 773, 774 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In Thompson, an officer chased a suspect who ran between two buildings and climbed over a fence. . . According to the officer, the suspect 'got up from the ground, looked over his shoulder at [the officer], and moved his arms as though reaching for a weapon at waist level.'. . The suspect had turned his back toward the officer and 'obscured his hands from [the officer's] view.'. . The officer yelled for the suspect to 'stop,' but the suspect's 'arms continued to move'; the officer 'fired a single shot into [the suspect's] back just below his right shoulder blade.'. . The suspect died from the gunshot, and no weapon was recovered from his body. . . Another officer, 'who had followed most of the foot chase in a patrol car, stated that he attempted to look down the space between the two buildings where he had seen [the suspect] and [the officer] run, but that he neither saw nor heard the shooting, leaving [the officer] as the lone surviving witness to the shooting.'. . The deceased suspect's family members filed suit under § 1983 alleging excessive force in violation of the deceased's constitutional rights. . . The district court granted summary judgment to the officer, the officer's supervisor, and the city. . . On appeal, we 'conclude[d] that summary judgment was appropriate' where the officer's 'use of force, as he describe[d] it, was within the bounds of the Fourth Amendment, and all of the evidence presented to the district court [was] consistent with that account.'. . .[A]s in Thompson, we conclude that Officers Cudd and Glirbas describe a scene in which the use of deadly force was constitutionally permissible. Their account is strengthened by statements from other officers and the transcript of the 911 call. No genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether Kolski made threats and possessed a firearm. As the district court correctly found, '[t]here is no evidence in the record that Kolski was unarmed when he was killed.'")

Walton v. Dawson, 752 F.3d 1109, 1124 (8th Cir. 2014) (With respect to claim against jail administrator, Moore, "[t]he partial dissent . . . places weight on Walton's failure to express fear, which is evidence a reasonable jury could, but need not, credit. . . Credibility is the province of the jury, and after observing live testimony, a reasonable jury could easily credit Walton's explanation that he was too afraid (given Flennory's death threats) to express fear or call for help. . . . Apparently, the partial dissent disagrees with our view of the record in the light most favorable to Walton. . . 'If three reasonable judges disagree about the facts contained in the record, surely the factual dispute is genuine enough to require resolution by a reasonable jury.'. . This is especially true on an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, for we have no jurisdiction to supplant the district court's reasonable (i.e., not blatantly contradicted) interpretation of the factual record.")

Walton v. Dawson, 752 F.3d 1109, 1125, 1126 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Even if the district court is right that Sheriff Dawson may not have responded reasonably to Flennory's earlier assault of another inmate, that factual question alone is an insufficient basis to deny qualified immunity under Farmer's subjective standard. It is not enough to say a factual question exists: the factual dispute must be both 'genuine' and 'material.'. . All of Walton's evidence on subjective knowledge relates only to Moore's knowledge, not Sheriff Dawson's. Contrary to the district court's wholesale pronouncement that both officials must have known the risk, the undisputed evidence supports Sheriff Dawson's claim of qualified immunity. Sheriff Dawson's response to the sexual assault (expressing justified outrage, reprimanding Bilinski, and disciplining Moore) gives every indication that he, unlike Moore, did not know inmates like Walton were in jeopardy. Having carefully reviewed the record in an effort to deduce what facts about Sheriff Dawson's own knowledge 'the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed,'. . . we have found nothing but 'speculation, conjecture, or fantasy' to rebut Sheriff Dawson's testimony that he did not know of the substantial risk posed by Moore's failure to train Bilinski, Schmidt v. City of Bella Villa, 557 F.3d 564, 571 (8th Cir.2009). Because guesswork is not enough to reach a jury, we conclude Sheriff Dawson is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Coker v. Arkansas State Police, 734 F.3d 838, 843 (8th Cir. 2013) ("When drawing all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Coker, we cannot conclude that Cartwright's use of force once out of view of the dash camera was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. Rather, a reasonable jury could find that the severity of Coker's injuries demonstrates excessive force, particularly Cartwright's decision to strike Coker using a metal flashlight after Coker was already on the ground and allegedly complying with Cartwright's demands. . .Without the aid of video or an understandable audio recording, it is impossible to determine what happened that night after Coker ran out of view of the camera without weighing Cartwright's version of events against Coker's story. Making credibility determinations or weighing evidence in this manner is improper at the summary judgment stage, and 'it is not our function to remove the credibility assessment from the jury.'. . We reverse and remand, leaving it to a jury to decide whose story is more plausible.")

Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 n.4 (8th Cir. Sept. 2013) ("Under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, the district court seems to have concluded that a jury question existed as to whether a reasonable officer in Officer King's position would have believed his conduct was lawful. Although a jury is to decide predicate facts, the ultimate question of qualified immunity is one for the court. Littrell v. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578, 584–85 (8th Cir.2004). That is, the court must determine objective legal reasonableness and 'whether the facts alleged ... support a claim of violation of clearly established law.'. . Thus, we make this legal determination based upon summary judgment facts viewed in the light most favorable to Thompson.")

Luckert v. Dodge County, 684 F.3d 808, 817 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Qualified immunity is a legal question for the court, not the jury, to decide in the first instance, based either on the allegations or, if material facts are in dispute, on the facts found by the jury. See Littrell v. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578, 584–85 (8th Cir.2004) (explaining "[t]he law of our circuit is clear .... [that] qualified immunity is a question of law for the court, rather than the jury, to decide"). Whether the official's conduct constitutes deliberate indifference is a question of fact for the jury").

Luckert v. Dodge County, 684 F.3d 808, 821 (8th Cir. 2012) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("The United States Supreme Court has been clear on what the governing standard of review at this stage of the proceedings must be. As the Court recently explained, when 'defendants continue to urge qualified immunity [in a post-verdict motion], the decisive question ... is whether the evidence favoring the party seeking relief is legally sufficient to overcome the defense.' Ortiz v. Jordan, 131 S.Ct. 884, 889 (2011) (citing Fed.R.Civ.P. 50). In reviewing the appellants' challenge, therefore, we are bound to consider only whether the evidence presented at trial is sufficient to overcome their defense of qualified immunity. Based on the record before us, I am convinced the evidence is not only sufficient, it is indeed, overwhelming.")

Lee v. Anderson, 616 F.3d 803, 811 (8th Cir. 2010) ("The first question on the special verdict form asked the jury whether it found in favor of the plaintiff on the claim of excessive force. The form instructed the jury to proceed to the second question if its answer was yes. The second question asked: Was Andersen 'objectively reasonable in his belief that his use of deadly force was necessary to protect himself or another from apparent death or great bodily harm?' Lee objected to the second question, arguing that the issue of qualified immunity is a question of law for the court to decide. The district court overruled the objection, stating that the question was tailored to allow the jury to make predicate factual findings necessary for the court's qualified immunity ruling. The jury found that Andersen did not use excessive force against Fong Lee and thus did not reach the second question. Lee contends that the district court committed reversible error in submitting the second question to the jury and in failing to define 'objectively reasonable.' . . . Lee misstates the law when she argues that Littrell v. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578 (8th Cir.2004), 'held it would be reversible error to submit a question regarding qualified immunity to the jury.'

In Littrell, we held that the district court erred in submitting to the jury the question whether the officer reasonably believed that his actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. . . In reaching our holding, we determined that carefully drafted special interrogatories may be submitted to the jury to resolve any questions of historical fact so that 'the court may make the ultimate legal determination of whether officers' actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law.'. . The district court's stated purpose in submitting the second question to the jury was to allow the jury to make predicate factual findings, a practice that is permitted under Littrell. Given the jury instruction on excessive force, however, it appears that the second question reiterated the first question. Had the jury answered yes to the first question, it necessarily would have found that Andersen used force that was not reasonably necessary–that is, greater force than a reasonable officer would have used under similar circumstances–to protect himself or others from death or great bodily harm. But the jury found that Andersen did not use excessive force and thus never reached the second question. The finding of no excessive force mooted Andersen's affirmative defense of qualified immunity and rendered harmless any error in failing to define 'objectively reasonable.'")

Rohrbough v. Hall, 586 F.3d 582, 586, 587(8th Cir. 2009) ("We think that our prior cases are clear that the matter of whether the constitutional right at issue was 'clearly established' is a question of law for the court to decide. See, e.g., Littrell v. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578, 584- 85 (8th Cir.2004). We have explicitly held that in deciding this kind of case, the conduct 'was either Areasonabl[e] under settled law in the circumstances," or it was not, and this is a determination of law.'. . Although language from our recent case, Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services. . . seems to suggest that the question is one for a 'reasonable factfinder,' we went on in Nelson to determine the matter for ourselves. . . . We do not believe, then, that Nelson, in making an isolated reference to a 'reasonable factfinder,' intended to overrule our precedents establishing that qualified immunity is a question of law, an issue that we have previously described as 'clear.' Littrell, 388 F.3d at 584. Once the facts are established, 'a court should always be able to determine as a matter of law whether or not an officer is eligible for qualified immunity–that is, whether or not the officer acted reasonably under settled law given the particular set of facts.'. . We note that Officer Hall's account of what happened between him and Mr. Rohrbough differs significantly from the facts assumed for purposes of summary judgment. Summary judgment is not appropriate where, as here, a dispute remains regarding facts material to the qualified immunity issue. . . But Officer Hall may continue to assert qualified immunity at trial, where the factual issues will be resolved by a jury.").

Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1007 n.5 (8th Cir. 2007) ("In ruling on Officer Bruce's motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity , the district court stated that 'the record ... contains evidence sufficient for a jury to conclude that the law prohibiting unreasonable searches–determined by the search's scope, manner, justification, and location–was clearly established at the time of the search, and that the law's application to Defendant's actions was evident.' The district court should have analyzed this question as a matter of law without regard to the jury's verdict.").

Littrell v. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578, 581-87 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Officer Franklin did not raise the issue [of qualified immunity] until trial, when he asserted it as a defense. The district court presented the qualified immunity question to the jury in the form of an interrogatory. The verdict form posed four questions. The first asked, 'Do you find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that defendant Franklin used excessive force when he arrested plaintiff on February 9, 2001?' The jury responded, 'Yes.' The second interrogatory asked, 'Do you find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that defendant Franklin reasonably believed that his conduct on February 9, 2001, with respect to the plaintiff, was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules clearly established at that time?' Again, the jury responded, 'Yes.' Because of its affirmative response to the second interrogatory, the jury was instructed not to answer the third and fourth questions on the verdict form, which pertained to damages. In accordance with the jury's response to the second interrogatory, the district court entered judgment in favor of Officer Franklin, finding that he was entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .In Ms. Littrell's appeal, [footnote omitted] she argues that the district court's submission of the second interrogatory to the jury was erroneous because the reasonableness of an officer's actions in light of clearly established law is a question of law for the court, and not the jury, to determine. . . .The district court properly submitted the issue of excessive force to the jury, and the jury found that Officer Franklin violated Ms. Littrell's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . . After the jury found that Officer Franklin used excessive force when he apprehended Ms. Littrell, it found (in the form of its response to interrogatory number two) that he reasonably believed his actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. Ms. Littrell contends that the district court erroneously submitted this second question to the jury because the court–not the jury–is charged with determining whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. Ms. Littrell does not contend that the second interrogatory misstated the law of qualified immunity. Rather, she argues merely that the district court itself should have made the qualified immunity ruling. Ms. Littrell is correct. The law of our circuit is clear. The issue of qualified immunity is a question of law for the court, rather than the jury, to decide . . . . The issue of qualified immunity, however, is frequently intertwined with unresolved factual questions. Where, as in this case, factual questions prevent a district court from ruling on the issue of qualified immunity, it is appropriate to tailor special interrogatories specific to the facts of the case. This practice allows the jury to make any requisite factual findings that the district court may then rely upon to make its own qualified immunity ruling. . . . On the facts of this case, special interrogatories should have asked (1) whether Ms. Littrell resisted arrest before Officer Franklin forcibly restrained her and (2) whether Officer Franklin knew Ms. Littrel was injured when he continued to handcuff and forcibly place her in the car. Specific findings on these questions of fact would have enabled the district court to address the legal issue of qualified immunity through reference to excessive force standards that are clearly established. . . . In short, where questions of historical fact exist, the jury must resolve those questions so that the court may make the ultimate legal determination of whether officers' actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . The specific contours of a plaintiff's rights may be established through reference to prior cases. Carefully drafted interrogatories allow jurors to decide factual issues and preserve the ultimate legal determination for the court. It is error, however, to submit the ultimate question of qualified immunity to the jury. Our inquiry, however, does not end here. The district court relied on Fifth Circuit precedent when it submitted the qualified immunity question to the jury. . . . Ms. Littrell objected to neither this practice nor the content of the second interrogatory submitted to the jury. She does not argue that she offered alternate instructions that the district court rejected. We, therefore, review the district court's judgment only for plain error. . . . Submission of the qualified immunity issue to the jury was wholly consistent with the practice of the Fifth Circuit. Although different from our own practice, we do not think the Fifth Circuit's practice is fundamentally unfair or in any way threatens the integrity of the judicial process. Importantly, the Supreme Court has not censured the Fifth Circuit's practice. This is true even though there exists a split among the circuits as to the proper apportionment of responsibility between juries and judges in this context. [footnote omitted] Against this backdrop, we do not find that reliance on the practice of the Fifth Circuit resulted in the sort of error that we may properly characterize as plain error.").

Lampkins v. McKinley*, 311 F.3d 899, 902 (8th Cir.2002) (qualified immunity defense raised in answer not waived when first reasserted in post-trial motion). Jones v. Shields, 207 F.3d 491, 499, 500 (8th Cir. 2000) (Richard S. Arnold, J., dissenting) ("Today the Court holds that Shields failed to show more than a de minimis injury, and that Jones's use of capstun was a justified and 'tempered response' to control the 'recalcitrant inmate' Shields. . . The Court appears to be reviewing this case as if it were a jury. It looks at the evidence and draws reasonable inferences in favor of the defendant, rather than the plaintiff. I believe Shields's testimony, which must be taken as true in the present context, was sufficient to create a genuine issue of fact. . . . I am at a loss to understand how the Court can uphold a judgment as a matter of law on this record. To be sure, Shields had been recalcitrant, but at the time he was sprayed with capstun he was being completely obedient. There was no justification for the use of additional force at that point. . . . [T]he effect of the Court's opinion in this case is to give a blank check to prison employees to spray capstun in inmates' faces for no reason. Physical force cannot legitimately be applied to punish an inmate for past misconduct. It should be used only to compel compliance with a lawful order or to quell current disobedience. I suspect that the Magistrate and District Judges who handled this case will be as startled as I am at the result the Court reaches today. It is possible, perhaps even likely, that a jury would return a verdict for defendants, with or without Jones's testimony, but I cannot agree that sufficient facts to create a jury issue have not been made out. I respectfully dissent.").

This does not mean, however, that courts may always decide questions of qualified immunity on summary judgment. If the arrestee challenges the officer's description of the facts and presents a factual account where a reasonable officer would not be justified in making an arrest, then a material dispute of fact exists. Where there is a genuine issue of material fact surrounding the question of plaintiff's conduct, we cannot determine, as a matter of law, what predicate facts exist to decide whether or not the officer's conduct clearly violated established law.).

Applying Saucier, the court [in Hummel] reasoned that the doctrine announced in that case 'has the effect of taking some jury questions away from the jury, but that is precisely why qualified immunity is a principle of law, not fact.' . . An official asserting qualified immunity has the burden of proving the defense. . . When a defendant asserts qualified immunity, the plaintiff has the burden to show that a question of fact precludes summary judgment. . . NINTH CIRCUIT

Simmons v. Arnett, No. 20-55043, 2022 WL 3906207, at *7–13 (9th Cir. Aug. 31, 2022) (Arterton, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur with the majority's conclusion that the district courts grant of summary judgment in favor of Nurse Lopez should be affirmed on the view that her conduct did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. I respectfully dissent, however, from the majority's grant of qualified immunity to Officer Arnett. Specifically, I am troubled by the majority's determination that Officer Arnett's actions did not violate clearly established law, and its decision to rule on qualified immunity while key facts are still in dispute. The majority's decision runs afoul of Ninth Circuit precedent requiring courts to settle factual disputes material to that inquiry before assessing a prison official's entitlement to qualified immunity as discussed below. In my view, the qualified immunity analysis in this case depends on the resolution of the parties two divergent narratives. Simmons's version of events describes him as a passive victim, helpless to even find cover from an assault when Officer Arnett shot him three times. His account demonstrates a violation of his constitutional right to be free from force applied for the very purpose of causing harm. . . Additionally, viewing the specific context of the incident in the light most favorable to Simmons, his right was clearly established such that a reasonable prison guard in Officer Arnett's position would have been aware that his conduct was impermissible. . . But under Officer Arnett's retelling, Simmons was not helpless, or at least not obviously so. If Officer Arnett is believed, while there may have been a constitutional violation, his actions would not violate clearly established law. The majority chooses to grant qualified immunity despite being presented with two fundamentally inconsistent accounts of this case's critical moments. In concluding that Officer Arnett did not violate clearly established law on an incomplete view of the relevant facts, the majority's approach diverges from the one established by qualified immunity precedent in this circuit. Upon review of all the facts, disputed and undisputed, I cannot endorse the majority's formulation of the law. Accordingly, I would reverse the district courts grant of summary judgment in favor of Officer Arnett and remand for trial determination the factual disputes prior to deciding his entitlement to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . Simmons's right to be free from excessive force must be tested in 'a particular context.'. . Thus, the question that remains is whether a reasonable prison guard in Officer Arnett's position could have believed his use of force was a good faith attempt to restore order in the situation he confronted. . . I believe that the factual dispute in this case leaves that question unanswerable at this juncture. Resolution of the difference between Simmons's testimony that he was clearly the cowering victim of an attack and Officer Arnett's view that Simmons was an able-bodied combatant is central to a determination about the reasonableness of Officer Arnett's decision to shoot Simmons three times. The majority dismissed this distinction as unpersuasive when considering Simmons's and Officer Arnett's factual accounts as part of its Eighth Amendment analysis. But the Ninth Circuit has repeatedly found a dispute of this nature between prisoners and prison guards pivotal in refusing to grant qualified immunity. . . .Thus, the dispute about Simmons's behavior in response to the attack should be settled by a jury before a court decides Officer Arnett's entitlement to qualified immunity.[1] [fn. 1: I am cognizant of the principle that qualified immunity disputes generally ought to be resolved at the 'earliest possible stage in litigation.' However, this is usually possible 'because qualified immunity most often turns on legal determinations, not disputed facts.'. . Morales also recognized that while the trend in the Ninth Circuit has been resolving qualified immunity at summary judgment, situations still arise where a qualified immunity case must go to trial 'because disputed factual issues remain.'. . In that situation, qualified immunity 'is transformed from a doctrine providing immunity from suit to one providing a defense at trial.'. . The Ninth Circuits Manual of Model Civil Jury Instructions also recognizes that the situation may arise, explaining that '[w]hen there are disputed factual issues that are necessary to a qualified immunity decision, these issues must first be determined by the jury before the court can rule on qualified immunity.' Ninth Circuit Model Civil Jury Instruction 9.34 (2017).] To be sure, qualified immunity affords prison officers grace to make reasonable mistakes under pressure. But the dispute between Simmons's set of facts, which would demonstrate that he was a passive victim, and Officer Arnett's facts, which would establish that he perceived Simmons as a combatant, requires trial resolution. While both accounts could potentially coexist in theory, their divergence raises legitimate doubts about the reasonableness of Officer Arnett's claimed perception of mutual combat as the justification for shooting Simmons three times. . . That dispute needs to be resolved before considering qualified immunity for Officer

Arnett because it is centrally relevant to the question of whether a reasonable prison guard would know that he or she violated clearly established law by shooting Simmons in that situation.")

J. K. J. v. City of San Diego, 42 F.4th 990, 999, 1001 (9th Cir. 2021) (amended opinion) ("We begin with the clearly established prong. Thus, unless J.K.J. can show that on the date the officers encountered Jenkins, it was clearly established that their conduct was unlawful, qualified immunity applies under prong two. . . . Neither Gibson nor the other two cases cited by J.K.J. presented circumstances where an officer had to grapple with how to handle a detainee who exhibited signs of medical distress but explained them away. . . J.K.J. fails to satisfy the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test with binding precedent, so he turns instead to the decisions of district courts. . . . In sum, J.K.J. has failed to carry his burden of showing that the alleged unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time they encountered Jenkins. We conclude that Taub and Durbin are entitled to qualified immunity under prong two, and that the District Court properly dismissed J.K.J.'s denial of medical care claim against them.[4] [fn.4: We must pause here to address the dissent's critique of our qualified immunity analysis. The dissent asserts that the second prong turns on whether an accused officer made a mistake of fact or a mistake of law. According to the dissent, if an officer made a mistake of law, the Court looks to precedent for factually analogous circumstances showing that the law was clearly established; but if the officer made a mistake of fact, the Court simply evaluates that mistake for reasonableness without looking to precedent. Not so. We have repeatedly held that courts should look to precedent for evidence that the unlawfulness of an officer's conduct is clearly established. . . . Even assuming Officer Durbin made a mistake of fact, he would still be entitled to qualified immunity if he was also mistaken about his legal obligations on summoning medical care when an arrestee is experiencing a non-obvious medical emergency. . . To analyze Officer Durbin's legal obligations, we still must turn to precedent to look for a clearly established right. So even under the dissent's framework, we cannot ignore precedent.]")

J. K. J. v. City of San Diego, 42 F.4th 990, 1010-13 (9th Cir. 2021) (amended opinion) (Watford, J., dissenting in part) ("In short, J.K.J. has stated a claim that Officer Durbin's actions were objectively unreasonable and thus violated the governing legal standards under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . The remaining question is whether qualified immunity shields Officer Durbin from liability. The majority opinion concludes that it does, but that conclusion is flawed for one simple reason: An officer cannot claim qualified immunity based on an unreasonable mistake of fact, and J.K.J. has plausibly alleged here that Officer Durbin's mistake of fact as to Ms. Jenkins's medical condition was indeed unreasonable. The Supreme Court has instructed us to analyze the issue of qualified immunity in two steps. The first focuses on whether the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right, the second on whether that right was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . We have already addressed the first step: As discussed above, J.K.J. has plausibly alleged that Officer Durbin violated both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments by denying medical care to Ms. Jenkins under circumstances that rendered his conduct objectively unreasonable. At the second step, we ask whether the legal constraints governing Officer Durbin's conduct were sufficiently clear 'such that any reasonably well-trained officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful.'. . An officer may be entitled to qualified immunity at the second step based on a mistake of fact or law, but in either scenario the mistake must be a reasonable one. . .In this case, Officer Durbin did not make a mistake of law—that is, a mistake 'as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.'. . Ms. Jenkins exhibited obvious signs that she was experiencing a serious medical emergency, and the legal constraints governing an officer's conduct in those circumstances were clearly established. Any reasonable officer would have known that failing to summon immediate medical care for an arrestee experiencing a medical emergency is unlawful. . . Thus, if Officer Durbin had correctly perceived that Ms. Jenkins's signs of medical distress were real and not contrived, he could not have made a reasonable mistake 'as to the legality of [his] actions.'. . What the law required in this situation was not open to debate. . . The mistake Officer Durbin made was instead a mistake of fact: He mistakenly believed that Ms. Jenkins was 'faking' her symptoms rather than experiencing an actual medical emergency. But as we and other courts have squarely held, if an officer's mistake of fact is unreasonable, he is not entitled to qualified immunity based on that mistake. . . The dispositive question, then, is whether Officer Durbin reasonably but mistakenly believed Ms. Jenkins's medical distress was feigned. At this stage of the case, Officer Durbin cannot be granted qualified immunity because J.K.J. has plausibly alleged that Officer Durbin's mistake of fact was unreasonable. As noted earlier, the many objective signs of medical distress exhibited by Ms. Jenkins offered no support for the notion that she was engaged in some kind of ruse. The video alone plausibly suggests that any reasonable officer observing the dramatic decline in Ms. Jenkins's condition over the course of an hour would have realized that her vomiting, abnormally rapid breathing, inability to sit or stand, and loss of control of her limbs were all signs of a true medical emergency, not part of an elaborate act. When an officer's actions are based on an unreasonable mistake of fact, we determine whether the law governing the officer's conduct was clearly established under the facts that the officer should have correctly perceived. . . Under those facts here, as already discussed, Officer Durbin's actions violated Ms. Jenkins's clearly established right to have medical care summoned immediately. . .The preceding discussion explains why the majority opinion wrongly faults J.K.J. for failing to cite cases finding a constitutional violation in directly analogous circumstances. . . That failing would be relevant if we were dealing with an officer whose conduct was based on a mistake of law. In that context, a plaintiff will often need to marshal cases involving factually analogous circumstances to show that the law was clearly established. . . After all, broad legal concepts that are designed to 'accommodate limitless factual circumstances,' such as excessive force and probable cause, can leave considerable uncertainty about 'how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . No such need to marshal factually analogous cases exists when an officer's conduct is based on a mistake of fact. The key question in that setting is whether the officer's mistake was reasonable or not—a factual issue that the jury must resolve when, as in this case, the underlying facts (or the inferences to be drawn from those facts) are in dispute. . . Whether an officer's mistake of fact was reasonable is assuredly not a legal question, and hence the hunt for analogous cases is both unnecessary and futile. One will search the pages of the Federal Reporter in vain looking for guidance on whether a particular collection of facts shows that someone is suffering a real as opposed to a feigned medical emergency. Deciding the reasonableness of an officer's mistake as to that issue requires drawing on common sense and everyday lived experience rather than a study of legal precedents, which is precisely why resolution of the issue is entrusted to juries in the first place. The majority opinion's characterization of this case as one concerning a mistake of law—in which Officer Durbin was 'mistaken about his legal obligations on summoning medical care when an arrestee is experiencing a non-obvious medical emergency'—cannot be squared with the record. . . Officer Durbin did not, as the majority opinion suggests, make a mistake as to whether the law required him to summon medical care because the signs of medical distress Ms. Jenkins exhibited were 'non-obvious.' As the video confirms, those signs were as obvious as could be; Officer Durbin decided to ignore them because he thought (incorrectly) that she was 'faking' her condition. . . Whether his mistake of fact was reasonable cannot be resolved at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . .In sum, the district court erred by dismissing J.K.J.'s claims against Officer Durbin. J.K.J. has adequately pleaded both a survival claim on Ms. Jenkins's behalf under the Fourth Amendment and a claim on his own behalf under the Fourteenth Amendment. We should have reversed the dismissal of those claims and remanded for further proceedings.")

Banks-Reed v. Mateu, No. 19-17444, 2022 WL 486607, at *1–2 & n.1 (9th Cir. Feb. 17, 2022) (not reported) ("Based on the totality of the circumstances reflected in the trial record, the jury could reasonably conclude that Tindle was surrendering, that Mateu's failure to recognize that Tindle was surrendering was unreasonable, and that Mateu's use of deadly force was constitutionally excessive.[1] [fn. 1: To the extent Mateu argues that, even if the jury found that Tindle was surrendering, it would not have been objectively unreasonable for Mateu to fail to recognize that fact, we disagree. The jury was instructed that it 'must judge the reasonableness of a particular use of force from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene and not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . The best interpretation of the jury's response to the special interrogatory on surrender was that it found a reasonable officer would have perceived Tindle was surrendering. To the extent there is ambiguity about whether the jury was answering a different question, the district court correctly noted that the parties submitted the special interrogatories and waived any objection to their wording. To be sure, the jury's findings that Tindle was surrendering and that Mateu's failure to recognize that fact was objectively unreasonable are not the only conclusions that could be drawn from the evidence. We cannot, however, substitute our judgment for that of the unanimous jury.] Because the evidence does not compel a conclusion contrary to the jury's verdict, relief under Rule 50(b) is unavailable. . . Mateu argues that, even if there were sufficient evidence to support the jury's factual determinations, he is entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law declaring his conduct unconstitutional. Where, as here, the issue of a constitutional violation has gone to trial, the jury's view of the facts—which can properly be inferred from the jury's verdict, the theories presented at trial, and the responses to special interrogatories—governs the analysis. . . When making the legal determination whether the violated constitutional right was clearly established, the review of the case law 'must be particularized to the facts of the case' as found by the jury. . . .Given the findings of fact at issue here, we hold that a reasonable officer in Mateu's position would have known that shooting a suspect who, though armed, was trying to surrender violates the Fourth Amendment. The law prohibiting police officers from seizing 'an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead' in the absence of 'probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others' is clearly established. . . While the facts of Torres and Garner are not precisely on point because the jury found that Tindle possessed the gun when Mateu fired, existing case law clearly establishes that mere possession of a gun does not justify lethal force. . . The jury found that Tindle was attempting to surrender, rejected Mateu's argument that he was compelled to shoot because Tindle was threatening Newton, and concluded that a reasonable officer in Mateu's position would have perceived these facts. Based on the jury's findings, a competent officer in Mateu's position would have understood that the use of lethal force against an armed but surrendering suspect was unconstitutional.")

Hunter v. City of Federal Way, 806 F. App'x 518, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Durell argues that the district court erroneously refused to submit special interrogatories to the jury because such interrogatories might have strengthened his qualified immunity defense. But there is 'no authority from this circuit supporting the proposition that special interrogatories are required for the purpose of evaluating a post-verdict qualified immunity defense.' Hung Lam v. City of San Jose, 869 F.3d 1077, 1086 (9th Cir. 2017).")

Nehad v. Browder, 929 F.3d 1125, 1140-41 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 235 (2020) ("Courts may examine either prong first, depending on the relevant circumstances. . . Here, the district court granted Browder qualified immunity on the second prong. A review of the district court's order, however, reveals that the court construed the facts in the light most favorable to Browder, asserting as established fact not only Browder's version of events, but also other facts favorable to Browder, such as the disputed fact that Browder verbally warned Nehad to 'Stop[,] Drop it.' '[W]hen there are disputed factual issues that are necessary to a qualified immunity decision, these issues must first be determined by the jury before the court can rule on qualified immunity.'. . As discussed above, there are numerous genuine disputes of material fact, which preclude a grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity. . . .Under Appellants' version of the facts, Browder responded to a misdemeanor call, pulled his car into a well-lit alley with his high beam headlights shining into Nehad's face, never identified himself as a police officer, gave no commands or warnings, and then shot Nehad within a matter of seconds, even though Nehad was unarmed, had not said anything, was not threatening anyone, and posed little to no danger to Browder or anyone else. Appellees cannot credibly argue that the prohibition on the use of deadly force under these circumstances was not clearly established in 2015.")

Easley v. City of Riverside, 765 F.App'x 282, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) ("In this case, based on testimony elicited at the sua sponte evidentiary hearing, the district court resolved disputed factual issues, some of which required the court to assess witnesses' credibility. Resolving disputed issues of fact and making credibility determinations are not permitted at the summary judgment stage. Because there were disputed issues of fact, and in light of the parties' joint stipulation, we must reverse the entry of summary judgment and remand for trial. The defendant officers may still seek qualified immunity by filing a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50(a) motion before the case is submitted to the jury, as outlined in Tortu v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 556 F.3d 1075, 1083 (9th Cir. 2009); see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 50(a).")

Easley v. City of Riverside, 765 F. App'x 282, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Graber, J., with whom Berzon, Christen, and Hurwitz, JJ., join, concurring) ("I write separately to add that, in my view, a district court may not—as the court did here—sua sponte raise the issue of qualified immunity (or any other non-jurisdictional affirmative defense) when the defendant has waived that issue. . . .Here, the waiver pertained only to summary judgment, but that is precisely the waiver that the district court failed to respect. Defendant Macias affirmatively waived the qualified-immunity affirmative defense, both in writing and orally, for the purpose of summary judgment; that is, he agreed to go to trial on that affirmative defense. And there was consideration for his promise; he agreed not to move for summary judgment in exchange for Plaintiff's dismissing certain claims. I would hold, therefore, that the district court improperly injected the issue of qualified immunity into a pretrial summary judgment proceeding.")

Easley v. City of Riverside, 765 F. App'x 282, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Berzon, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority disposition and in Judge Graber's concurrence. I write separately to note another basis for reversing the district court: I would hold that an evidentiary hearing to determine whether summary judgment is appropriate is never permitted. The district court erred in using such a procedure. . . . Here, . . . the district court conducted what was essentially a two-day bench trial, during which Easley, Officer Macias, and multiple witnesses testified on the stand. Far from expediting the case, the district court's evidentiary hearing 'force[d] the parties to endure additional burdens of suit—such as the costs of litigating constitutional questions and delays attributable to resolving them—when the suit otherwise could be disposed of more readily.'. . I join the majority disposition in full. In my view, however, the district court never should have held the evidentiary hearing it ordered sua sponte, whether or not the parties stipulated to bypass summary judgment (as they did), and whether or not the court held the hearing with the intent to make credibility findings improper on summary judgment (as it did).")

Estate of Elkins v. Pelayo, 737 F. App'x 830, 833 (9th Cir. 2018) ("In Cruz, we stated: 'To decide this case a jury would have to answer just one simple question: Did the police see Cruz reach for his waistband? If they did, they were entitled to shoot; if they didn't, they weren't.' Cruz, 765 F.3d at 1079. Here, because the record contains reasons to doubt whether Officer Pelayo actually saw Elkins reach for his waistband, the decision similarly should be left to the jury. In summary, regarding Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim, a reasonable jury could find on the evidence presented that Elkins was not reaching for his waistband or that, even if he was, the use of deadly force in this case was excessive.")

Estate of Elkins v. Pelayo, 737 F. App'x 830, 834-37 (9th Cir. 2018) (N.R. Smith, J., dissenting) ("In making its decision, the majority ignores the Supreme Court's constant admonition to determine issues of qualified immunity at the earliest stage of litigation by failing to apply the summary judgment rules related to the doctrine of qualified immunity. Let me explain. . .

.Reviewing all of the evidence in the record, there is simply no evidence contradicting Officer Pelayo's testimony. Instead, the evidence corroborates Officer Pelayo's statements. First, Elkins was carrying a methamphetamine pipe near his waistband. Plaintiffs admit that '[g]iven that Elkins landed from a significant height in a crouching position, it is possible that Elkins reached towards the methamphetamine pipe because it was digging into his abdomen or had caused him pain.' In addition, the district court noted that '[s]uspects have been known to discard contraband when fleeing from the police.' Second, Plaintiffs note that Elkins was wearing baggy pants and may have reached for his waistband to pull them up. Surveillance video from the gas station supports this theory. In the video, Elkins appears to reach for and grab his waistband while fleeing his vehicle on foot. Third, Officer Pelayo's contemporaneous statements confirm these uncontroverted facts. . . As the officers approached Elkins after the shooting, Officer Pelayo was yelling 'Why were you reaching? Do you have a gun? Do you have a gun? Why were you reaching for your waistband?' Finally, the testimony of Sergeant Ynclan and Detective Guzman is consistent with Officer Pelayo's statement that Elkins reached for his waistband. In sum, Officer Pelayo was pursuing a suspect, known to use deadly force to escape capture. When Officer Pelayo saw the suspect reach into his waistband, he believed the suspect was attempting to retrieve a weapon. As a result, Officer Pelayo responded with deadly force. . . . Facing a nearly identical factual situation, we have already determined that the use of deadly force is objectively reasonable. In Cruz, officers were pursuing a reportedly armed suspect who displayed 'dangerous and erratic behavior.'. . We determined that '[i]t would be unquestionably reasonable for police to shoot [such] a suspect ... if he reaches for a gun in his waistband, or even if he reaches there for some other reason.'. . Thus, it was reasonable for Officer Pelayo to use deadly force when he saw Elkins reach into his waistband even though Elkins was not in fact armed. . . Consequently, his conduct did not violate Elkins' constitutional rights. On the other hand, even if Officer Pelayo's actions somehow violated a constitutional right, Plaintiffs have not satisfied the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . .Here, even the majority admits Officer Pelayo's use of deadly force may not have violated Elkins' rights. Indeed, Cruz appears to foreclose any other conclusion. . . Thus, Officer Pelayo is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We may not absolve Plaintiffs of their burden of presenting evidence sufficient to survive summary judgment, no matter the tragic circumstances in a case. Here, there is no evidence to contradict Officer Pelayo's statement that Elkins (who had previously tried to run over an officer with his car to escape capture) reached for his waistband. Rather, all of the circumstantial evidence is consistent with Officer Pelayo's statement. Thus, no reasonable jury could find that Elkins did not reach. The majority fails to cite any evidence in the record sufficient to convince a reasonable jury that Elkins did not reach for his waistband. Construing the facts cited by Elkins in his favor, 1) Officer Pelayo was not told that Elkins was armed with a gun, 2) the officers did not find a weapon when they searched Elkins after the shooting, and 3) Elkins' wounds had a back-to-front trajectory. However, none of this evidence shows that Elkins did not reach into his waistband. . . . [T]he fact that the officers did not find a weapon when they searched Elkins does not prove that Elkins did not reach into his waistband. Rather, it merely evidenced that he did not reach into his waistband to retrieve a weapon. Instead, there are other reasons Elkins may have reached into his waistband. As previously noted, Elkins may have reached to grab the methamphetamine pipe or to pull up his baggy pants. . . .Faced with these facts, the majority misapplies the summary judgment standard to reach its outcome. . . . Here, there is no evidence that Elkins did not reach for his waistband nor is there evidence that contradicts Officer Pelayo's statement. Thus, we must grant summary judgment; we cannot deny summary judgment based on mere speculation or 'some metaphysical doubt.'")

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 794-96 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We accept the jury's findings of fact, 'including the [appellants'] subjective intent,' unless the appellants demonstrate that those findings were unsupported by the evidence. . . But while 'only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, ... only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved.'. . . [T]he jury here was instructed that it had to find that (1) appellants 'used excessive and unnecessary force under all of the circumstances'; (2) appellants 'acted maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm'; and (3) 'the acts of the [appellants] caused harm to the [appellees].' As we explained above, Rodriguez has forfeited any argument that his claim should have been analyzed under the more lenient, purely objective, due process standard. Appellants argue that their use of force was justified by the appellees' resistance. In effect, they attack the jury's finding that they violated the Eighth Amendment by acting 'maliciously and sadistically.' This argument is meritless. . . . Appellants also argue that the law regarding their conduct was not clearly established. Though we do 'not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . Though we defer to the jury's reasonable view of the facts, 'the "clearly established" inquiry is a question of law that only a judge can decide.'. . .Analogous Supreme Court and circuit cases decided well before 2008 gave these deputies notice that the malicious and sadistic use of force in responding to a prison disturbance violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . Given these precedents, no reasonable officer in appellants' positions would have believed that beating a prisoner to the point of serious injury, unconsciousness, or hospitalization solely to cause him pain was constitutionally permissible.")

Reese v. County of Sacramento, 888 F.3d 1030, 1037-40 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Here, the jury found Deputy Rose violated Reese's right to be free from excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Rose's entitlement to qualified immunity therefore turns on whether Reese's right was clearly established at the time of the incident in 2011. Joining other circuit courts from around the country, this Court recently determined that the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis is a matter of law to be decided by a judge. Morales v. Fry, 873 F.3d 817, 824–25 (9th Cir. 2017). . . . We recognized, however, that '[a] bifurcation of duties is unavoidable: only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, while only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved.'. . In arguing that his right to be free of excessive force under these circumstances was clearly established, Reese relies on the jury's answer to Question 14, their finding that it did not appear that Reese posed an immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose at the time Rose fired his shot. Reese contends that by making this finding, the jury determined Rose violated Reese's clearly established right not to be subjected to deadly force when he posed no immediate threat to Rose or others. As Morales confirmed, however, the question of whether the right was clearly established is solely for the judge to decide, not the jury. . . Thus, although the jury's finding that Reese posed no immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose addresses the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it does not answer the purely legal question of whether the right was clearly established in this context. Therefore, the district court was within its authority to determine, as a matter of law, whether Deputy Rose was entitled to qualified immunity, even where a jury determined that he violated Reese's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .We agree with the district court that Reese has not identified any sufficiently analogous cases showing that under similar circumstances, a clearly established Fourth Amendment right against the use of deadly force existed at the time of the shooting. The jury determined that when Reese answered the door to his apartment, he had a knife in his hand in an elevated position. Upon seeing Reese in the doorway with the knife, which was very close to where Rose was standing, Brown immediately fired a shot from his rifle at Reese, but missed. After Brown fired the shot, he saw Reese back into the apartment and drop the knife. Rose, who saw Reese when he first opened the door, lost sight of Reese when he backed up into his apartment and after Brown fired at him. Rose then advanced toward the doorway and was surprised to see Reese standing in the apartment. Rose stated that he could not see Reese's hands but upon seeing him, shot Reese in the chest from three to five feet away. Notably, while the jury found that Reese did not brandish the knife at Rose, they also found that at the time Rose fired his shot, he did not see Reese's hands. Although Reese goes to great lengths to remind this Court that we do not demand a case with 'materially similar' factual circumstances or even facts closely analogous to his case, Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002), none of Reese's cited cases demonstrate that the contours of his Fourth Amendment right were sufficiently clear such that 'any reasonable official in [his] shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . Critically, Reese points to no case that considered the relevant question whether Deputy Rose, having come within striking distance of a suspect who had held a knife a fraction of a second before, was objectively unreasonable in using deadly force before determining whether the suspect still possessed the knife. . . .Reese's reliance on our decision in Hughes v. Kisela, 862 F.3d 775 (9th Cir. 2016), only confirms that the law was not clearly established here. In Hughes, we reasoned that an officer's shooting of a plaintiff who was approaching a third party while holding a kitchen knife at her side violated the plaintiff's clearly established rights, where the facts viewed in the plaintiff's favor showed that she was not 'angry or menacing,' officers knew only that she has been using the knife to carve a tree, and the plaintiff did not understand orders to drop the weapon. . . After Reese's appeal was argued, the Supreme Court summarily reversed our decision in Hughes, concluding that it was 'far from an obvious case,' and that none of our precedents squarely governed the facts involved. Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1153, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2018). Given that Rose had greater reason to perceive a threat here, and no luxury of time or distance to discern whether Reese still posed such a threat, the Supreme Court's decision in Kisela v. Hughes further illustrates that Rose is entitled to qualified immunity. None of Reese's cases 'squarely govern' the situation that Rose confronted such that they would have given Rose clear warning that his use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. . . Absent a showing by Reese that the right was clearly established at the time, Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. We therefore affirm the district court's ruling that Deputy Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on that claim.")

Demaree v. Pederson, 887 F.3d 870, 884 (9th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) ("To recap: We do not here deal with a 'general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment,' which 'is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Instead, we have here a very specific line of cases, culminating in Rogers and Mabe, which identified and applied law clearly establishing that children may not be removed from their homes without a court order or warrant absent cogent, fact-focused reasonable cause to believe the children would be imminently subject to physical injury or physical sexual abuse. Rogers, the last in the series before the events in this case, summarized that law and explained why qualified immunity was inapplicable: 'Prior to the events in question, we had repeatedly held that a family's rights were violated if the children were removed absent an imminent risk of serious bodily harm. A reasonable social worker would need nothing more to understand that she may not remove a child from [his or her] home on the basis of a [situation] that does not present such a risk.'. . Mabe, Rogers, and their predecessors thus gave clear notice of the law to social workers responsible for protecting children from sexual abuse and families from unnecessary intrusion. We accordingly reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Pederson and Van Ness.")

Bonivert v. City of Clarkston, 883 F.3d 865, 879-81 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The instance of force at issue on appeal is Combs' use of his taser in 'drive-stun' mode inside Bonivert's home. . . In Mattos, we recognized that use of a taser in drive-stun mode on a person who 'actively resisted arrest,' but posed no 'immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others,' constituted excessive force. 661 F.3d at 445–46. The events of this case took place in 2012, the year after we decided Mattos. The constitutional right was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . .The Supreme Court has cautioned that attempting to decide excessive force cases at summary judgment requires courts to 'slosh our way through the factbound morass of "reasonableness,"' with predictably messy results. . . That is precisely what happened when the district court granted summary judgment. Once the officers broke the windowpane and unlocked the back door, a chaotic and confusing scene unfolded, generating equally confusing and chaotic evidence. To begin, based on the taser video, the district court concluded that Bonivert appeared to move beyond the threshold of the door towards the officers in a manner that caused them to reasonably view Bonivert as a threat, which in turn justified deployment of the tasers in dart mode and the officers' forced entry into the home. The two seconds of video that depict Bonivert's retreat are inconclusive, especially since the shaky footage comes from a taser. . . . The district court decided that the officers' tackling of Bonivert and the repeated use of tasers in drive-stun mode was warranted based on the following disputed facts: Bonivert attacked Combs; Bonivert screamed at the officers and yelled profanities; and Bonivert continued to struggle and failed to obey the officers' commands. Each of these conclusions was based on conflicting testimony, and drew upon the officers' version of events rather than Bonivert's testimony. . . .Taken in the light most favorable to Bonivert, the evidence reflects that Bonivert remained inside the home at all times; that Bonivert did not threaten or advance toward the officers; that Bonivert posed no immediate threat to the officers; that Combs threw Bonivert across the back room; that Bonivert did not resist arrest; and that Combs tasered Bonivert several times in drive-stun mode notwithstanding Bonivert's compliance. The evidence does not justify the district court's conclusion that 'no reasonable jury could find the use of force within the home excessive.' To be sure, the reasonableness inquiry in the context of excessive force balances 'intrusion[s] on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests' against the government's interests. . . But in weighing the evidence in favor of the officers, rather than Bonivert, the district court unfairly tipped that inquiry in the officers' favor. . . Thus, genuine issues of fact 'prevent[ ] a determination of qualified immunity at summary judgment [such] that the case must proceed to trial.'")

Jones v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 873 F.3d 1123, 1130-32d (9th Cir. 2017) ("Here the officers' use of force began appropriately enough: Despite Jones's large size and the fact that he had run away from a traffic stop, he had neither threatened Hatten nor committed a serious offense, and he didn't appear to have a weapon. Based on these facts, Hatten believed that something less than deadly force was justified, so he used his taser to subdue Jones. This decision was consistent with our case law, as we've held that use of tasers can be intermediate force. . . Using a taser to stop Jones and place him under arrest was reasonable under the circumstances. As the situation evolved, however, the justification for the use of force waned. The four other officers at the scene gave somewhat inconsistent accounts about their continued use of force. What is clear is that Hatten continued to apply his taser to Jones and English also applied his taser twice, even as Jones was being handcuffed. By the time Jones was prone and surrounded by multiple officers, there would have been no continuing justification for using intermediate force: Jones was on the ground after his body 'locked up' as a result of repeated taser shocks; he had no weapon and was making no threatening sounds or gestures. There is a triable issue of fact as to whether the officers were reasonable in the degree of force they deployed at that point. . . .Based on this evidence, a jury could reasonably conclude that the officers knew or should have known that their use of tasers created a substantial risk of serious injury or death. Thus, there are triable issues of fact as to whether the officers' continuous and simultaneous tasing was reasonable under the circumstances, and whether the officers were on notice that the force they used could cause serious injury or death. . . . [C]ontinuous, repeated and simultaneous tasings are different from isolated shocks. . . . Such force generally can't be used on a prone suspect who exhibits no resistance, carries no weapon, is surrounded by sufficient officers to restrain him and is not suspected of a violent crime. Given that there was clearly established Fourth Amendment law and a jury could reasonably conclude that the officers used excessive force, the question of qualified immunity must proceed to trial.")

Longoria v. Pinal County, 873 F.3d 699, 704-11 (9th Cir. 2017) ("We acknowledge at the outset that in the last five years, the Supreme Court has reversed a number of federal courts, including ours, in qualified immunity cases because we failed to abide by the longstanding principle that '"clearly established law" should not be defined at a high level of generality.'. . This has been a particular problem in cases presenting novel factual circumstances involving car chases. Here, although preceded by a car chase, the shooting occurred after the pursuit ended and Longoria's vehicle was disabled, as described above. This is not one of those cases occurring mid-pursuit against a 'hazy legal backdrop.'. . Nor is this like other recent cases the Court has reversed. We do not rely on a factor mentioned in prior case law but not clearly established such that a reasonable officer would be on notice to conform his conduct accordingly, . . . or define a constitutional violation at too high a level of generality to be clearly established[.]. . Here we must assess Rankin's reasonableness in using deadly force against Longoria, who was unarmed, was surrounded by law enforcement officers, had been shot by bean bag rounds and a taser, and was in the process of putting his hands over his head reflexively or in an effort to surrender. Rankin claims that when Longoria turned to raise his hands he threatened him or his fellow officers with a 'shooter's stance.' Because of the many material, disputed facts in this case, Rankin's credibility or the accuracy of his version of the facts is a central question that must be answered by a jury. We cannot decide as a matter of law that qualified immunity is appropriate at the summary judgment phase. . . .Defendants argue that Rankin reasonably perceived a black or silver weapon in Longoria's hands and then saw Longoria assume a 'shooter's stance.' The district court relies on a single frozen frame from one of the videos to find that 'uncontroverted video evidence shows that Mr. Longoria came up with both hands in front of him facing Defendant Rankin's direction.' It does not mention any black or silver weapon. Deputy Rankin did not however see a frozen frame, disaggregated from the context of the rest of the footage. He watched events unfold in real-time as the two videos played at their ordinary speed portray. These videos provide some of the most important evidence as to what occurred before and during the shooting and what Rankin actually saw. This evidence alone raises material questions of fact about the reasonableness of Rankin's actions and the credibility of his post-hoc justification of his conduct. . . Viewing the two videos in the light most favorable to Longoria, the moment Rankin describes as a 'shooter's stance' is not perceptible. While Rankin relies on a single frozen frame of the iPhone video to illustrate the 'shooter's stance,' all that demonstrates is the existence of a genuine dispute of material fact. . . The full record only heightens this and other factual disputes. . . . In addition to the question whether Rankin actually perceived that Longoria assumed a 'shooter's stance' when he shot and killed him, there is, inter alia, a material dispute as to: whether Rankin heard commands to use non-lethal force or the other officers' shouts that Longoria was holding his wallet behind his back; whether Rankin, who has 20/20 vision, reasonably perceived a weapon in Longoria's hands from his position as he said he did; whether Longoria was in fact reacting to the non-lethal force deployed by other officers rather than assuming a 'shooter's stance'; and whether, as a matter of fact, Rankin could have had enough time to perceive the alleged 'shooter's stance' at the moment he claims to have done so and then shoot Longoria in response to that observation at the time the videos show he shot him. . . The district court resolved all of those disputed facts in favor of Rankin. Viewing all of these facts in the light most favorable to Longoria, a reasonable jury could conclude that Rankin knew or should have known that Longoria was not armed, that Rankin never perceived a 'shooter's stance,' and that Rankin knew or should have known that Longoria was either surrendering in response to the non-lethal force of the bean bag rounds and taser or reacting in some manner to their effects upon him but was by no means threatening to shoot at Rankin or any of the other officers. . . . The immediacy of the threat and Rankin's objective reasonableness in the totality of the circumstances depend upon the resolution of disputes of material facts that must be resolved against Rankin at this stage of the proceedings. We cannot say as a matter of law that Rankin acted reasonably. The question of whether a constitutional violation occurred is therefore a matter for the jury to determine. . . . The law governing this case is clearly established: 'A police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.' Garner, 471 U.S. at 11, 105 S.Ct. 1694. While locating the outer contours of the Fourth Amendment may at times be a murky business, few things in our case law are as clearly established as the principle that an officer may not 'seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead' in the absence of 'probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. .Thus, Longoria's Fourth Amendment right not to be shot dead while unarmed, surrounded by law enforcement, and in the process of surrendering is clearly established such that a 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'[9] [fn. 9: Within the specific context of Longoria's death, shot with his empty hands in the air above his head, this constitutional right is so clearly established that it has become the anthem in many protests of other police shootings: 'Hands up, don't shoot!'] . . . If, however, Rankin reasonably perceived that Longoria posed a threat of serious physical harm to Rankin or other officers, then he could have lawfully used deadly force. There is no dispute in this case about these propositions. We are presented here with a pure question of fact and not a question of law or of mixed fact and law. Rankin contends that he in fact perceived that Longoria assumed a 'shooter's stance' and that Longoria appeared to be armed. Longoria, on the other hand, asserts that Rankin did not see, nor could he in fact have seen, what he claimed caused him to believe that Longoria assumed a 'shooter's stance' and that he appeared to be armed. 'Where the facts are disputed, their resolution and determinations of credibility "are manifestly the province of a jury."'. . This case turns on disputed facts, including the credibility of Rankin. . . . We may not usurp the jury's role as the arbiters of fact, nor can our analysis at summary judgment change simply because the videos that show these disputed events unfolding in real-time may be called into question by a single frozen frame that does not represent what an officer actually saw at the time the events unfolded. . . Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because there is a material issue of fact as to whether Rankin violated Longoria's clearly established constitutional right. We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment and remand for a jury to determine whether Rankin's use of deadly force was lawful.") Morales v. Fry, 873 F.3d 817, 819-26 (9th Cir. 2017) ("The primary issue in this appeal is whether the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis should be submitted to a jury. Following the lead of nearly all of our sister circuits, we conclude that it is a question of law that must ultimately be decided by a judge. . . . [Q]ualified immunity was conceived as a summary judgment vehicle, and the trend of the Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence has been toward resolving qualified immunity as a legal issue before trial whenever possible. This approach presents a dilemma when, as here, a qualified immunity case goes to trial because disputed factual issues remain. Qualified immunity is then transformed from a doctrine providing immunity from suit to one providing a defense at trial. . . Nonetheless, comparing a given case with existing statutory or constitutional precedent is quintessentially a question of law for the judge, not the jury. A bifurcation of duties is unavoidable: only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, while only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved. . . . Nearly all our sister circuits agree with the position we adopt here. The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits take the view that whether a right is clearly established is a legal issue for the judge to decide, although special interrogatories to the jury can be used to establish disputed material facts. [collecting cases] The Tenth Circuit also considers this the 'better approach,' although it acknowledges certain rare and 'exceptional circumstances where historical facts are so intertwined with the law' that the court can permissibly 'define the clearly established law for the jury' and then allow the jury to 'determine [whether] what the defendant actually did ... was reasonable in light of the clearly established law.' See Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 860-61 (10th Cir. 2009). . . .By contrast, only the Fifth Circuit has unequivocally endorsed the jury determining whether the right was clearly established if qualified immunity is not decided until trial. See McCoy v. Hernandez, 203 F.3d 371, 376 (5th Cir. 2000). The Officers argue that the jury instructions were proper because we have previously allowed the issue of qualified immunity to be asserted at trial, citing three cases: Sloman v. Tadlock, 21 F.3d 1462, 1468 (9th Cir. 1994), Ortega v. O'Connor, 146 F.3d 1149, 1155 (9th Cir. 1998), and Thorsted v. Kelly, 858 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1988). None of these cases is persuasive. . . . [T]o the extent that Ortega and Thorsted suggested that the 'clearly established' prong could be submitted to the jury, we conclude that those cases are clearly irreconcilable with intervening Supreme Court authority. . . .For these reasons, the district court erred in submitting the 'clearly established' inquiry to the jury. The district court did not determine as a matter of law what the 'established law' was nor did it offer the jury the opportunity to decide separately any factual determinations related to this prong of qualified immunity. . . .Here, the special verdict forms only asked the jury:

Question 1: Do you find for Plaintiff Maria Morales on her federal-law (§ 1983) claim for unlawful arrest against Defendant Sonya Fry?

Answer: _ (Yes) X (No)

Question 2: Do you find for Plaintiff Maria Morales on her federal-law (§ 1983) claim for excessive force against Defendant Sonya Fry?

Answer: _ (Yes) X (No)

Because the jury answered 'No' to both questions, we cannot determine if they found a constitutional violation. One possibility is that the jury believed Officer Fry's version of events, found no underlying constitutional violation, and so did not need to consider application of the clearly established rule set out in Jury Instruction Nos. 20 and 21. And even if the jury did so, whatever it found under these instructions would be surplusage. In that scenario, the jury would have found against Morales regardless. The district court's ability to make a contrary finding would have been extremely constrained. However, another very realistic scenario is that the jury believed Morales's version of events, found one or more underlying constitutional violations, but also concluded that Fry reasonably believed her actions were in accordance with the law (although it was not defined for the jury). Had there been a jury finding of a constitutional violation, the question of clearly established law then would have been put to the district court on a Rule 50(b) motion. The district court could then have either granted or denied Fry qualified immunity. We have no way of divining which scenario actually happened. As a result, we cannot conclude that it is more probable than not that Morales would have lost her claims against Fry had the jury been properly instructed. Consequently, we must vacate the verdict with respect to Morales's unlawful arrest and excessive force claims against Officer Fry and remand for a new trial on these claims. On remand, the district court has discretion to employ either a general verdict form, or submit special interrogatories to the jury regarding the disputed issues of material fact. . . Either way, once the jury returns its verdict, the ultimate determination of whether Officer Fry violated Morales's clearly established rights is a question reserved for the court.")

Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus, 871 F.3d 998, 1013, 1016-17 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2680 (2018) ("[V]iewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, as we must at this stage of the proceedings, Gelhaus deployed deadly force while Andy was standing on the sidewalk holding a gun that was pointed down at the ground. Gelhaus also shot Andy without having warned Andy that such force would be used, and without observing any aggressive behavior. Pursuant to Graham, a reasonable jury could find that Gelhaus's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable. . . . [T]he dissent's accusations are as seismic as they are unconvincing. Moreover, the dissent's analysis is flawed because it rests upon a misreading of the district court's factual finding regarding the movement of Andy's gun. It bears repeating: even though we must assume for purposes of this interlocutory appeal that the barrel 'began' to rise as Andy turned, we must also assume—as the district court expressly found—that it potentially rose, as an incident of Andy's turning motion, only 'to a slightly-higher level [that did not] pos[e] any threat to the officers.'. . Mindful of that possibility, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the district court found that Andy did not 'point the weapon at the officers or otherwise threaten them with it.'. . And that is why, taking the facts as we must regard them, a reasonable jury could find that Gelhaus deployed deadly force while Andy was merely standing on the sidewalk holding a gun that was pointed down at the ground. This conclusion echoes the district court's findings, which govern this interlocutory appeal. By contrast, the dissent's version of the event violates a fundamental principle of our summary judgment jurisprudence—that 'all factual disputes are resolved, and all reasonable inferences are drawn, in plaintiff's favor,'. . . and selectively accepts Gelhaus's word at face value with respect to the movement of Andy's gun, thereby contravening Cruz.")

Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus, 871 F.3d 998, 1017-21 & n.17 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2680 (2018) ("[T]he district court asked whether the law was clearly established such that an officer on October 22, 2013, would have known that the use of deadly force was unreasonable 'where the suspect appears to be carrying an AK-47, but where [the] officers have received no reports of the suspect using the weapon or expressing an intention to use the weapon, where the suspect does not point the weapon at the officers or otherwise threaten them with it, where the suspect does not "come at" the officers or make any sudden movements towards the officers, and where there are no reports of erratic, aggressive, or threatening behavior.'. . The district court held that the law was clearly established that under those circumstances, Gelhaus's use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . It did not identify a specific precedent that put Gelhaus on notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. The district court erred by failing 'to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Deputy Gelhaus] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. However, George v. Morris serves that function. Harris and Curnow were also on the books to provide Gelhaus with guidance. . . . The dissent conjures its own 'framing'—'that the use of deadly force without an objective threat is unreasonable'—and criticizes the use of that fictitious frame to the extent that it applies here. We employ no such frame. Nor do we rely on general excessive force principles. Rather, we ask whether the law was clearly established that the use of deadly force was unreasonable in a situation where the factual predicates enumerated in Part I.B are assumed to be true. Somewhat distilled, this is a situation where, among other things, the suspect appears to be carrying an AK-47, but where [the] officers have received no reports of the suspect using the weapon or expressing an intention to use the weapon, where the suspect does not point the weapon at the officers or otherwise threaten them with it, where the suspect does not 'come at' the officers or make any sudden movements towards the officers,' where the officers do not witness any 'erratic, aggressive, or threatening behavior,' and where the suspect was not warned that deadly force would be deployed despite the officers having ample opportunity to do so. . . . At bottom, taking the facts as we must regard them at this stage of the proceedings, Gelhaus, like the deputies [in George v. Morris], shot without warning, without objective provocation, and while the gun was trained on the ground. Because George 'squarely governs' the circumstances that Gelhaus confronted, Gelhaus violated Andy's clearly established right to be free of excessive force in this context. . . . Though George is sufficient, Harris and Curnow also gave Gelhaus warning that his use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable. [discussing cases] In light of George, Harris, and Curnow, and taking the facts as we must regard them at this stage of the proceedings, there is no room for Gelhaus to have made 'a reasonable mistake' as to what the law required. . . Qualified immunity may also apply, however, where the government official makes a reasonable 'mistake of fact.'. . Here, Gelhaus could not have reasonably misconstrued the threat allegedly posed by the position of Andy's gun because, on the facts as we must regard them, it never rose to a position that posed any threat to the officers. Accordingly, the only question is whether Gelhaus could have reasonably misconstrued Andy's turn as a 'harrowing gesture.'. . .Based on the present record, Gelhaus could not reasonably have misconstrued Andy's turn as a 'harrowing gesture.'. . . In short, prior to and during Andy's turn, Gelhaus simply did not witness any threatening behavior. Thus, the only reasonable inference is that Andy was turning naturally and non-aggressively to look at the person who shouted from behind. If anything, Gelhaus should have expected Andy's turn, for it did not contravene Gelhaus's command, and it may have been an effort to comply. . . .If the jury finds, for instance, that Andy briefly glanced backwards and was aware that the officers were following him, it may find that he intentionally disobeyed the order to drop the gun, that he turned aggressively, and that his weapon was not pointed at the ground. On those facts, even if Gelhaus committed a Fourth Amendment violation, his conduct likely did not violate clearly established law given that 'a furtive movement, harrowing gesture, or serious verbal threat' can justify deadly force against someone who is armed. . . Conversely, if plaintiffs' version of the facts prevails and the jury concludes that Andy posed no imminent threat to the officers, then Andy's right to be free of excessive force in this context was clearly established at the time of Gelhaus's

Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus, 871 F.3d 998, 1022, 1025-32 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2680 (2018) (Wallace, J., dissenting) ("The facts of this case are tragic. A boy lost his life—needlessly, as it turns out. We know now that he was carrying only a fake gun, albeit a realistic-looking one. Deputies Gelhaus and Schemmel therefore never were in any real danger and deadly force was not necessary. In view of these facts, the inclination to hold Deputy Gelhaus liable for shooting Andy Lopez is understandable. But it is a well-settled rule that a court may do so only if precedent clearly established at the time of the shooting that the use of deadly force in the circumstances Deputy Gelhaus faced was objectively unreasonable. I do not agree with the majority that such a case existed on the day Andy died. Respectfully, I therefore dissent. The majority opinion exhaustively recounts the facts of the case, but for me, they are largely irrelevant. One critical fact—the upward motion of the fake gun—resolves the qualified immunity issue in Deputy Gelhaus's favor. . . . The majority says it is deferring to the district court's findings, but it is not. Rather than perform these interpretive changes, I would take the district court at its word and decide this appeal on the understanding that the gun was beginning to rise when Deputy Gelhaus committed to using deadly force. . . .I agree with the majority's conclusion that the district court erred by failing to conduct the necessary analysis identifying a precedential case or cases it believed would have put Deputy Gelhaus on notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . Rather than conclude there and decide the appeal, the majority attempts to perform on its own the district court's task by identifying three cases—not one of which appears anywhere in the district court's order—that purportedly served as notice to Deputy Gelhaus that he could not constitutionally use deadly force against Andy. More important than the district court's omission, which should require reversal, is that the plaintiffs themselves have never argued that these cases clearly established Andy's right, either in response to Deputy Gelhaus's motion for summary judgment or in their answering brief on appeal. . . . In my view, all of the cases cited are distinguishable on their facts from the one before us and therefore cannot perform the function the majority ascribes to them, even if it were appropriate for the majority to attempt to do so. . . .The disputed facts the majority points to—whether Andy looked backwards at the officers, whether Deputy Gelhaus yelled at Andy to drop the gun more than once, whether the patrol car chirped more than once, whether Andy held the gun in his right or left hand, and the angle between the ground and Deputy Gelhaus at which Andy pointed his gun—are simply not material to the qualified immunity analysis. Taking together the district court's findings and undisputed facts, this case involves the use of deadly force against a hooded individual armed with a replica assault rifle indistinguishable from a real one, who turned to face an officer while raising the rifle after the officer had activated his patrol car lights and siren and yelled at the individual to drop the rifle. These facts are not sufficiently similar to the facts of George, Harris, or Curnow to have put Deputy Gelhaus on notice that his use of deadly force violated Andy's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . Without these cases, the majority is left only with the statement it cites at the beginning of its clearly established law analysis: that we may deny qualified immunity 'in novel circumstances.'. . It is doubtful how much of this statement, if any, has survived the Supreme Court's intervening decision in White. . . To the extent it retains any vitality, it likely would be confined to those cases where the officer's conduct is an 'obvious' violation of a constitutional right. . . This assuredly is not such 'an obvious case.'. . As shown by the majority's painstaking evaluation of the objective reasonableness of Deputy Gelhaus's use of force, this case is not obvious, but clearly quite close. Whether Deputy Gelhaus acted unreasonably turns on such minute details as how high the gun barrel had risen, whether it might have been feasible to give a warning, and just how aggressive Andy's turning motion was. By contrast, cases found to be 'obvious' involve much clearer constitutional transgressions. . . Our case is not the 'rare' one 'in which the constitutional right at issue is defined by a standard that is so "obvious" that we must conclude ... that qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.'. . Accordingly, the district court's denial of immunity cannot be affirmed on this basis either. . . . Deputy Gelhaus misjudged the threat that Andy posed, and Andy's death is the heartbreaking result of that miscalculation. In circumstances like these, it is imperative that we do justice. But justice does not invariably require punishing the officer. A reasonable mistake of law or fact is not enough to impose liability. . . The law affords relief only when an officer transgresses a boundary clearly established by precedent at the time he acts. If no such case exists, the officer cannot be held liable even if his conduct, the court believes in retrospect, may be unreasonable. This is the situation that we face. The facts of the cases that the majority relies on to reach the opposite conclusion are materially different from the real facts before us. Those cases therefore could not have given Deputy Gelhaus notice that using deadly force against Andy would violate his constitutional right. Although all are sympathetic to Andy's family, as anyone should be, I am duty-bound to conclude that we must provide Deputy Gelhaus with the 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions' that qualified immunity affords him. . . For these reasons, I dissent.") Hung Lam v. City of San Jose, 869 F.3d 1077, 1085-88 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Officer West argues that she is entitled to a new trial, because the jury instructions were erroneous in three regards: (1) the district court did not give special interrogatories to the jury; (2) the district court did not give a deadly force instruction to the jury; and (3) the district court erred by failing to instruct the jury that an officer's 'bad tactics' are insufficient to establish constitutional liability. . . Officer West first argues that, in qualified immunity cases involving disputed issues of material fact (like here), the district court is required to give special interrogatories to the jury. She is mistaken as to the precedent in our circuit. Instead, '[t]he decision "whether to submit special interrogatories to the jury is a matter committed to the discretion of the district court."'. . . The district court found special interrogatories were unnecessary. In its discretion, the district court reasoned that, if the jury found Anderson's version of the facts to be true, then Officer West would not be entitled to qualified immunity, because it is a violation of clearly established law for an officer to use deadly force against someone who poses no threat of serious harm to the officers or others. The district court did not abuse its discretion by declining to give special interrogatories based on this rationale. We recognize that other circuits have encouraged or required district courts to use special interrogatories in qualified immunity cases involving disputed issues of material fact. However, Officer West has provided no authority from this circuit supporting the proposition that special interrogatories are required for the purpose of evaluating a post-verdict qualified immunity defense. Additionally, Officer West failed to submit proposed special interrogatories to the district court and provides no explanation, consistent with our case law, as to how the district court abused its discretion by declining to give special interrogatories. Officer West next argues the district court's instructions failed to convey the proper standards as to objectively reasonable force. Specifically, Officer West argues that Tennessee v. Garner established a constitutional justification for the use of deadly force—an officer can use deadly force if she is confronted with an imminent risk of death or serious bodily injury—and that, by failing to instruct the jury on this specific justification, the court left the jurors inadequately informed as to the law. We disagree. . . . [T]he Supreme Court's more recent decision in Scott v. Harris rejected the view that Garner created a special rule in deadly force cases. . . . Rather, the Court explained, 'Garner was simply an application of the Fourth Amendment's "reasonableness" test to the use of a particular type of force in a particular situation.'. . We have since recognized that Scott overruled our prior precedent and district courts are no longer required to give a separate deadly force instruction. . . Therefore, Officer West's argument that the district court was required to give a separate deadly force instruction fails as a matter of law. . . . Officer West argues the district court erred by failing to give an instruction that explained to the jury that Fourth Amendment liability cannot be premised solely on an officer's 'bad tactics.' . . . Following the pattern jury instructions, the district court submitted the case to the jury under the general rubric of reasonableness. The district court's charge covered the appropriate legal standard and left counsel more than enough room to argue the facts in light of that standard. We cannot hold that the district court abused its discretion by declining to single out one factor in the reasonableness inquiry, when the instructions properly charged the jury to consider all of the circumstances. . . .'When a qualified immunity claim cannot be resolved before trial due to a factual conflict, it is a litigant's responsibility to preserve the legal issue for determination after the jury resolves the factual conflict.'. . To preserve the determination of qualified immunity, a defendant must make a motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a). . . The Rule 50(a) motion may be filed 'at any time before the case is submitted to the jury.'. . If the district court denies the Rule 50(a) motion, the defendant must then renew the motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b) to preserve the qualified immunity defense. . . However, a 'failure to file a Rule 50(a) motion precludes consideration of a Rule 50(b) motion for judgment as a mater of law.'. . Once there has been a trial, the filing of a motion for summary judgment or raising the defense in a pre-trial submission is not sufficient to avoid a waiver. . . Officer West did not file a Rule 50(a) motion for judgment as a matter of law before the case was submitted to the jury, nor did Officer West file a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law pursuant to Rule 50(b) after the verdict was rendered. Thus, Officer West never provided the district court an opportunity to rule on the question of whether, on the facts established at trial, she was entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, Officer West did not preserve her post-trial assertion of qualified immunity for appeal. Following Tortu, if an officer has forfeited her qualified immunity defense by failing to follow proscribed procedures for the preservation of the defense, we should not consider it for the first time on appeal. . . Officer West argues that the district court's failure to give special interrogatories to the jury deprived her of a qualified immunity determination. That argument is without merit. Without properly preserving qualified immunity and providing the district court a forum to rule on the defense, it was Officer West, not the district court, who precluded a qualified immunity determination. Officer West also contends that, by requesting that the district court give special interrogatories to the jury, she properly raised qualified immunity . . . Our precedent, as explained above, forecloses this argument.")

Reed v. Lieurance, 863 F.3d 1196, 1205-07, 1211-12 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Here, we find that the district court improperly invaded the province of the jury when, at the summary judgment stage, it resolved factual disputes material to the question of probable cause. Reviewing the record before the district court at summary judgment, we find that it is possible a jury could conclude that Deputy Lieurance had probable cause to believe Reed's presence at the observation point would likely obstruct the haze and also that Reed possessed the requisite specific intent.Alternatively, a reasonable jury could conclude that Deputy Lieurance knew that Reed presented little to no risk of obstructing the operation while parked on the gravel road up the hill over half a mile from the planned route of the haze, and thus there was at best a low probability that Reed might 'impede the performance of a peace officer's law duty.'. . .[E]ven if a jury concluded Deputy Lieurance had probable cause to believe Reed was obstructing the haze, a jury could conclude Deputy Lieurance lacked probable cause to believe that Reed had the necessary specific intent to impede the haze. . . .Moreover, a jury could find Deputy Lieurance issued the citation for one or more reasons that do not satisfy the Fourth Amendment. First, a jury could conclude that Deputy Lieurance's argument that Reed was 'obstructing' the haze was pretextual, and that his real motivation in detaining and citing Reed was tied to the Campaign's recent lawsuit limiting the use of helicopters in hazing. Alternatively, there are some facts in the record tending to show that Deputy Lieurance, like the officer in Kalispell, issued the citation because of Reed's alleged refusal to follow an order, as opposed to any genuine likelihood that Reed would obstruct the haze. . . .Construing the facts in Reed's favor, we cannot conclude that as a matter of law, a reasonably prudent officer in Deputy Lieurance's situation would have had probable cause to believe Reed committed obstruction. Thus, Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on Reed's unlawful seizure claim. . . .Here, in ruling that Defendants were entitled to judgment as a matter of law on this claim, the district court improperly resolved numerous factual disputes reserved for the jury. For example, the district court quite inexplicably applied a 'presumption' that Deputy Lieurance obeyed the law. The district court also found it was 'undisputed' that the presence of Reed's vehicle parked on the gravel road presented a safety risk and interfered with the hazing operation; the district court credited Defendants' evidence regarding the buffalo's dangerousness and unpredictability. And the district court found it 'undisputed' that Agent Tierney directed Reed not simply to go north or south from Conservation Lane, but to go north of the southbound blockade or south of the northbound blockade. Puzzlingly, the court also determined that the fact that later on the same day observers were permitted to come within fifty yards of the haze was 'of no reasonable evidentiary value in determining the issues in this case.' Lastly, the court found that Reed 'was given the opportunity, at least at the south end of this no-drive zone, to ... view the haze operation as it crossed the highway.' Based on these findings—which can only reasonably be understood as factual findings and credibility determinations—the district court concluded that the restriction on Reed's First Amendment activities was reasonable as a matter of law because it was justified by safety reasons, limited in time and location, and left open a reasonable alternative. The court did not explicitly address the question of content-neutrality. Upon close review of the record, we find that contrary to the district court's conclusions, Reed presented evidence sufficient to create material factual disputes as to all three relevant inquiries: content neutrality, narrow tailoring to a significant government interest, and the existence of alternatives. . . . Second, Reed presented a First Amendment retaliation claim at trial. Reed presented sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that Deputy Lieurance's 'desire to chill [Reed's protected activity] was a but-for cause of' the threat to take Reed to jail.")

Willis v. City of Fresno, 680 F. App'x 589 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 220 (2017) ("The district court did not err by denying Officer Catton qualified immunity. The evidence presented at trial established that if Willis had been reaching for the gun, deadly force was justified. Since the jury concluded that the force used was not justified, it must have concluded that Willis was not reaching for the gun and thus did not pose an immediate threat of harm when Officer Catton fired. The constitutional right to be free from the use of deadly force absent an immediate threat of harm to officers or others was clearly established at the time Officer Catton acted. See Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 11, 105 S.Ct. 1694, 85 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985); Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546, 550 (9th Cir. 2010). All reasonable officers would have known that using deadly force on an individual who poses no immediate threat to the officer or others violates the Fourth Amendment.")

Lowry v. City of San Diego, 858 F.3d 1248, 1261 & n.1 (9th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("Here, construing the facts and drawing reasonable inferences in Lowry's favor, a jury could find that the force used was severe, that the government's interest in the use of that force was not especially strong, and, therefore, that the use of a police dog was unreasonable. . . .The majority emphasizes that the reasonableness of a particular use of force is a 'pure question of law' once the facts are established. . . However, '[w]here the objective reasonableness of an officer's conduct turns on disputed issues of material fact, it is "a question of fact best resolved by a jury."' Torres v. City of Madera, 648 F.3d 1119, 1123 (9th Cir. 2011) . . . Because Lowry has succeeded in raising material disputes of fact, as detailed below, it is the task of the jury to resolve those fact disputes and draw any relevant inferences from them.")

Newmaker v. City of Fortuna, 842 F.3d 1108, 1116-17 (9th Cir. 2016) ("We hold that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Officer Soeth. Summary judgment is not appropriate in § 1983 deadly force cases that turn on the officer's credibility that is genuinely in doubt. . . Qualified immunity should not be granted when other evidence in the record, 'such as medical reports, contemporaneous statements by the officer[,] the available physical evidence, [and] any expert testimony proffered by the plaintiff' is inconsistent with material evidence proffered by the defendant. . . The version of events offered by Officer Soeth and Sergeant Ellebrecht to the district court is materially contradicted by evidence in the record. Their versions of events changed over time. The version they presented to the district court was suggested to them by Investigator Hislop. Both their original version of events (that Officer Soeth shot Newmaker twice in quick succession while he was standing up and swinging the baton at Ellebrecht) and their second version of events (that Officer Soeth first shot while Newmaker was standing and swinging the baton, and quickly shot again as Newmaker attempted to stand back up while swinging the baton) conflict with the autopsy report and with the video evidence. A reasonable jury could conclude that Soeth and Ellebrecht were wrong when they claimed that Newmaker grabbed the baton. In the alternative, a reasonable jury could conclude, given the trajectory of the bullets through Newmaker's body, that even if Newmaker had grabbed the baton Officer Soeth could not have fired his first shot while Newmaker was standing up and swinging the baton. . . Because this case 'requires a jury to sift through disputed factual contentions' — including whether the officers were telling the truth about when, why, and how Soeth shot Newmaker — summary judgment was inappropriate.") Figueroa v. County of Los Angeles, 651 F. App'x 709, 712-13 (9th Cir. 2016) ("Mr. Figueroa argues that the district court erred by permitting the jury to determine whether Deputy Perez was entitled to qualified immunity. Specifically, Mr. Figueroa contends that the jury should not have been permitted to decide whether Mr. Figueroa's constitutional right to be free from excessive force was so clearly established that Deputy Perez should have known his conduct was unlawful. 'Qualified immunity is a question of law, not a question of fact.' Torres v. City of Los Angeles, 548 F.3d 1197, 1210 (9th Cir. 2008). However, our case law has not been entirely consistent with regard to who may decide aspects of qualified immunity that involve disputes of material facts. Compare Act Up!/ Portland v. Bagley, 988 F.2d 868, 873 (9th Cir. 1993) ("The determination of whether the facts alleged could support a reasonable belief in the existence of probable cause or reasonable suspicion is ... a question of law to be determined by the court."), with Johnson v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist., 724 F.3d 1159, 1168 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Though we may excuse [a] reasonable officer for [making mistakes of fact or law that lead to unconstitutional acts], it sometimes proves necessary for a jury to determine first whether the mistake was, in fact, reasonable." (citations omitted)). In this case, the material facts were contested. On the one hand, if the facts were as alleged by Mr. Figueroa, Deputy Perez may have violated a constitutional right that was clearly established. However, if the facts were as alleged by Deputy Perez, Deputy Perez's conduct did not violate any clearly established constitutional right. Thus, the court could allow the jury to determine which version of the facts was true. . . However, this district court went a step further and instructed the jury on qualified immunity. Under Johnson, such deference to the jury (as to whether Deputy Perez's belief that his use of force was not unconstitutional was reasonable) may have been acceptable. However, under Act Up!, it was clearly an error. For purposes of this case, we need not decide whether Johnson or Act Up! controls because any error committed by the district court under Act Up! was harmless. First, the jury's responses to the questions on the verdict form do not suggest that the jury believed Deputy Perez had violated Mr. Figueroa's constitutional rights. Rather, the jury's responses suggest it believed that, although the force used was perhaps more than necessary (resulting in a broken arm), Deputy Perez reasonably believed that he needed to use such force to control the situation under these particular circumstances. That determination, as Mr. Figueroa admits, was a question of fact properly before the jury. In other words, the jury was permitted (under both Johnson and Act Up!) to decide whether Deputy Perez reasonably believed the amount of force he used was necessary under the circumstances. Such finding established that no constitutional right had been violated. Because the jury in effect determined that there had been no violation of a constitutional right, there could be no liability and therefore no need for additional qualified immunity analysis. Second, the right Mr. Figueroa alleges was violated was not so clearly established that a reasonable person in Deputy Perez's situation should have known that his actions in 'the specific context of this case' were unlawful. Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 198 (2004) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 243 (2009). Because this determination is purely a question of law, we may decide the issue without deference to the district court or the jury. Thus, even if, as Mr. Figueroa contends, the jury impermissibly weighed in on a purely legal question, such error was harmless because we, in an independent analysis of legal precedent, also find that the right was not clearly established. The district court's order denying Sergeant Gonzalez relief from default is vacated and the award of attorneys' fees is vacated. The district court's order denying Mr. Figueroa's motion for a new trial against Deputy Perez is affirmed. The case is remanded to the district court. Costs are awarded to defendants.")

Rosales v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 650 F. App'x 546, 549 (9th Cir. 2016) ("Because the underlying facts turn on a credibility determination that a jury should make, we do not decide whether each deputy can be held liable for the alleged blunt force to Rosales' abdomen or back. We disagree, however, with the district court's conclusion that 'plaintiff[s] cannot state whether particular officers used force against [Rosales]' or participated in that use of force. Given the circumstantial evidence and the inconsistencies in each deputy's testimony, a reasonable jury could infer any one of the four deputies applied blunt force to Rosales' abdomen or back. Other deputies who had 'some fundamental involvement' in that conduct would also be liable as integral participants. Blankenhorn v. City of Orange, 485 F.3d 463, 481 n.12 (9th Cir. 2007). To the extent the district court required evidence that 'each officer defendant used excessive force,' that conclusion was error. See Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773, 780 (9th Cir. 2004) (" '[I]ntegral participation' does not require that each officer's actions themselves rise to the level of a constitutional violation."). . . . Qualified immunity is likewise 'premature' at this stage because it 'may depend on the jury's resolution of disputed facts and the inferences it draws therefrom.' Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 855 n.12 (9th Cir. 2002). We therefore vacate the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Chaverra and decline the invitation to grant immunity to the other deputies.") Collender v. City of Brea, 605 F. App'x 624, 629 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The video does not clearly show Julian's hand movement just prior to the shooting. Contrary to the approach taken by the dissent, this disputed fact must be construed in the light most favorable to the Collenders. Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S.Ct. 1861, 1866 (2014) (per curiam). As such, the district court properly denied summary judgment. See George, 736 F.3d at 838 ("If the person is armed—or reasonably suspected of being armed—a furtive movement, harrowing gesture, or serious verbal threat might create an immediate threat. On this interlocutory appeal, though, we can neither credit the deputies' testimony that [the decedent] turned and pointed his gun at them, nor assume that he took other actions that would have been objectively threatening. Given [the non-moving party's] version of events, a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that the deputies' use of force was constitutionally excessive."). . . .The parties agree that it was clearly established at the time of the shooting that '[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead' in the absence of 'the suspect pos[ing] a threat of serious physical harm.'. . . Thus, the district court properly determined Neel is not entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that the constitutional right was not clearly established.")

Collender v. City of Brea, 605 F. App'x 624, 629-30 & n.1 (9th Cir. 2015) (Graber, J., dissenting) ("The majority relies on a series of factual disputes that are not relevant to the question whether qualified immunity applies. The majority notes, for example, that the parties dispute whether Collender's left hand actually entered his left front pants pocket. . . The majority also points out that the parties offer 'alternative reasons why [Collender] moved his hand downward.'. . But those facts are not relevant to the determination whether a reasonable officer in Neel's position would have feared for his life. The relevant facts are not in dispute. It is undisputed that Collender was a suspect in an armed robbery, in which a handgun was used, that had occurred a few hours before the night-time fatal encounter and that Collender had threatened to kill the robbery victim's family. It is also undisputed that, shortly before Neel shot him, Collender had reached into the back seat of his car. The video shows that, as Neel approached Collender on a dark street, Collender's hands were raised, initially. But Collender quickly leaned slightly to the side and reached one hand down to his hip, where it was out of sight. He was wearing a loose, untucked shirt. At that moment, any reasonable officer would have thought that Collender could be reaching for a gun in his pocket or waistband, and any reasonable officer would have feared for his life. . . . Any observer reviewing the video will see the same gesture. What the panel members 'see' differently is not the gesture itself; rather, we interpret differently the significance of that gesture and how a reasonable officer would respond to it. . . . There is no claim of police provocation. Although the majority disposition asserts that there is a dispute, . . .no evidence contradicts Neel's testimony that Collender had stalked Neel's car and had failed to obey some of his commands, nor does any evidence contradict Neel's testimony that he subjectively feared for his life at the moment he fired his weapon. Plaintiffs' belief as to Neel's state of mind, without evidence supporting that belief, is not cognizable evidence. . . . In any event, the evidence that Plaintiffs offered suggested that Neel was too quick to fear for his life, but no evidence even hints that he was not, in fact, fearful. In the circumstances described above, the use of deadly force was reasonable. . . .Accordingly, I would reverse.")

Cruz v. City of Anaheim,765 F.3d 1076, 1077-80 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Nobody likes a game of "he said, she said," but far worse is the game of "we said, he's dead." Sadly, this is too often what we face in police shooting cases like this one. . . . Usually when we're deciding whether to grant summary judgment for the police in deadly force cases we must wade through the 'factbound morass of "reasonableness."' Not so here: It would be unquestionably reasonable for police to shoot a suspect in Cruz's position if he reaches for a gun in his waistband, or even if he reaches there for some other reason. Given Cruz's dangerous and erratic behavior up to that point, the police would doubtless be justified in responding to such a threatening gesture by opening fire. Conversely, if the suspect doesn't reach for his waistband or make some similar threatening gesture, it would clearly be unreasonable for the officers to shoot him after he stopped his vehicle and opened the door. At that point, the suspect no longer poses an immediate threat to the police or the public, so deadly force is not justified. . . Thus, we need not worry about the intricacies of police procedure or nuanced questions of force proportionality. To decide this case a jury would have to answer just one simple question: Did the police see Cruz reach for his waistband? If they did, they were entitled to shoot; if they didn't, they weren't. But for a judge ruling on the officers' motion for summary judgment, this translates to a different question: Could any reasonable jury find it more likely than not that Cruz didn't reach for his waistband? In ruling for the officers, the district court answered this question 'No.' The evidence it relied on in reaching this conclusion—indeed, the only evidence that suggests this is what happened—is the testimony of the officers, four of whom say they saw Cruz make the fateful reach. . . But in the deadly force context, we cannot 'simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer.'. . . Because the person most likely to rebut the officers' version of events—the one killed—can't testify, '[t]he judge must carefully examine all the evidence in the record ... to determine whether the officer's story is internally consistent and consistent with other known facts.'. . This includes 'circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story.'. . In this case, there's circumstantial evidence that could give a reasonable jury pause. Most obvious is the fact that Cruz didn't have a gun on him, so why would he have reached for his waistband? . . . Cruz probably saw that he was surrounded by officers with guns drawn. In that circumstance, it would have been foolish—but not wholly implausible—for him to have tried to fast-draw his weapon in an attempt to shoot his way out. But for him to make such a gesture when no gun is there makes no sense whatsoever. A jury may doubt that Cruz did this. Of course, a jury could reach the opposite conclusion. It might believe that Cruz thought he had the gun there, or maybe he had a death wish, or perhaps his pants were falling down at the worst possible moment. But the jury could also reasonably conclude that the officers lied. In reaching that conclusion, the jury might find relevant the uncontroverted evidence that Officer Linn, one of Cruz's shooters, recited the exact same explanation when he shot and killed another unarmed man, David Raya, two years later under very similar circumstances. Like Cruz, Raya was tracked down after a confidential informant told police that he had a gun and that he 'wasn't going back to prison,' and, as with Cruz, the tip led to an altercation with Anaheim police that ended with an unarmed Raya biting the dust. Perhaps the most curious similarity: According to the officers who shot the two unarmed men, both reached for their waistbands while the police had their guns trained on them. . . . 'They both reached for the gun' might be a plausible defense from officers in the line of duty. 'They both reached for no gun' sounds more like a song-and-dance. A jury might find implausible other aspects of the officers' story. For starters, four of the officers said they saw Cruz reach for his waistband. A jury might be skeptical that four pairs of eyes had a line of sight to Cruz's hand as he stood between the open car door and the SUV. There is also the fact that Cruz was left-handed, yet two officers attested that they saw Cruz reach for his waistband with his right hand. A reasonable jury could doubt that Cruz would have reached for a non-existent weapon with his off hand. Then there is the officers' claim that Cruz had 'exited' the Suburban, and 'stood in the doorway,' but after he was killed they had to cut him free from his seat belt because he was 'suspended' by it. How does a man who has 'emerged fully' from a vehicle, and 'turn[ed] to face forward,' end up hanging from his seat belt after he's shot? Maybe it's possible. But it's also possible that the officers didn't wait for Cruz to exit his car—or reach for his waistband—and simply opened fire on a man who was trying to comply with their instructions to '[g]et down on the ground.' The testimony of the only non-police eyewitness, Norman Harms, indicates that Cruz's feet indeed made it out of the car, but that Cruz was 'slipping on the ground, like kind of falling down,' as if he were 'tripping.' This paints a different picture than the officers' testimony that Cruz had fully emerged from his SUV and was poised to attack. Based on Harms's testimony, a jury might find that Cruz was trying to get out of the car (as he was ordered to do multiple times after he opened his door) but got caught in his seat belt. Were a jury to believe this version of events—which seems no less likely than a man shot while standing next to a vehicle becoming suspended by a seat belt—this would certainly cast doubt on the officers' credibility and lead the jury to find for plaintiffs. Given these curious and material factual discrepancies, the district court erred in ruling that only an unreasonable or speculative jury could disbelieve Officers Phillips, Vargas, Stauber and Linn's version of events. As to these officers and the Monell defendants (the City of Anaheim, Chief Welter and Deputy Chief Hunter), we reverse. We make no determination about the officers' credibility, because that's not our decision to make. We leave it to the jury.")

Bowles v. City of Porterville, 571 F. App'x 538, 540-41 (9th Cir. 2014), as amended (May 1, 2014) [Note: Tolan v. Cotton decided May 4th] ("Plaintiffs do not question McGuire's subjective fear. Nor do they appear to question that Bowles stopped a second time and pivoted to face the officer. In addition, Plaintiffs do not deny that a cologne bottle found at the scene had a metallic and cylindrical top. Instead, they argue that a jury could conclude that Bowles did not have a cologne bottle in his hand. But the evidence shows that Bowles was responsible for the presence of the cologne bottle. When Bowles was running the officers had seen bulges in his pockets, and a search of Bowles after he was shot revealed at least one more cologne bottle. Plaintiffs' allegations that McGuire improperly moved the cologne bottle do not create a material issue of fact because they do refute that Bowles had been carrying the cologne bottles. Similarly, Plaintiffs' argument that Bowles may have been crouching when he was shot does not raise a material issue of fact. It is pure speculation to suggest that Bowles was attempting to lie down as previously ordered by the officers. Bowles had previously ignored the officers' commands and more importantly, there is no suggestion that crouching was inconsistent with preparing to fire a gun. Furthermore, McGuire fired a single shot. This distinguishes the situation from instances in which the officers continued firing after avoiding the immediate threat. See Curnow v. Ridgecrest Police, 952 F.2d 321, 325 (9th Cir.1991); Perrin v. Gentner, 177 F.Supp.2d 1115, 1120–21 (D.Nev.2001). Given Bowles' fleeing, the darkness, the officers' prior restraint, and the presence of a cologne bottle with a metallic cylindrical top, there is no other possible reason for McGuire's fear that Bowles was about to shoot him. While one might speculate as to other causes for McGuire's real but mistaken fear, Plaintiffs have not pointed to any evidence that might support such speculation. . . McGuire was required to make a 'split second judgment' in a situation that was 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. . His testimony is 'internally consistent and consistent with other known facts.'. . Accordingly, the district court properly concluded that McGuire's apprehension was reasonable. The district court's grant of summary judgment is AFFIRMED.")

Bowles v. City of Porterville, 571 F. App'x 538, 541-46 (9th Cir. 2014), as amended (May 1, 2014) (Korman, J., sitting by designation, dissenting) ("Joseph Bowles ('Bowles') was shot and killed by California Highway Patrol Officer Chris McGuire ('Officer McGuire') in the early morning hours of October 20, 2009. The shooting came at the culmination of a chase that began after Officer McGuire observed Bowles 'looking into vehicles, placing his hands kind of over his eyes to, to allow him to look inside of the vehicles[.]'. . Although Officer McGuire did not see Bowles make any contact with any of those vehicles with his hands, Officer McGuire testified that he 'just had reasonable suspicion that he was attempting to commit a crime based on the several minutes of surveillance we had with him up to that point[.]' . . After Officer McGuire's colleague, Officer McCord, approached Bowles and identified himself as a police officer, Bowles ran and the chase began with Officers McGuire and McCord in pursuit. . . Officer McCord eventually dropped back and did not witness Office McGuire fire the shot that killed Bowles. These events were ultimately followed by a complaint filed by Bowles's parents, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging, inter alia, that the use of deadly force against their son constituted an unreasonable search and seizure. The complaint was based on the holding of the Supreme Court in Tennessee v. Garner that a 'police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.'. . . Officer McGuire, however, has asserted the affirmative defense of qualified immunity based on his claim that he feared that Bowles was going to shoot him. The district court granted McGuire's motion for summary judgment. On this appeal, after holding that 'the pivotal issue is whether McGuire, or an officer in McGuire's position, would reasonably fear that Bowles was going to shoot him,'. . . the majority concludes that Officer McGuire's fear that he was in danger of being shot was reasonable and that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law for a jury to conclude otherwise. I am unable to agree that this case is appropriate for summary judgment. In my view, the majority unjustifiably fails to apply the applicable legal standards for a motion for summary judgment in a case in which the victim of a shooting by a police officer is dead and the entire case rests largely on the deposition testimony of the defendant. Moreover, while the majority bases its holding on its review of 'the totality of the circumstances,' my view of those circumstances leads me to conclude that this case is one that must be resolved by a jury. I turn first to the applicable legal standards, and then to a careful analysis of the underlying facts. Because the majority resolves the pivotal issue in this case solely by crediting the testimony of Officer McGuire, it is useful to begin with the admonition that where a motion for summary judgment is based on such testimony, a district judge 'must ensure that the officer is not taking advantage of the fact that the witness most likely to contradict his story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.'. . The district judge 'may not simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer. It must also look at the circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story, and consider whether this evidence could convince a rational factfinder that the officer acted unreasonably.'. . This is a corollary of two well settled principles. First, '[i]t is clear that qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, and we think it equally clear that the burden of proving the defense lies with the official asserting it.' Benigni v. City of Hemet, 879 F.2d 473, 479 (9th Cir.1988). Second, this consideration aside, 'the ordinary rule, based on considerations of fairness, does not place the burden upon a litigant of establishing facts peculiarly within the knowledge of his adversary.'. . .Against this legal backdrop, the holding of the majority that summary judgment is appropriate in this case is impossible to justify. Office McGuire bore the burden of proof. The facts relating to the shooting were peculiarly within his knowledge and the jury was not compelled to accept and believe his self-serving testimony that is implausible on its face. Officer McGuire testified that, during the course of the chase, Bowles stopped twice. When he stopped the first time and faced Officer McGuire, the latter ordered him to get on the ground. . . At that moment, when they were approximately five feet apart, Officer McGuire 'could just tell that [Bowles] had items in both of his front pockets, but [he] did not know what these items were.'. . Officer McGuire then drew his weapon and again ordered Bowles to get to the ground. . . The chase resumed when 'shortly after that Mr. Bowles started running away again.'. .According to Officer McGuire, it was at this point when Bowles stopped and turned that he saw 'a metallic cylinder object in his hands,' which led Officer McGuire to believe that Bowles had a weapon. . . When asked how the object was positioned in Bowles's hands, Officer McGuire answered that '[h]e had his, both his left and right hand coupled together extended out in front of him, with his elbow slightly bent, and the metallic object was protruding from within his hands as he had them cupped together.'. . The object which Officer McGuire testified he saw in Bowles's hands, and which led to the shot that killed him, was a cologne bottle. In order to credit Officer McGuire's testimony, a jury would have to believe that after stopping, Bowles removed a cologne bottle from one of his front pockets and pointed it at a police officer who had his gun drawn and was no more than ten feet away. While the majority has apparently seen fit to credit this improbable tale, a jury could decide otherwise. . . . [I]n the present case, concern about 'an early determination of qualified immunity,'. . . did not prevent full pretrial discovery that included taking the deposition of Office McGuire. Moreover, as I have demonstrated, the case is hardly an appropriate one for creating an unsupported and unjustified exception to the normal rules that govern the consideration of a motion for summary judgment. If Officer McGuire should prevail on a defense of qualified immunity, then that judgment must be made by a jury. I conclude with where I began, with the words from Scott v. Henrich, 39 F.3d 912 (9th Cir.1994). In a case such as this, 'the court may not simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer. It must also look at the circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story, and consider whether this evidence could convince a rational factfinder that the officer acted unreasonably.'. . I dissent because, unlike the majority, I believe that the evidence in this case could convince a rational factfinder that the officer acted unreasonably.") Sandoval v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 756 F.3d 1154, 1166, 1167 (9th Cir. 2014) ("The district court found that the boys and Sandoval stated claims for excessive use of force, but that governmental interests in officer safety, investigating a possible crime scene, and controlling an interaction with possible burglars outweighed the intrusions upon the Sandovals' rights. In reaching this conclusion, the court improperly 'weigh[ed] conflicting evidence with respect to ... disputed material fact[s].'. . For instance, the court justified the use of force against the boys on the grounds that they were 'potentially noncompliant,' and against Sandoval and Henry on the grounds that they were 'acting irrationally' and 'not complying with the officers' commands,' and that the police were continuing to investigate a 'potential' or 'possible crime scene.' Each of these conclusions was based on conflicting testimony, and drew upon the officers' version of events rather than the Sandovals' testimony. . . . Taken in the light most favorable to the Sandovals, the evidence reflects that the boys complied with the officers' commands at all times; that the officers detained Henry despite what they concede was his full compliance outside the house and despite their knowledge that he had committed no crime; and that, by the time Sandoval returned home, the officers knew or had come to assume that Henry lived in the home and that none of the boys had been in the house illegally. . .The evidence does not justify the district court's conclusion that the officers had a 'reasonabl [e] belie[f] that the three young men were committing a burglary'. . . or that the officers were investigating a 'potential crime scene' during the contested exercises of force. To be sure, the reasonableness inquiry in the context of excessive force balances 'intrusion[s] on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests' against the government's interests. . . But in weighing the evidence in favor of the officers, rather than the Sandovals, the district court unfairly tipped the reasonableness inquiry in the officers' favor. We reverse the grant of qualified immunity to the officers on the Sandovals' excessive force claims.")

Green v. City and County of San Francisco, 751 F.3d 1039, 1052, 1053 (9th Cir. 2014) ("In this case, the district court found that Sergeant Kim was protected by qualified immunity based on the finding that Sergeant Kim did not violate any constitutional right. However, as the preceding analysis makes clear, this remains an open question for the jury, and Sergeant Kim cannot be granted qualified immunity at summary judgment on this basis. Instead, we proceed to the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry, that is, whether 'the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the incident such that a reasonable officer would have understood her conduct to be unlawful.'. . This requires two separate determinations: (1) whether the law governing the conduct at issue was clearly established and (2) whether the facts as alleged could support a reasonable belief that the conduct in question conformed to the established law. . . Both are questions of law to be determined by the court in the absence of genuine issues of material fact. . . Here, the first element is satisfied as a matter of law. It was established at the time of the incident that individuals may not be subjected to seizure or arrest without reasonable suspicion or probable cause, especially when the stop includes detention and interrogation at gunpoint, and that highly intrusive measures may not be used absent extraordinary circumstances. . . .We must then determine whether an officer, given the specific facts at issue, 'could have reasonably believed at the time that the force actually used was lawful under the circumstances.'. . This requires us to look at what Sergeant Kim knew at the time and whether it was sufficient to support a reasonable officer's belief that his actions were lawful. . . While also generally a question of law to be determined by the court, there are disputed material facts here that prevent us from making such a finding at this juncture. . . For example, it is disputed whether Sergeant Kim had reason to believe that Officer Esparza had not visually confirmed the plate, and how much force was actually used in effecting the stop. These are both material facts that preclude a determination as to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. Moreover, even if material facts did not preclude this determination, Sergeant Kim would not be entitled to qualified immunity based on the facts as currently alleged. . . .When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Green, we cannot make a determination as a matter of law that Sergeant Kim 'could have reasonably believed at the time that the force actually used was lawful under the circumstances.'. . Instead, this question must go before a jury.")

A.D. v. California Highway Patrol, 712 F.3d 446, 456, 457-59 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Markgraf argues that we should disregard the jury's finding and analyze, objectively, whether he could have acted with a legitimate objective. However, the verdict precludes us from hypothesizing about whether Markgraf could have believed that a legitimate law enforcement objective existed. . . . According to the jury's view of the facts, Markgraf shot Eklund without a legitimate law enforcement objectives. . .We would not be deferring to that view if we now held that Markgraf was entitled to qualified immunity, because he could have believed a legitimate law enforcement objective existed under the circumstances. . . Although such an inquiry might be appropriate when a defendant asserts qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment or a pre-verdict JMOL motion, the jury's view of the facts must govern our analysis once litigation has ended with a jury's verdict. Markgraf is not without recourse just because the jury has rendered a verdict against him. He could have directly attacked the sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's verdict on appeal, but he did not. However, even if he had done so here, we agree with the district court that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict at trial. . . . Therefore, we affirm the district court's denial of Markgraf's renewed motion for JMOL. The jury reasonably found that Markgraf shot Eklund with a purpose to harm unrelated to the legitimate law enforcement objectives of arrest, self-defense, or defense of others. It was clearly established before their encounter that such conduct violated Plaintiffs' substantive due process rights. Therefore, Markgraf is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . While in a Fourth Amendment case we could choose not to accept the jury's conclusion that the officer's conduct was unreasonable, here, we cannot disregard the jury's reasonable finding of fact that Markgraf acted with a subjective bad intent. Further, unlike a motion to dismiss or motion for summary judgment, we must defer to the facts as they were reasonably found by the jury—we do not draw our own inferences from them. . . . In practice, our analysis might have the effect of foreclosing qualified immunity defenses in similar cases where a jury finds that a defendant has violated the constitution by acting with a prohibited intent. However, we do not hold that a court cannot conduct an objective qualified immunity analysis after a jury verdict. . . Rather, post-verdict, a court must apply the qualified immunity framework to the facts that the jury found (including the defendant's subjective intent).")

Borquez v. City of Tucson, 475 F. App'x 663, 2012 WL 1201677, at *1, *2 (9th Cir. Apr. 11, 2012) ("The district court properly granted judgment as a matter of law on the excessive force claim, because Sergeant Fabian Pacheco was entitled to qualified immunity. As reflected by the special verdict form, the jury found that Borquez 'grabbed the arm of Defendant Fabian Pacheco as they encountered each other near the front door' of the residence. At the time his arm was grabbed, Pacheco was escorting an arrestee (Borquez's adult son) to a police vehicle. Pacheco shoved Borquez, and Borquez stumbled, hitting his head against a wall and injuring his knee as he fell to the ground. Given the jury's finding that Borquez grabbed Pacheco's arm, we conclude that it would not have been sufficiently clear to every reasonable officer whether Pacheco's shove was unlawful under these conditions. . . Therefore, Pacheco is entitled to qualified immunity. Borquez unpersuasively argues that the district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law is inconsistent with the jury's finding that Pacheco used excessive force. Although we give deference to the jury's verdict, whether a right is clearly established is a pure question of law that is reserved for a court to decide. . . This is a threshold determination that is distinct from the merits of the claim. . . . [On false arrest claim,] [t]he jury's finding that Borquez did not use or threaten to use physical force 'to knowingly obstruct, impair or hinder the enforcement of the penal law or the preservation of the peace' is not dispositive. Though the jury may have concluded that Borquez did not in fact commit the offense of interfering with governmental operations, that does not preclude probable cause to make an arrest.")

Conner v. Heiman, 672 F.3d 1126, 1131 & n.2 (9th Cir. 2012) ("After Hunter, this Court altered its approach to resolving questions of qualified immunity. See Act Up!/Portland, 988 F.2d at 873. Under the current approach, a district court should decide the issue of qualified immunity as a matter of law when 'the material, historical facts are not in dispute, and the only disputes involve what inferences properly may be drawn from those historical facts.' Peng, 335 F.3d at 979–80. Only where 'historical facts material to the qualified immunity determination are in dispute' should the district court submit the issue to a jury. Torres v. City of Los Angeles, 548 F.3d 1197, 1211 (9th Cir.2008). . . . Torres stands for the principle that the district court should submit the question of qualified immunity to the jury only if the parties materially dispute what officers knew at the time they arrested a suspect. Put another way, while determining the facts is the jury's job (where the facts are in dispute), determining what objectively reasonable inferences may be drawn from such facts may be determined by the court as a matter of logic and law.")

Luchtel v. Hagemann, 623 F.3d 975, 982 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Police officers need not use the least intrusive means available to them, see Scott v. Henrich, 39 F.3d 912, 915 (9th Cir.1994), yet these officers applied the least amount of force necessary to subdue Luchtel by pinning her to the ground and handcuffing her. They did not deploy a taser despite Luchtel's violent, aggressive, and unpredictable behavior. They did not use batons or other weapons, such as pepper spray. There is no allegation that the officers punched or kicked Luchtel or applied knee strikes. Luchtel does not point to any record evidence that the officers engaged in any unnecessary manipulation of her arms. There is no claim or testimony that they wrenched her arms up or gratuitously intensified pain in the handcuffing process. Luchtel contends that she was 'held to the floor for at least ten minutes while handcuffed with a broken arm and dislocated shoulder.' Given Luchtel's hostile and aggressive behavior, it was reasonable to hold her in that position until she could be removed safely from her neighbor's home on a stretcher with restraints. Even accepting that it was the officers' conduct that caused the break in Luchtel's arm, it can't be disputed that Luchtel's active resistance was a contributing cause to whatever injuries she sustained. Although Luchtel's physical injuries and any limitations from them are distressing, it's not correct to put the blame at the officers' door absent evidence that excessive force was used. Given the totality of circumstances, including the context of the arrest, we conclude that there is no genuine issue of fact that a reasonable level of force was used.")

Luchtel v. Hagemann, 623 F.3d 975, 985 (9th Cir. 2010) (Beezer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In our judicial system, the jury is tasked with determining the credibility of witnesses and divining from the various testimonies what really happened. Because summary judgment deprives a party of the opportunity to have the jury examine the facts, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the party who is not seeking summary judgment, here, the plaintiff, Karey Luchtel. Rather than view the evidence in Ms. Luchtel's favor, the court's opinion ignores key testimony from a neutral witness that supports Ms. Luchtel's case and relies instead on the Seattle Police Department officers' version of events. This case should have gone to the jury on the excessive-force and assault-and-battery claims, and I dissent.")

Rodriguez v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 605 F.3d 703, 707 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The district court characterized the central question of our qualified immunity analysis-whether defendants violated a clearly established right of which a reasonable person would have known-as a factual inquiry, and denied immunity on the grounds that '[a] genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether the acts or omissions of Defendants ... were objectively reasonable.' Plaintiffs claim that we lack jurisdiction to review this determination, and that the question of qualified immunity must therefore go to a jury. But the contours of the right at issue, and the reasonableness of defendants' actions, is not a question of fact-it's a question of law. See, e.g., Knox v. Southwest Airlines, 124 F.3d 1103, 1107 (9th Cir.1997). In answering that question, we may not disregard material factual disputes identified by the district court. Gates, 229 F.3d at 1286. But we undoubtedly have jurisdiction to determine whether, taking the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, defendants would have violated a constitutional right of which a reasonable government official would have been aware.")

Tortu v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., 556 F.3d 1075, 1085 & n.9 (9th Cir. 2009) ("In applying the Supreme Court authority, we conclude that a qualified immunity analysis consists of two steps. The first step analyzes whether a constitutional right was violated, which is a question of fact. The second examines whether the right was clearly established, which is a question of law. Step two serves the aim of refining the legal standard and is solely a question of law for the judge. . . . The dissent contends that a new trial can properly be granted on the independent ground of qualified immunity. The determination of qualified immunity at step two is strictly a legal question of whether, even though the facts alleged by the plaintiff make out a constitutional violation, that constitutional right was not clearly established. That issue could have been raised by a motion under Rule 50(a), as was done in Torres, 548 F.3d at 1210. However, without the requisite Rule 50(a) motion, this purely legal issue could not be revived under Rule 50(b). There is no authority that this legal issue could be revived as a ground for a new trial under Rule 59.")

Tortu v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., 556 F.3d 1075, 1090, 1091 (9th Cir. 2009) (Smith, J. concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("When the facts are undisputed and the jury has properly found a violation of constitutional rights, then determining whether those rights are clearly established (based on those same undisputed facts) is a question of law. However, when the facts are disputed and a trial does not resolve which facts are a violation of a constitutional right, a court cannot determine, as a matter of law, whether those rights are clearly established. . . . Those are the very circumstances of this case. From reading their opinions, both the district court and the majority agree that punching Tortu on the head would be an action in which Engle could engage and yet be entitled to immunity in these circumstances. Only when applying the qualified immunity analysis to Tortu's testicle injury do they disagree. Yet the jury was never asked the basis of their finding of unreasonable force, therefore the majority's analysis fails. Again, we are not here on summary judgment with de novo review and construing the facts in Tortu's favor. We also should not speculate (as the majority seemingly does) as to which facts the jury found to be in violation of Tortu's constitutional rights, and decide if those rights were clearly established. A new trial to determine those facts is therefore not an abuse. We must be certain 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'")

Bollinger v. Oregon, 305 F. App'x 344, 2008 WL 5213433, at *1 (9th Cir. Dec. 11, 2008) ("The district court did not err in submitting the issue of qualified immunity to the jury. That defense was not precluded under the law of the case doctrine and Bollinger did not move for judgment as a matter of law (JMOL) at the close of evidence. . . .The district court did not err in precluding Bollinger's proposed witnesses from testifying about whether the law was clearly established. See Act Up!/ Portland v. Bagley, 988 F.2d 868, 873 (9th Cir.1993) ('The threshold determination of whether the law governing the conduct at issue is clearly established is a question of law for the court.').").

Torres v. City of Los Angeles, 548 F.3d 1197, 1210, 1211 (9th Cir. 2008) ("As Defendants argue, qualified immunity is a question of law, not a question of fact. . . But Defendants are only entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law if, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Torres, they violated no clearly established constitutional right. The court must deny the motion for judgment as a matter of law if reasonable jurors could believe that Defendants violated Torres' constitutional right, and the right at issue was clearly established. Plaintiffs here appeal the grant of a Rule 50(a) motion made after completion of the trial but before a jury verdict. While the Supreme Court has encouraged resolution of the qualified immunity issue early on in the lawsuit, such as at the summary judgment stage, . . . Defendants chose not to move for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, acknowledging that 'triable issues of material fact exist regarding probable cause for Plaintiff's arrest.' Thus, the case proceeded to trial before a jury. However, the same issues of material fact also prevent the court from granting the officers' motion for judgment as a matter of law . . . Indeed, we have explained that 'sending the factual issues to the jury but reserving to the judge the ultimate Areasonable officer" determination leads to serious logistical difficulties.' . . . [I]n this case historical facts material to the qualified immunity determination are in dispute.").

Franet v. County of Alameda Social Services Agency, Nos. 06-16039, 06-16120, 2008 WL 3992332, at *1, *2 (9th Cir. Aug. 14, 2008) (not published) ("There was sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that Castro's actions in seizing the children without a warrant were unreasonable . . . . As the jury found that Castro's conduct violated Franet's constitutional rights and the judge found that those rights were clearly established, Castro is not entitled to qualified immunity for the removal. . . . However, we reverse the jury's award of $50,000 to Franet for Castro's actions in taking the daughter for a sexual assault examination without Franet's consent or knowledge. While the jury was permitted to decide if Castro's conduct was reasonable, the district judge failed to find that the law giving parents the right to authorize their children's medical examinations was well-established. The decision of whether or not a right is clearly established is the province of the judge, not the jury, and the law on this right was not clearly established. . . . We affirm the district court's jury instructions on qualified immunity . The reasonableness of Castro's conduct in removing the children was an issue of fact for the jury to determine. . . The given instruction

Smith v. City of Hemet, 394 F.3d 689,704 n.7 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("Defendants suggest an additional ground upon which the order for summary judgment could be affirmed: qualified immunity. Whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity may depend in large part on factual determinations the jury will be required to make. Certainly, the use of a police canine and pepper spray could, under clearly established law, have constituted the use of excessive force in some circumstances, in which case the officers would have been put on notice that their conduct would be unconstitutional. . . .We choose, however, not to resolve the issue of qualified immunity on this appeal, preferring to allow the district court to consider that question initially.").

Grant v. City of Long Beach, 334 F.3d 795, 796 (9th Cir. 2003) (denying reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("The opinion filed December 16, 2002, appearing at 315 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir.2002) is amended as follows: At 315 F.3d at 1090, delete the last sentence in the second full paragraph which reads 'Therefore, the district court properly submitted the issue of qualified immunity to the jury and entered judgment upon its verdict.'").

Ortega v. O'Connor, 146 F.3d 1149, 1155-56 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Although the district court declared that it would not instruct the jury on qualified immunity, the plaintiff and the defendants jointly proposed to the district court, and the court accepted, a jury instruction that applied a 'reasonableness' test not, as the district court had suggested, to the search itself, but instead to the defendants' beliefs regarding the search. More important, that instruction stated that the reasonableness inquiry as to public officials' beliefs is determined under an objective standard – whether a reasonable officer would have believed he had a reasonable basis for the search. . . . The instruction, in fact, provided a classic qualified immunity instruction. . . . Here, the district court's "extra" reasonableness test. . . constituted an appropriate and proper instruction to the jury on the second prong of the defendants' qualified immunity defense–whether a reasonable state official could have believed his conduct was lawful–the prong as to which the existence of factual disputes requires the jury's determination.").

Jan. 15, 1998) (unpublished) ("To determine if Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this interlocutory appeal, we may consider whether Plaintiffs' rights were clearly established as a matter of law when Defendants allegedly violated those rights. Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 311 (1995). When the facts are not in dispute, we also may consider whether, as a matter of law, Defendants acted reasonably. *Act Up!/ Portland v. Thompson v. Mahre, 110 F.3d 716, 719-21 (9th Cir. 1997) ("[W]here there is a genuine issue of fact on a substantive issue of qualified immunity, ordinarily the controlling principles of summary judgment and, if there is a jury demand and a material issue of fact, the Seventh Amendment, require submission to a jury. . . . We agree with amici that denial of a defense motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity merely leaves the issue for trial, and does not destroy the defense. . . . in the course of pretrial proceedings, the parties stipulated to bifurcation and bench trial of the qualified immunity issue. . . . By stipulating to and participating without objection in this proceeding, Sergeant Steen waived the right to trial by jury of issues of fact relating to the qualified immunity issue under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 38(d). . . . Thus what took place was not a summary judgment denying qualified immunity, but rather a trial on the issue of qualified immunity, to the court without a jury.").

Escobar v. Scutella, 97 F.3d 1459 (Table), 1996 WL 547983, *2 (9th Cir. Sept. 25, 1996) ("While it remains an open question whether judge or jury should make the ultimate immunity decision in cases necessitating trial, . . . we have held that it is not reversible error for the question to be resolved by the jury, where the jury's underlying factual findings allow for only one conclusion." [citing Sloman, 21 F.3d at 1468]).

Acosta v. City and County of San Francisco, 83 F.3d 1143, 1147 (9th Cir. 1996) ("Instead of relying on the factual findings implicit in the jury's verdict in favor of the Acostas, the district court granted Yawczak qualified immunity based on its own contrary factual findings. The Acostas argue that regardless of whether it is the judge or the jury who makes the ultimate determination on the issue of qualified immunity, that decisionmaker must rely on the jury's factual findings as to the disputed issues of fact. They are correct. Regardless of who makes the ultimate determination as to qualified immunity, the jury, not the judge, must decide the disputed 'foundational' or 'historical' facts that underlie the determination.").

Dupard v. Kringle, N0. CV-88-22JET, 1996 WL 56098, *6 (9th Cir. Feb. 9, 1996) (Table) ("The district court did not err by instructing the jury on qualified immunity. Although ordinarily the question of qualified immunity should not be decided by the jury, here the marshals' qualified immunity turned on the resolution of disputed facts concerning '"what the officer and claimant did or failed to do,"' and thus a qualified immunity instruction was appropriate. [cites omitted] This particular 'qualified immunity' instruction, however, was misleading. The instruction wrongly focuses on whether the 'defendant[s] reasonably believed that' they were using a reasonable amount of force. The relevant inquiry is whether a reasonable marshal in the defendant's position could have believed his actions were lawful.").

Sinaloa Lake Owners Ass'n. v. City of Simi Valley, 70 F.3d 1095, 1099 (9th Cir. 1995) ("In this case, qualified immunity is not being decided at an early summary judgment stage but, instead, after an evidentiary trial of the case. Following our opinion in Sinaloa I, reversing the judgment on the pleadings and remanding for trial, no motion for summary judgment was made. The first motion for judgment based on qualified immunity was made after the conclusion of the plaintiffs case in chief. Although the court ruled as to the subordinate DSOD officials, it did not rule as to Doody until the presentation of all the evidence was complete. The court obviously deemed it important to consider all the evidence before the ruling. Thus, the earliest stage at which the district court deemed it appropriate to rule on qualified immunity for Doody was after the presentation of all the evidence. The district judge observed that the historical facts of what the DSOD officials knew, the action that was taken to breach the dam, and the person who made that decision were not in dispute. He noted that both the plaintiffs and the defendants relied on the same records, but characterized the reasonableness of the action differently. We have recently discussed the dilemma of the appropriate procedure to follow when qualified immunity is not decided at the summary judgment stage, but is presented as a defense at trial. The difficulty presented is what is appropriate for the judge to decide and what should be submitted to the jury when the facts are in dispute. Here, we are not faced with that issue because the essential facts relating to the defense of qualified immunity are not in dispute. It is important to recognize that although facts relating to the underlying issue of whether there was or was not a violation of due process were in dispute, the essential facts concerning the defense of qualified immunity were not in dispute.").

Hervey v. Estes, 65 F.3d 784, 789 (9th Cir. 1995) ("Hervey also argues that a jury should determine whether the affiant's false statements were material; in other words, could the magistrate have issued the warrant in the absence of the contested statements. At the summary judgment stage on the issue of qualified immunity, however, Hervey is not correct. [footnote omitted] Although the practical effect of this rule is to reserve to the court the issue of the materiality of the false statements, that is the result of our decision in Branch.").

Mendoza v. Block, 27 F.3d 1357, 1359-60, 1363 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Mendoza claims we must reverse because the district court improperly resolved disputed questions of fact without a jury. However, Mendoza waived any objection to the evidentiary procedure used by the court, even if the use of such a procedure would otherwise have been erroneous. Prior to trial, Mendoza moved for the district court to decide the qualified immunity issue....Both the original Act-Up! opinion, upon which Mendoza based his motion, and the subsequent superseding opinion state that disputed factual issues should be decided by the trier of fact. [cite omitted] Mendoza was therefore fully informed that factual disputes should be resolved by the trier of fact. In order to preserve an issue for appeal, a party must make known to the court any objection to the court's action.... Mendoza argues that the trial court erred in determining whether the deputies' conduct was objectively reasonable because in making such a determination the trial court made the same inquiry as would be made on the merits of the excessive force claim. He claims that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to find excessive force and that the trial court was not entitled to take that determination from the jury. Because Mendoza did not raise any objection to the court's decision to determine the objective reasonableness of the deputies' conduct, and ... asked the court to decide the entire question of qualified immunity, he did not preserve this issue for appeal.").

Sloman v. Tadlock, 21 F.3d 1462, 1468 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Where . . . officials are forced to go to trial because their right to immunity turns on the resolution of disputed facts, early determination [of the qualified immunity issue] is not possible. Although some of the reasons for the existence of the immunity doctrine are moot when trial is necessary, other equally important ones remain . . . . These reasons do not, however, suggest that a judicial determination at this stage is necessarily better than a jury verdict. The advantage of timing is already lost. [footnote omitted] In fact, sending the factual issues to the jury but reserving to the judge the ultimate 'reasonable officer' determination leads to serious logistical difficulties. Special jury verdicts would unnecessarily complicate easy cases, and might be unworkable in complicated ones. [cite omitted] . . . . The holdings and rationale of Hunter and Act Up!, though helpful, do not decide this case. Nor need we decide here whether judge or jury should be the ultimate decider once disputed foundational facts have been decided by the jury. In this case, the factual findings the jury must have made in imposing liability on [defendant] would require the district court to deny him qualified immunity in any event. Therefore, even if the court erred in sending the qualified immunity determination to the jury, the error was harmless.").

Act Up!/Portland v. Bagley, 988 F.2d 868, 873 (9th Cir. 1993) ("We interpret Hunter to hold that the question of whether a reasonable officer could have believed probable cause (or reasonable suspicion) existed to justify a search or an arrest is 'an essentially legal question,'. . . that should be determined by the district court at the earliest possible point in the litigation. Where the underlying facts are undisputed, a district court must determine the issue on motion for summary judgment.").

Act Up!/Portland v. Bagley, 988 F.2d 868, 874-75 (9th Cir. 1993) (Norris, J., dissenting) ("Act Up!/ Portland v. Bagley holds that the second prong of the qualified immunity test–whether 'agents acted reasonably under settled law in the circumstances,' [citing Hunter v. Bryant]–is no longer a jury question, but a question of law for the court. In so holding, Act Up! repudiates the settled law of seven circuits, including our own. [footnote omitted] Act Up! also defies our common law tradition, which since time immemorial has considered the reasonableness of human conduct to be a quintessential jury question. Finally by dividing the fact-bound question of the reasonableness of official conduct into two parts–with the jury resolving questions of evidentiary fact such as what officers knew and what they did and the court deciding the ultimate question of the reasonableness of their actions–Act Up! divides the decision-making process between judge and jury in a way that will cause procedural nightmares for district judges and civil rights litigants. . . . Act Up! disclaims any responsibility for inflicting such damage on the fabric of qualified immunity law, citing as the villain the Supreme Court's three-page summary reversal in Hunter v. Bryant. Act Up!'s reliance on Hunter, however, is misguided. In accusing the Supreme Court of overruling the settled law of seven circuits, without benefit of briefs or argument and without discussing or even citing that body of caselaw, Act Up! reads Hunter in a way that attributes to the Court an act of judicial arrogance and, indeed, irresponsibility. The Supreme Court rarely. . . makes new law in summary reversals, and it did not do so in Hunter.")

In reality, Murrietta-Golding was trying to keep his baggy pants from falling down. The evidence is such that a jury will have to determine whether Villalvazo's mistaken belief was reasonable.") Briscoe for the Estate of Taylor v. City of Seattle, No. C18-262 TSZ, 2020 WL 5203588, at *8-10 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 1, 2020) ("The dispositive question in this matter is whether, when Miller and Spaulding shot Taylor, they reasonably believed that he was reaching for a gun and thereby posed an immediate threat to their safety. In arguing that this issue should be reserved for the trier of fact, plaintiffs rely primarily on Cruz v. City of Anaheim, 765 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2014). Although Cruz is not entirely analogous, it does suggest that a reasonable jury could, in certain circumstances, disbelieve the accounts of several officers even though the perspective of the individual who was shot and killed could not be known. In other words, a 'they said, he's dead' situation does not necessarily result in summary judgment with respect to an excessive force claim. . . . [I]n this case, as in Cruz, the reasonable inferences from the evidence provide some support for the propositions that Taylor was not armed at the time he was shot and that Taylor was not engaged in the nonsensical act of drawing for a non-existent gun. . . while multiple officers aimed their weapons at him. Moreover, like in Cruz, in which the suspect might have been trying to comply with commands to get on the ground, but got caught in his seat belt, in this matter, Taylor might be viewed by a reasonable jury as having attempted to show his hands and get on the ground, as directed, but having difficulty doing so because the instructions were inconsistent[12] and he was confined within the space between the street curb, the passenger door, and the door frame of the Ford Taurus. Indeed, reaching for the running board of the vehicle for support, in an effort to lower himself, might explain the movements of Taylor's right arm and elbow. With Cruz in mind, and having considered 'the totality of the circumstances' from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, the Court cannot determine, as a matter of law, whether Miller's and Spaulding's use of deadly force was reasonable, given the severity of the crime and the factual issues concerning whether Taylor posed a threat to the safety of the officers. . . . The Ninth Circuit has also indicated that, prior to February 2016, when Taylor was shot, the law was 'clearly established' that law enforcement personnel 'may not kill suspects who do not pose an immediate threat to their safety' even if the suspects are armed. . . Whether Taylor was in possession of a gun and whether he attempted to gain access to it cannot be determined as a matter of law. Moreover, to the extent that Taylor's movements were misinterpreted as drawing for a non-existent weapon, the Court cannot, consistent with Beier, conclude that such mistake of fact was, as a matter of law, reasonable. To be clear, the Court is not concluding that Miller and Spaulding are not entitled to qualified immunity; the Court is merely ruling that factual questions preclude a grant of summary judgment on the subject and the issue of whether Miller and Spaulding should be insulated from personal liability must await trial.")

Shannon v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:15-CV-00967 KJM DB, 2018 WL 3861604, at *7–8 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 14, 2018) ("Whether Jones is entitled to qualified immunity depends on how the jury resolves the core factual disputes related to his firing the first shot. See Gelhaus, 871 F.3d at 1021 (deciding the same). Although qualified immunity should generally be determined at the earliest possible point in litigation, granting summary judgment ' "is inappropriate where a genuine issue of material fact prevents a determination of qualified immunity until after trial on the merits."'. . Here, the jury could find that Mr. Shannon was not blinded by the floodlights, that Mr. Shannon knew the command to drop his gun came from deputies, and that Mr. Shannon turned towards the deputies with his gun in a threatening position if not pointed directly at them. If the jury returned such a verdict, Jones would likely be entitled to qualified immunity. Conversely, if plaintiff's version of the facts prevails and the jury concludes Mr. Shannon posed no imminent threat to the deputies, then his right to be free of excessive force in this context was clearly established at the time of the shooting, as outlined in Harris, 126 F.3d at 1204 ("Law enforcement officials may not kill suspects who do not pose an immediate threat to their safety or to the safety of others simply because they are armed."), and Curnow, 952 F.2d at 325 ("officers could not reasonably have believed the use of deadly force was lawful because [plaintiff] did not point the gun at the officers and apparently was not facing them when they shot him the first time."). Because Jones's entitlement to qualified immunity depends on disputed facts that must be resolved by a jury, granting summary judgment on this question would be premature. . . Although mindful of the Supreme Court's emphasis on qualified immunity as 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense … [that] is effectively lost' once a case goes to trial, and the Court's emphasis on 'the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation,'. . . this court is not able to resolve qualified immunity in this case on the current record. This court is not alone among trial courts to reach such a conclusion in factually complex cases. . . The court DENIES defendants' motion for summary judgment on the excessive force claim to the extent it derives from Jones's initial shot. . . .The same approach set out above guides the court's qualified immunity analysis with respect to the deputies' decision to fatally shoot Mr. Shannon. Whether either deputy is entitled to qualified immunity for this use of force depends on how the jury resolves core factual disputes regarding Mr. Shannon's conduct immediately before the deputies' fatal shots were fired. . .The jury may find that Mr. Shannon refused to drop his second gun, despite repeated commands to do so; that he intended to commit suicide by cop and yelled at and taunted the officers to shoot him; that he refused, for approximately three minutes, to respond to the deputies' commands to disarm; and that the deputies' simultaneous, split-second decision to shoot was a response to Mr. Shannon's pointing his gun directly at the them. After such a verdict, the officers would likely be entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable officer could find using deadly force in that scenario was reasonable. . . But again, the jury could believe a different narrative: That Mr. Shannon never yelled suicidal commands; that the deputies' estimate that they ordered him to disarm for three minutes before fatally shooting him was inaccurate; and that Mr. Shannon never pointed his gun at the deputies. In March 2014, it was clearly established that deadly force is unjustifiable when the only provocation is holding a gun in a non-threatening position. . . Because the deputies' entitlement to qualified immunity depends heavily on whether the fact finder believes uncorroborated testimony, granting summary judgment on this question here too would be premature.")

McGregor v. Kitsap County, No. C17-5436 RBL, 2018 WL 2317651, at *4 (W.D. Wash. May 22, 2018) ("At summary judgment. . . the Court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to McGregor as the nonmoving party. McGregor presents testimony that she discarded the handgun and emerged from behind the woodpile unarmed, as ordered by Deputy Corn. . . The record also suggests that McGregor was contained, that deputies were aware that McGregor was suicidal and had a history of mental illness, that there was substantial distance (114 feet) and cover between McGregor and the officers limiting any potential threat, that she was not warned prior to the use of deadly force, and that a deputy trained in crisis negotiation was en route. The Court cannot determine as a matter of law that Deputy Sapp's decision to shoot an unarmed, suicidal person in the midst of a mental health crisis from 114 feet away was objectively reasonable, especially when the deputies might have chosen not to engage Plaintiff while awaiting the arrival of a trained negotiator.[7] If the situation was as Plaintiff presents it, there was no pressing reason for Deputy Sapp to use deadly force, and McGregor has alleged a viable excessive force claim. . . . Despite Defendants contention that there is no case law dealing with sufficiently similar facts, 'case law has clearly established that an officer may not use deadly force to apprehend a suspect where the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer or others.'. . . Additionally, there are decisions in this circuit putting Defendants on notice that it is unreasonable for a police officer to shoot a mentally or emotionally disturbed individual, who does not pose a flight risk or threat to others. Deorle, 272 F.3d at 1282–83; Glenn v. Washington Cty., 673 F.3d 864, 875–76 (9th Cir.

2011). Defendants attempt to distinguish this case from existing case law by arguing that Deputy Sapp knew that McGregor was armed and feared for the safety of himself and his fellow officers. But again, Defendants' motion for summary judgment is largely based on its own version of disputed facts. The circumstances that Defendants ask the Court to measure Deputy Sapp's conduct against are not as straightforward as Defendants suggest. Because the reasonableness of Deputy Sapp's decision to shoot McGregor depends on disputed issues of material fact, it is not a legal inquiry, but rather a question of fact best resolved by a jury. . . The Court cannot conclude as a matter of law that Deputy Sapp's belief that deadly force was warranted was reasonable under the circumstances.")

Thomas v. Cannon, No. 3:15-05346 BJR, 2017 WL 2954920, at *2 (W.D. Wash. July 10, 2017) ("Defendants move for qualified immunity as to Plaintiffs' excessive force claims. Defendants pled qualified immunity as an affirmative defense in their answer to the complaint, but did not seek relief on the issue until the instant motion. While it is preferable to have the question of qualified immunity resolved before trial thus preempting the expense and effort involved in a trial, it is not always the case that this can be done. See Torres v. City of Los Angeles, 548 F.3d 1197, 1210 (9th Cir. 2008) (noting that "[w]hile the Supreme Court has encouraged resolution of the qualified immunity issue early on in the lawsuit," triable issue of fact may preclude summary judgment on the issue). If, as here, there are factual disputes as to what took place and whether a defendant's conduct violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights, such disputes must be resolved by the jury. . . If the jury finds that the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated, then the question as to whether a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct was unlawful is one for the court to decide. . . Therefore, the Court instructs counsel to jointly propose a verdict form that presents to the jury the factual issues that it must resolve with respect to Defendants' qualified immunity defense. In the event the jury finds the necessary underlying constitutional deprivation, this Court will determine the qualified immunity issue as a matter of law while taking into account the jury's factual findings.")

Clifford v. Clark, No. 2:11-CV-02591-MCE, 2015 WL 2235404, at *4-5 (E.D. Cal. May 11, 2015) ("[A]ccording to Defendant, there is no genuine dispute over material issues of fact in this case because Clifford's capability of making a controlled reach for the gun is not material. The central issue in any excessive force case is 'whether it was objectively reasonable under the circumstances for the officer to believe that the individual posed an immediate threat to their safety, warranting the immediate use of deadly force, rather than less severe alternatives.'. . Defendant's inconsistent description of the events leading up to the shooting is material to determining Defendant's credibility and the reasonableness of the force used against Clifford. If the jury finds that Defendant is not credible, it could find that Clifford was not reaching for the gun. The jury could then find that the use of force was not objectively reasonable under the circumstances. Thus, it was not clear error for the Court to hold that there are remaining material issues of fact that must be resolved by a jury. Finally, Defendant asserts that he is entitled to the second prong of qualified immunity, namely, that the use of force was appropriate because the suspect 'posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officer or others.' Defendant's reliance on the defense of qualified immunity is unavailing. At summary judgment, resolution of the qualified immunity defense turns on whether the undisputed facts and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, show a violation of clearly established federal constitutional rights. See Tolan v. Cotton, ––U.S. ––––, ––––, 134 S.Ct. 1861, 1866, 188 L.Ed.2d 895 (2014). Again, the immediacy of the threat encountered by the Defendant turns on his credibility as to the facts of the encounter. Defendant fails to establish that this Court's previous ruling was clearly erroneous, and thus his instant argument fails as well.")

Estate of Lopez ex rel. Lopez v. City of San Diego, No. 13CV2240-GPC-MDD, 2014 WL 7330874, at *9 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 18, 2014) ("Defendants repeat their arguments that the totality of the circumstances would lead an objectively reasonable officer to believe that Officer Walb faced a life threatening situation. . . However, if a jury were to find that Lopez was getting down and did not keep his hand in his pocket or make some similar threatening gesture, and that Officer Walb violated his Fourth Amendment rights by shooting him while he posed no significant threat, the violation would be clearly established under the law set forth in Garner governing the use of deadly force to effect a seizure of a suspect. Therefore, the Court concludes that summary judgment on qualified immunity against Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim is not warranted.")

White v. Cnty. of San Diego, No. 13-CV-1166-MMA RBB, 2014 WL 8764094, at *9-10 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 12, 2014) ("First, as set forth in detail above, genuine issues of material fact exist regarding Astorga's shooting of White, specifically whether White indeed posed an 'immediate threat' to Deputy Burk's safety, whether it should have been apparent to Astorga that White may have been suffering from some sort of emotional disturbance, and whether alternative, non-lethal means of force were feasible. Upon construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a reasonable jury could find that Astorga used an unreasonable or excessive amount of force against White in shooting him, thereby violating White's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, whether Astorga is entitled to qualified immunity turns on the second Saucier inquiry—whether White's right was clearly established. . . . Defendants assert that Astorga's conduct was not clearly unlawful because a reasonable officer would believe that using deadly force was necessary to respond to the immediate safety threat that White posed to Deputy Burk. . .Defendants further contend that even if Astorga 'mistakenly perceived the imminence of the threat to Deputy Burk,' he would still be entitled to qualified immunity. As discussed in detail above, triable issues of fact exist regarding whether the deadly force Astorga used against White was objectively reasonable in light of the circumstances. These unresolved issues include how far away White was standing from Deputy Burk when Astorga shot him, and thus whether White indeed posed an 'immediate threat' to Deputy Burk's safety. The same issues of fact are material to determining whether a reasonable officer could believe—or be reasonably mistaken—that deadly force was lawful on the day in question. . . Accordingly, the Court finds Astorga is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. The Court finds genuine issues of material fact exist regarding whether Astorga's use of force in shooting White was objectively reasonable. The Court further finds that these unresolved issues of fact are also material to whether a reasonable officer could believe, or be reasonably mistaken, that the use of deadly force was lawful against White. Accordingly, Astorga is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Estate of Clifford v. Placer Cnty., CIV. S-11-2591 LKK/C, 2014 WL 4275959, *10, *11 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 28, 2014) ("The foregoing gives rise to a reasonable inference that Clifford was too impaired and confused to make a controlled reach for the gun on the passenger seat. The mere fact that Clifford had a gun in the car, without more, did not justify the use of deadly force. . . The key question here is 'whether a reasonable jury would necessarily find that' Clark 'perceived an immediate threat of death or serious physical injury at the time he shot' Clifford such that the use of deadly force was reasonable. . . Clark's description of events, if believed, is of a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation during which Clifford refused to comply with orders to keep his hands on the steering wheel and became more hostile and aggressive before deliberately and in a controlled manner reaching for the gun. Clark avers that Clifford made a controlled full arm's length reach for the gun after failing to comply with repeated orders to keep his hands on the steering wheel and not reach for the gun. If this is true, no reasonable jury would conclude that Clark violated Clifford's Fourth Amendment rights and, in any event, this court would find Clark entitled to qualified immunity. Clark's description of Clifford as significantly impaired, moving slowly, and confused about what was going on, together with the toxicology report showing Clifford's blood alcohol level at .223, however, raise serious questions about whether Clifford was capable of making a controlled reach for the gun. These questions, in turn, give rise to a question about Clark's credibility which must be resolved by a jury. If a jury believes that Clifford was too impaired to make a controlled reach for the gun it could disbelieve Clark's asserted reason for shooting Clifford. And if the jury disbelieved Clark's testimony that Clifford made a controlled reach for the gun, it could disbelieve some or all of Clark's testimony concerning events leading up to the shooting. . . Viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff and drawing all reasonable inferences therefrom, a reasonable jury could conclude that Clifford was too impaired to make a controlled reach for the gun and that Clark's asserted reason for shooting Clifford is not credible. If it so concluded, the jury could also find that Clark's use of deadly force was unreasonable and excessive and violated the Fourth Amendment. The second prong of the qualified immunity analysis requires the court to decide whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Clark's position that his use of deadly force was unlawful in the situation he faced. The question of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity is a question of law for the court. . . However, the court only resolves that question of law if all material facts are undisputed and, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the facts show the defendant did not violate clearly established federal constitutional rights. . . .The same credibility question that precludes summary judgment on the merits of plaintiff's second and eighth claims preclude a finding that Clark is entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.")

Estate of Harvey v. Jones, No. C05-1170RSM, 2006 WL 909980, at *10 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 6, 2006) ("Courts have struggled with the qualified immunity analysis on summary judgment when there are issues of fact relevant to that analysis. . . While the question of clearly established law is for the Court, it is the jury that is 'best suited to determine the reasonableness of an officer's conduct in light of the factual context in which it takes place.'. . The Court recognizes that the existence of a factual dispute is, of itself, not a sufficient basis to deny summary judgment on a qualified immunity claim. . . However, once the Court has concluded that plaintiff's facts would establish a constitutional violation if proven true, and that the right violated is clearly established, the objective reasonableness of the officer's conduct must be determined in light of the facts of the case. Those facts are yet to be determined by a jury, and the final step of the qualified immunity analysis must await that determination. Accordingly, as to plaintiff's § 1983 claim based on the alleged use of excessive force during arrest, the motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity must be denied at this time.")

However, if a genuine issue of material fact exists regarding the circumstances under which the officer acted, then the court should make the determination after the facts have been developed at trial.")

Burnett v. Bottoms, 368 F.Supp.2d 1033, 1042, 1043 (D. Ariz. 2005) ("The Ninth Circuit has repeatedly stated that whether the force used to arrest an individual is reasonable is 'ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.' . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Plaintiff on her excessive force claim, the Court finds that she has established the existence of disputed material issues of fact which may only be resolved by a jury. Because Plaintiff and the Defendants offer varying accounts of the events surrounding Plaintiff's arrest–namely whether Plaintiff resisted arrest, whether she intentionally caused herself to fall, whether the officers intentionally and unreasonably dropped her 'face down to the ground,' intentionally and unreasonably dragged her on her knees on the hot September Phoenix asphalt pavement, and unreasonably placed her in handcuffs that were excessively tight for an unreasonable period of time–the Court finds that summary judgment as a matter of law is inappropriate. How these facts are resolved by the jury through the use of special interrogatories will determine whether the officers' actions constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. See, Littrell v.. Franklin, 388 F.3d 578 (8th Cir.2004)(district court improperly submitted the legal question of qualified immunity to the jury); accord Alvarado v. Picur, 859 F.2d 448, 451 (7th Cir.1988) (rejecting a jury instruction that told jurors the defendants would be immune from suit if their actions did not violate clearly established law, reasoning '[h]ow was the jury supposed to determine the law on the dates in question? And, if the jury somehow could determine the law on the dates in question, how was it supposed to determine if that law was "clearly established"?'). If the officers engaged in the conduct that Plaintiff alleges and if Plaintiff never resisted arrest or struggled and presented no threat to officer safety or the safety of others, a trier of fact could find that the officers used excessive force during the course of her arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Additionally, if Plaintiff cooperated after she was handcuffed and officers still physically picked her up and carried her, dropped her face down to the ground, and placed her in excessively tight handcuffs which caused her wrists to bleed and refused to loosen them upon fair notice the handcuffs were too tight or were on for an unreasonable period of time, the officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Before September, 2002 when these events took place, it was clearly established that a police officer was not entitled to use such force against a handcuffed, secured, cooperative prisoner or arrestee.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Wilkins v. City of Tulsa, Oklahoma, 33 F.4th 1265, 1275-77 (10th Cir. 2022) ("On summary judgment, the district court was required to accept Mr. Wilkins's version of events so long as it was not 'blatantly contradicted' by the video. . . Instead, the district court stated that pepper spray was reasonable due to Mr. Wilkins's 'continued movement and resistance,' . . . and that the 'bodycam video appear[ed] to confirm the officers' testimony[.']. . . But we have carefully viewed the video and conclude that it does not blatantly contradict Mr. Wilkins's account. The district court erred by adopting the officers' version of events. A reasonable jury could find that the use of pepper spray was unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . .The law clearly established that the use of pepper spray on Mr. Wilkins was unconstitutional. . . Two of our cases—Weigel v. Broad and Perea v. Baca—are analogous to this case. In both, we evaluated officers' additional use of force after they had tackled suspects to the ground. . . . On February 5, 2017, a reasonable officer would have known that use of pepper spray on Mr. Wilkins when he was facedown, handcuffed, legs secured, and not resisting was unconstitutional. Our precedent clearly established that force against a subdued suspect who does not pose a threat violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . The officers contend that no reasonable officer would have thought the use of pepper spray on a 'suspect who continued to resist and prevent the search of his pockets would be unlawful.'. . But their argument presumes their version of the facts, not Mr. Wilkins's, which we must accept at summary judgment. . . Under the proper view of the facts, Mr. Wilkins did not resist after the officers forced him to the ground. Shooting pepper spray into his face violated clearly established law. We thus reverse summary judgment for the officers on Mr. Wilkins's excessive force claim because they were not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Taylor v. Salt Lake City, 16 F.4th 744, 759-61, 765-774 (10th Cir. 2021), pet. for cert. filed, No. 21-1225 (U.S. Mar. 7, 2022) ("Construed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the undisputed facts in this case—including the clear video evidence—indicate that the first and third factors favor Plaintiffs. However, '[a]lthough the first and third [Graham] factors can be particularly significant in a specific case, the second factor—whether there is an immediate threat to safety—"is undoubtedly the most important ... factor in determining the objective reasonableness of an officer's use of force."'. . 'That is particularly true when the issue is whether an officer reasonably believed that he faced a threat of serious physical harm.'. . And, not only is the second factor of singular importance, it also is the most 'fact intensive factor.'. . At bottom, then, 'it [is] insignificant whether [an individual was] arrested for a minor crime or was not even a criminal suspect if it reasonably appeared that he was about to shoot a gun at an officer from close range.'. . And the truth of this proposition is on full display here. We conclude that Graham's second factor favors Defendants and controls the outcome of this case. In particular, considering the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that Officer Cruz used deadly force in response to a reasonably perceived mortal threat from Mr. Taylor. Thus, his decision to shoot Mr. Taylor was objectively reasonable and, consequently, he did not violate Mr. Taylor's Fourth Amendment rights. This holding provides a sufficient basis for affirming the district court's grant of qualified immunity. . . . Although Mr. Taylor 'was unarmed,' that 'does not resolve whether the officers violated his constitutional rights. The salient question is whether the officers' mistaken perceptions that [Mr. Taylor] was [about to use a firearm] were reasonable.'. . Recall that when we assess whether a suspect poses an immediate threat permitting the use of deadly force, we consider the totality of the circumstances from the perspective of a reasonable officer. . . . Resolving all factual ambiguities and reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, we nevertheless conclude that Officer Cruz could have reasonably believed that Mr. Taylor posed a mortal threat to him or others—even though Officer Cruz was tragically mistaken. . . . Stated otherwise, at the culmination of this tense, rapidly-evolving interaction with Mr. Taylor—when, without verbal warning, Mr. Taylor rapidly used his left hand to lift his shirt, while removing his right hand from his waistband—a reasonable officer could have well decided that Mr. Taylor's conduct was hostile and, indeed, involved a mortal threat of gun violence, even if that judgment ultimately was mistaken. . . . [T]he record does not support Plaintiffs' contentions that Mr. Taylor's hand movements at the end of his interaction with Officer Cruz are consistent with Mr. Taylor simply pulling up his pants or complying (albeit belatedly) with the officers' commands to show his hands. . . Indeed, as the district court noted, '[t]he undisputed material facts ... do not reasonably suggest that Mr. Taylor abruptly decided to become compliant with the officers' commands that he stop and show his hands.'. .Rather, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the record indicates that Mr. Taylor's hand gestures immediately before he was shot were consistent with drawing a gun against Officer Cruz or the other officers, . . . that is, his conduct reflected bad intentions. Furthermore, recall that Mr. Taylor's actions before this ultimate moment when Officer Cruz shot him likewise were not indicative of benign intentions. In particular, not only did Mr. Taylor ignore commands from the officers to stop and show his hands—he also verbally challenged them, saying things like, 'What are you going to do? Come on, ... shoot me,' and 'Nah, fool.'. . In sum, we conclude that the record evidence indicates that—even if Mr. Taylor's subjective intentions were good or harmless—his manifest intentions were hostile and malevolent. . . . [S]ome of our key cases in this area 'teach that the totality of the facts to be considered in determining whether the level of force was reasonable includes any immediately connected actions by the officers that escalated a non-lethal situation to a lethal one.'. . . Here, even construing the record in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, there is no basis for concluding that Officer Cruz acted recklessly and unreasonably in the circumstances surrounding his seizure of (i.e., use of lethal force against) Mr. Taylor, or that any such actions by Officer Cruz 'immediately connected with the seizure' 'creat[ed] the need for force.'. . . Indeed, nothing in this record could lead a reasonable jury to infer that Officer Cruz recklessly caused Mr. Taylor to take actions to threaten Officer Cruz or his fellow officers with serious injury or death. . . . The critically important question is whether a reasonable officer standing in the shoes of Officer Cruz at the time of his encounter with Mr. Taylor would have felt justified in taking the steps that led to the use of deadly force. . . And, based on the totality of the circumstances, we answer this question in the affirmative. In so doing, we are mindful that the Fourth Amendment does not require police to use 'the least restrictive means as long as their conduct is reasonable.'. . And, in this regard, we are unpersuaded by Plaintiffs' specific contention that Officer Cruz and the other officers should have just 'driv[en] away' when they observed Mr. Taylor's group 'exit from [the] 7-Eleven without incident.'. . While the 9-1-1 call reporting a male flashing a gun could have been describing a low-level misdemeanor, or even no crime at all, we are not aware of any precedent indicating that a reasonable officer would have been obliged to drive away and forgo an investigation, and Plaintiffs offer us none. . .Even if we assume that Officers Cruz and Sylleloglou lacked a reasonable basis to stop and detain Mr. Taylor under the well-settled principles of Terry v. Ohio, . . . acting reasonably, they were nevertheless free to attempt to engage in a consensual interaction with Mr. Taylor and his companions in furtherance of their investigation into the circumstances surrounding the flashing of the gun. . . .Based on the foregoing, then, it cannot be said here that officer-initiated conduct recklessly heightened the atmosphere of 'tension and fear,'. . . which led Mr. Taylor to respond in a manner necessitating the use of deadly force. Instead, it was Mr. Taylor who was the primary initiator of actions that could have that effect. More generally, even construing the record in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, there is no basis for concluding that Officer Cruz acted recklessly and unreasonably in the circumstances surrounding his seizure of (i.e., use of lethal force against) Mr. Taylor, or that any such actions by Officer Cruz 'immediately connected with the seizure' 'creat[ed] the need for force.'. . Instead, Officer Cruz had probable cause to believe Mr. Taylor's last action was an attempt to use a firearm and presented a serious threat of mortal harm to him or his fellow officers. And he could reasonably respond with deadly force. . . .The events underlying this case are undoubtedly tragic: Officer Cruz was mistaken when he concluded that Mr. Taylor was a mortal threat to him or his fellow officers and, as a result, shot and killed Mr. Taylor. But '[t]he Constitution permits officers to make reasonable mistakes. Officers cannot be mind readers and must resolve ambiguities immediately.'. . And, based on the totality of the circumstances, we are constrained to conclude that Officer Cruz's split-second decision to use deadly force against Mr. Taylor was reasonable. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court properly granted Officer Cruz qualified immunity and entered judgment in his favor and also in favor of Salt Lake City.")

Estate of Taylor v. Salt Lake City, 16 F.4th 744, 774-87 (10th Cir. 2021), pet. for cert. filed, No. 21-1225 (U.S. Mar. 7, 2022) (Lucero, J., dissenting) ("22 seconds. That is precisely the time elapsed—22 seconds—from the moment Officer Bron Cruz stopped his police cruiser in a Salt Lake City 7-Eleven parking lot to the point at which he fatally shot twenty-year-old-innocent-unarmed Dillon Taylor. Dillon's crimes? Walking away from an unconstitutional police stop and pulling up his pants. The majority concludes, as a matter of law, that it was objectively reasonable, based on qualified immunity, to free Officer Cruz from any liability without a trial. This cannot be right. It is not the place of this court to resolve factual disputes as to the reasonability of Officer Cruz's actions. I am concerned about the extension of the judicially created doctrine of qualified immunity to shield officers even when there is a substantial and material dispute in the evidence as I explain below. I most respectfully dissent. . . .In their haste to grant Officer Cruz amnesty for his wrongful and unconstitutional actions, my colleagues commit the same errors as the district court: conveniently ignoring and misconstruing aspects of the record, impermissibly usurping the role of the jury by resolving material factual disputes, and flipping the summary

judgement standard on its head to interpret the record in the light most favorable to Officer Cruz. Moreover, my colleagues myopically focus on the last moments of Dillon's life and ignore the nearly eight-minute period Officer Cruz had to investigate or deescalate the situation. With no regard for Officer Cruz's failure to do either, the majority abrogates its constitutional duty to evaluate the reckless and deliberate nature of Officer Cruz's actions. . . . Although my colleagues pay lip service to the legal standard we use to evaluate qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, they misapply it throughout. Rather than ask the operative question: what a reasonable jury could conclude about Officer Cruz's actions, the majority seats itself in the jury box and makes its own declaration that Officer Cruz acted objectively reasonably. Summary judgment should not be granted based on qualified immunity where 'a reasonable jury could find facts supporting a violation of a [clearly established] constitutional right.'. . . The majority seizes on Scott to discount Plaintiffs' version of events by pointing to available body camera footage. Our circuit has repeatedly emphasized, however, that where video evidence is subject to multiple interpretations, it is the responsibility of the jury to resolve the dispute. . . Ignoring this admonition, the majority impermissibly utilizes subjective testimony from responding officers to interpret the footage, drawing conclusions that are not plainly established by the evidence. . . .I consider it significant that Officer Cruz had neither a constitutional basis for stopping the three men nor factual grounds to suspect that Dillon had a gun or committed any crime under Utah state law. . . . At the time he was shot, Dillon was merely exercising his right to walk away from an unconstitutional police stop. . . Indeed, the available body camera evidence shows that Dillon had turned and begun walking away from the police before Officer Cruz fully exited his vehicle. At that point, Dillon had no indication that he was the target of any investigation or that the officers were there to confront him. In the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could rely on these facts to support a conclusion that Officer Cruz lacked a reasonable basis to fear Dillon. More egregious, however, is the majority's application of the second Graham factor. . . . In their haste to absolve Officer Cruz of constitutional liability, my colleagues resolve several factual disputes in Officer Cruz's favor and credit his subjective interpretation of the encounter, even when contradicted by other testimony and objective evidence. . . After reading the majority opinion, I am left to wonder whether I viewed the same video evidence as my colleagues. . . . [T]he record shows that officers shouted confusing and contradictory commands at the three men to variously show their hands, put their hands up, and get on the ground. Because Dillon turned his back on the police officers before Officer Cruz exited his cruiser, it is unclear when Dillon understood that these commands were directed at him. The majority also inexplicably rejects evidence that Dillon had headphones in his ears for at least part of the encounter. Both Jerrail and Adam recounted in independent testimony that Dillon had earbuds in as he began walking away from the officers. Moreover, Officer Cruz's body camera footage clearly shows him moving the headphones away from Dillon's body after the shooting. The majority contends that it cannot consider this evidence because a reasonable officer in Cruz's position would have no way to know that Dillon was wearing headphones . . . but this conclusion assumes its own premise. A jury could conclude that a reasonable officer would have or should have seen the headphones, even if Officer Cruz did not. Further, because music might have impaired Dillon's ability to hear, understand, or otherwise comply with commands, a jury would be entitled to discount evidence of Dillon's noncompliance.

Following the shooting, responding Officer Downes admitted that the conflicting commands created an atmosphere of confusion. Although Officer Cruz's body camera establishes that he shouted several orders as he pursued Dillon, only two such commands were issued after Dillon turned around to face Officer Cruz, about 4 seconds before the shooting. In fact, video evidence unequivocally demonstrates that Officer Cruz fired his weapon before even completing the second command. Considering the totality of the circumstances, it is unclear at best what impact Dillon's noncompliance should have had on a reasonable officer. . . . Without any support from the record, both the majority and district court variously describe Dillon's hand motions as 'digging,' consistent with 'manipulating something,' and 'consistent with the drawing of a gun.'. .These characterizations at once take the evidence in the light most favorable to Officer Cruz and invade the province of the jury by interpreting video evidence that is subject to multiple interpretations. The majority summarily rejects Plaintiffs' contention that Dillon was merely attempting to pull up his pants or comply with Officer Cruz's commands to raise his hands. Although this view is by no means conclusively established by the record, it does enjoy evidentiary support. Both Adam and Jerrail independently testified after the shooting that Dillon was pulling up his pants when Officer Cruz pulled the trigger. . . Moreover, the hand motions came only a few seconds after he turned around to see Officer Cruz pointing a gun at him, a fact that could be interpreted to support the view that Dillon was attempting to comply with a command to show his hands. At bottom, however, the video is ambiguous as to what Dillon was doing with his hands during the encounter. We can see only that Dillon's hands are in his waistband as he turned to face Officer Cruz and that he removed at least his left hand at the time he was shot dead. To draw any further inferences or conclusions, as the majority does, is to resolve a factual question and usurp the jury. At the summary judgment stage, we must accept Plaintiffs' account of Dillon's hand motions because the video evidence is subject to competing interpretations. It is patently absurd to suggest that an officer's decision to shoot an unarmed young man for complying with an order or pulling up his pants could be objectively reasonable. Yet this is the result reached by application of the majority's legal error. . . . At this juncture, I would conclude under Graham and Larsen that Plaintiffs have met their burden of demonstrating a genuine dispute as to the reasonableness of Officer Cruz's fear. This finding alone is sufficient to meet the first prong of our qualified immunity inquiry. Yet even were the majority correct that the use of deadly force by Officer Cruz was objectively reasonable at the time he fired, Plaintiffs would still survive summary judgement under the second Sevier element. That is, Plaintiffs have also raised a material dispute as to whether Officer Cruz's 'own reckless or deliberate conduct' created the 'need' to use deadly force. . . To determine whether an officer's actions recklessly or deliberately created circumstances warranting the use of deadly force, we apply the same totality of the circumstances test as above, from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. . . The majority abrogates its constitutional duty to conduct this analysis by providing only a cursory account of Officer Cruz's actions leading up to his confrontation with Dillon. It uncritically adopts the district court's assertion that '[v]iewing the undisputed material facts in their totality, and in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Officer Cruz's conduct before and during the encounter did not recklessly or deliberately create the need for his use of deadly force.'. . This conclusion ignores both material disputes of fact and undisputed material facts that weigh in favor of Plaintiffs. . . .Perhaps the most critical factor supporting a finding of reckless or deliberate escalation on the part of Officer Cruz is the sheer lack of reasonable suspicion necessary to stop the three men in the first place. . . The Supreme Court has specifically held that 'an anonymous tip that a person is carrying a gun is, without more, [in]sufficient to justify a police officer's stop and frisk of that person.'. . Between the 911 call and absence of any incriminating actions during Officer Cruz's five-minute 'staging' period, he lacked any constitutional basis to stop the three men. The majority concedes as much, and instead argues that Officer Cruz was 'nevertheless free to attempt to engage in a consensual interaction with [Dillon] Taylor and his companions.'. . The obvious fallacy with this characterization is that the encounter was nonconsensual. Moreover, it disregards Dillon's constitutional right to walk away. . . Rather than acknowledge this right, the majority bizarrely cites Dillon's decision to walk away as evidence that 'Mr. Taylor was the primary initiator of the actions here that heightened the atmosphere of tension and fear.'. . Under the majority's logic, simply exercising one's right to end or avoid a consensual encounter with the police can serve as the basis for reasonable fear justifying the use of deadly force. The implications of this suggestion are staggering. . . .Because the majority rests on the first prong of qualified immunity analysis, it did not address the second: whether the right of an unarmed man walking away from a 'consensual' police encounter to be free from deadly force was clearly established at the time of Dillon's shooting. Upon concluding that Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute as to whether Officer Cruz violated Dillon's Fourth Amendment rights, I proceed to discuss whether such right was clearly established. The caselaw overwhelmingly answers in the affirmative. . . . I am mindful that the Supreme Court recently found Allen, Sevier, and Ceballos insufficient to clearly establish Fourth Amendment rights in a different factual context. In City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 595 U.S. ——, —— S.Ct. ——, —— L.Ed.2d ——, 2021 WL 4822664 (2021), the Court reversed a Tenth Circuit judgment denying qualified immunity to police officers that fatally shot a man approaching them while holding a hammer in a threatening manner. Specifically, the Court found that Tenth Circuit precedent did not clearly establish that the officers' actions were reckless or deliberate. . . The Court distinguished Allen because officers there ran towards a suspect while yelling, whereas in Bond the officers first had a calm conversation with the decedent. . . It dismissed Ceballos as irrelevant because it was decided after the facts in Bond. . . Finally, the Court differentiated Sevier because its general articulation of the rule that reckless and deliberate conduct can violate the Fourth Amendment was not sufficient to clearly establish the right in the specific factual context Bond presented. . . Dillon's case is materially different from the facts in Bond and is much closer to Allen and Sevier. Officer Cruz pursued Dillon, yelling with gun drawn, without observing a weapon or incriminating behavior. Indeed, he was responding to an unreliable 911 dispatch call that failed to even report a crime under Utah law. These facts are in accord with Allen, where police rushed a reportedly suicidal and visibly armed man in his car, attempting to wrest away a gun before shooting the man dead. . . Dillon's case is also similar to Sevier, in which police approached another reportedly suicidal man armed with a knife in his bedroom, yelling at the man to drop the knife, with their weapons drawn. . . In all three instances, police approached an individual that was either visibly armed or suspected to have a weapon. Without any affirmative threat from the suspect, the police in all three cases approached them rapidly, yelling, and with weapons drawn. Indeed, because the individuals in Allen and Sevier were both visibly armed, they posed a demonstrably greater threat to responding officers than Dillon. By contrast, in Bond, officers calmly approached the suspect, had a brief conversation with him and calmly followed him, with weapons still holstered, into a garage before the suspect grabbed a hammer and threateningly gestured towards police. . . Dillon was not afforded a similar calm conversation, nor did police calmly follow him with their weapons holstered in an attempt to deescalate the encounter. Thus, the Supreme Court's decision in Bond is inapposite to the facts of Dillon's case. I remain confident that Tenth Circuit precedent clearly established Dillon's right to be free from reckless and deliberate conduct creating the 'need' for deadly force. Accordingly, I conclude that Plaintiffs have established a genuine dispute of fact as to both the first and second prongs of qualified immunity analysis. Taking the record in the light most favorable to Dillon, a reasonable jury could find that Officer Cruz violated Dillon's clearly established right to be free from unlawful seizure under the Fourth Amendment. I would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of Officer Cruz and remand for trial. . . . It is one of the most settled principles in American law that a motion for summary judgment may not be granted if a genuine dispute of material fact exists, after construing the record in a light most favorable to the non-moving party. Today, this court at once invades the province of the jury to resolve disputes of material fact and disregards decades of Supreme Court precedent when it bends over backward to draw all possible inferences in favor of Officer Cruz. Although the majority's misapplication of the law is egregious on its own, we must not for one second lose sight of the behavior that the court rubber-stamps today. Officer Cruz is absolved of his constitutional obligation to reasonably investigate a plainly unreliable 911 complaint, the details of which he ignored. Three young Hispanic men were stopped without reasonable suspicion of any crime. Officers pursued an unarmed and non-threatening Dillon Taylor with guns drawn, ignoring his right to walk away from an unconstitutional stop. Adam and Jerrail were chastised for raising their hands too quickly, but Dillon was shot and killed for complying too slowly. As a result, yet another innocent young American is dead at the hands of police. That his family is left without so much as a trial to assess the reasonableness of these actions is a travesty of justice that I cannot abide. The resolution of this case by a panel of judges rather than a citizen jury is emblematic of profound structural issues with the judicially created doctrine of qualified immunity. Empirical evidence demonstrates that the doctrine as currently implemented fails to serve even its purported goal of protecting law-abiding government officials from the time and expense of frivolous litigation. See Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails, 127 Yale L.J. 2, 71 (2018). . . Rather, it functions to discourage the filing of meritorious civil rights claims and incents frivolous actions not subject to qualified immunity. . . At the same time, police kill nearly 1,100 Americans each year, a figure more than thirty times greater than other wealthy countries. . . Against this illogical backdrop, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that qualified immunity as currently constituted is broken. As Dillon's case so tragically illustrates, the doctrine precludes remedies for unconstitutional police actions while serving no discernible societal benefit. Of course, Dillon's family is not alone in bearing the costs of this confounding reality. . . So long as qualified immunity fails to serve any evident purpose, I am left to conclude that the reasonableness of governmental use of force is best assessed by juries comprised of citizens subjected to the police actions we are asked to judge. Particularly in cases like Dillon's, replete with disputed facts, it is clear that judicial adjudication of police use of force has failed to strike the appropriate balance between public safety and individual rights required by the Constitution. Dillon had a phone, a Snickers bar, and a nickel in his pocket—not a gun. Officer Cruz had no basis to believe otherwise. After paying careful attention to the facts and circumstances of this case, I cannot conclude that Officer Cruz's actions were objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when eight-and-a-half minutes after hearing the 911 dispatch, and 22 seconds after pulling up in his cruiser, he shot and killed Dillon Taylor for no crime at all. As Jerrail Taylor asks, as should we all: 'what the [expletive] did I just do, ... that I can't walk in America and buy a goddamn drink and a beer, like what am I doing wrong?'")

Shimomura v. Carlson, 811 F.3d 349, 357 (10th Cir. 2015) ("According to Mr. Shimomura, the video recording shows that Mr. Shimomura did not push his roller bag into Agent Carlson. But from where Officer Davis was positioned, he could reasonably believe that (1) he had seen Mr. Shimomura push his roller bag into Agent Carlson and (2) the contact resulted in at least slight physical injury. . . The reasonableness of that belief made probable cause at least arguable. Thus, even when we consider the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Shimomura, we conclude that Officer Davis is entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claim of unlawful arrest. . . . In reaching a contrary conclusion, the partial dissent points to
• Mr. Shimomura's allegation in the complaint 'that [Officer Davis] could not reasonably perceive evidence of bodily injury, such as pain' and
• uncertainty about what Officer Davis would have seen from his angle.
Dissent at 1–2. In our view, these two points do not create a genuine fact-issue on whether probable cause was at least arguable. Because the issue involves summary judgment, we must rely on the summary judgment record rather than Mr. Shimomura's allegations in the complaint. In support of the summary judgment motion, Officer Davis stated under oath that he had seen the roller bag strike Agent Carlson in the legs. . . Mr. Shimomura responded to the motion, presenting affidavits by himself and Agent Carlson. Agent Carlson's affidavit said that Officer Davis had seen the contact between the roller bag and Agent Carlson. . . Mr. Shimomura's affidavit was silent about what Officer Davis could see. Thus, for purposes of summary judgment, we have undisputed evidence that Officer Davis was able to see the contact between Agent Carlson and Mr. Shimomura's roller bag.") Shimomura v. Carlson, 811 F.3d 349, 362-63 (10th Cir. 2015) (Tymkovich, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority except as to its holding that Officer Davis is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Just as a jury in Tolan should have decided whether the undisputed words, in context, seemed threatening, a jury here should decide whether the undisputed contact, in context, seemed intentional or capable of causing bodily injury. We do not know what Officer Davis saw from his angle. All we have is the video, Shimomura's complaint, and affidavits presented on summary judgment. Those materials do not definitively settle the facts in Officer Davis's favor. A jury could find that even given his angle and how little time he had to process what had happened, it was unreasonable to think the contact was intentional or reckless. And a jury most certainly could find that there was no evidence of bodily injury. Having watched the video, I find it dubious that anyone viewing the contact from any angle could have reasonably thought that Agent Carlson felt pain. Although she later reported pain, it appears that this was not until after Shimomura's arrest. For those reasons, I respectfully dissent as to the conclusion that Officer Davis is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Abbo v. Wyoming, 596 F. App'x 709, 711-12 & n.4 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Although the governing case law likely supports a finding of probable cause, we begin and end our inquiry by asking whether the alleged infringed right was so clearly established that every reasonable official would have understood the troopers' actions violated the law. . . We conclude it was not. The troopers testified they smelled what they believed to be raw marijuana in Mr. Abbo's vehicle, and determined this gave them probable cause to search. . . Indeed, this court has repeatedly recognized the odor of raw marijuana establishes probable cause for a search. . . Once probable cause is established, troopers may search an entire vehicle. . . . Mr. Abbo contends the district court erred in determining the troopers actually smelled raw marijuana. He argues this was a disputed fact, and claims the district court improperly resolved it in favor of the troopers rather than Mr. Abbo, the non-moving party. In his Fed. R.App. P. 28(j) letter of November 17, 2014, Mr. Abbo quotes from Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S.Ct. 1861, 1866 (2014) (citation, quotations, and alterations omitted): '[b]y failing to credit evidence that contradicted some of its key factual conclusions, the court improperly weighed the evidence and resolved disputed issues in favor of the moving party.' We disagree. We understand the district court's opinion to find that the troopers smelled marijuana in a subjective sense, and not to establish that the troopers smelled what was, in fact, marijuana. The parties do not dispute this fact. Both troopers commented they smelled marijuana during their search. They subsequently testified under oath that they smelled raw marijuana in Mr. Abbo's car. At oral argument, counsel for Mr. Abbo conceded the troopers believed they smelled raw marijuana. . . The troopers' belief is not in question, and a mistake of fact does not defeat their determination of probable cause.")

Felders ex rel. Smedley v. Malcom, 755 F.3d 870, 885, 886 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[T]he district court held that the law was clearly established that facilitation of a dog's entry into a car without probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment, and that questions of fact remained as to whether Malcom facilitated Duke's entry prior to establishing probable cause. We agree with the district court's conclusion that the law was clearly established when Malcom conducted the dog sniff that facilitating a dog's entry into a vehicle without first establishing probable cause constitutes an improper search. . . . Malcom does not contest the district court's holding that the law was clearly established that an officer may not facilitate a dog's entry into the car prior to establishing probable cause. Rather, he argues that the facts in the record do not suggest that he violated this rule. We disagree. When the district court concludes that a reasonable jury could view the facts a certain way, we take them as true. [citing Tolan] Thus, at this stage in the litigation, we cannot rule out the possibility that Bairett caused the car doors to remain open, Malcom was aware that Bairett caused the car doors to remain open, and Duke failed to properly alert before entering the vehicle. . .If that is what actually happened, then Malcom violated clearly established law. Malcom therefore cannot show that no factual disputes stand between him and qualified immunity. . . . Malcom asks us to assume an alternative fact pattern. . . . But, we cannot say, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Felders, that Malcom did not know Bairett intentionally held open the doors, or that Duke alerted before jumping in the car in the first place. It follows then that we cannot determine whether qualified immunity applies in this context. In sum, although phrased as legal inquiries, Malcom's arguments ultimately dispute the set of facts the district court determined for us and which Lewis requires us to assume. Because we conclude that issues of material fact exist as to whether Malcom's conduct violated Felders's clearly established constitutional rights, we agree with the district court that Malcom was not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Cavanaugh v. Woods Cross City, 718 F.3d 1244, 1252-57 (10th Cir. 2013) ("Cavanaugh raises a more fundamental challenge to the jury instructions. She argues that the district court erred in submitting to the jury the question whether Officer Davis used excessive force. Cavanaugh contends the court should have given the jury special interrogatories to decide the factual disputes and made the legal determination itself whether Davis's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances. While the argument is not entirely without merit, the district court did not err in this case. . . .While Cavanaugh is correct that, generally, legal issues are for the court and factual issues for the jury, the excessive force question, like most Fourth Amendment inquiries, is a mixed question of law and fact. . . .As a general matter our cases hold that, where there are disputed issues of material fact, the question of reasonableness underlying a Fourth Amendment violation is for the jury. . . . Only where there are no disputed questions of historical fact does the court make the excessive force determination on its own, such as on summary judgment. . . . In this case, there were disputed issues of material fact relating to Officer Davis's use of the taser. . . . Due to these disputes of material fact, it was proper for the district court to send the question of whether Officer Davis's use of force was reasonable to the jury. But Cavanaugh contends the district court should have given the jury special interrogatories tailored to the Graham factors—and then the court should have applied the jury's findings to make the excessive force determination itself. Yet the cases she relies on for this proposition concern either (1) the court's evaluation of the excessive force issue at the summary judgment stage, or (2) the issue of qualified immunity, which involves both whether there was a constitutional violation and whether the violation was clearly established. None of the cases support the broad rule she seeks. . . In short, the court may rule on summary judgment that an officer's conduct was reasonable (or unreasonable) if the undisputed facts support such a conclusion. But the court's resolution of an excessive force claim as a matter of law, where there is no genuine issue of material fact, does not mean a jury cannot decide the question where there are disputed issues of material fact. . . .While our cases allow courts to broadly submit the constitutional violation question to a jury where there are disputed historical facts, that practice is not without limits. In many cases, the better practice is for the district court to use special interrogatories, at least where qualified immunity is at issue. For example, had the jury found for Cavanaugh in this case, the Defendants may have filed a motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity. Even though we previously held that under the version of facts presented by Cavanaugh, Officer Davis would not have been entitled to qualified immunity, there would have been no guarantee, without special interrogatories, that the jury found all the facts supporting such a determination. That is, the jury could have found there was a constitutional violation but nevertheless based that judgment on a set of facts less egregious than the one presented in Cavanaugh's case in chief—and thus the Defendants may have been entitled to qualified immunity. . . This is why, when qualified immunity is at issue, many courts have stated that the relevant disputed issues of fact must be resolved by the jury through special interrogatories, while the court must decide the qualified immunity question. . .We considered this question in some length in Gonzales. In that case, we endorsed two methods of submitting qualified immunity questions to the jury. The first was through special interrogatories, after which the 'court could then determine whether the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the clearly established law.'. . The second method allows a court 'to instruct the jury to determine what the defendant actually did and whether it was reasonable in light of the clearly established law defined by the judge.'. . But we condemned a third method of 'simply allow [ing] the jury to determine what the clearly established law is, what the defendant actually did, and whether the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the clearly established law found by the jury.'. .Even though Gonzales endorsed the second approach, it emphasized the approach should only be used 'rarely' in those circumstances 'when narrow issues of disputed material fact are dispositive of the qualified immunity inquiry.'. . '[T]he better approach,' we concluded, 'is for the court to submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts.'. . And we emphasized that 'allowing the jury to evaluate the objective reasonableness of a defendant's conduct' would be done 'only because specific key, disputed facts were dispositive of the qualified immunity issue.'. . Other courts have noted that some factual disputes may go both to the constitutional violation question and to the qualified immunity question. What happens then? They have given the constitutional violation question to the jury through a general verdict, while also giving it special interrogatories on factual issues that are crucial for determining qualified immunity. . . Or, as we noted in Gonzales, the court can submit only special interrogatories to the jury, and then '[o]nce the jury determines the purely historical facts, the judge then decides the three legal questions of qualified immunity: whether the actions violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, whether those constitutional rights were clearly established, and whether the objectively reasonable defendant 'would have known that his conduct violated that right.'". . Thus, for example, in this case, the court could have given interrogatories to the jury that pinned down whether a knife was visible or whether Officer Davis asked Cavanaugh to stop, both of which would have been relevant to whether a constitutional violation occurred in the first place and, if it did, whether Officer Davis should have known that his conduct violated Cavanaugh's rights. . . And then, assuming qualified immunity had been reasserted, the court could have decided the legal questions itself. Regardless of what the better practice may be (and it undoubtedly depends on the case), it is clear the district court here did not abuse its discretion in refusing to submit special interrogatories to the jury. Where qualified immunity is not at issue, a court may submit the excessive force question to the jury. Accordingly, we reject this basis for challenging the district court's judgment.") Bass v. Pottawatomie County Public Safety Center, No. 10-6215, 2011 WL 2193835, at 3-5 (10th Cir. June 7, 2011) ("The district court. . . gave two instructions regarding qualified immunity. In Instruction No. 16, the court instructed the jury as follows: If you find that Plaintiff has proven his claim, you must then consider the affirmative defense of Defendant Jerry Goodwill that his conduct was objectively reasonable in light of legal rules clearly established at the time of the incident at issue and that he is therefore not liable. This defense is known as qualified immunity. The qualified immunity defense recognizes that it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here protection of a detainee, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts. An officer might correctly perceive all of the relevant facts but have a mistaken understanding as to what the Constitution requires as protection of detainees in those circumstances. If the officer's mistake as to what the law requires is reasonable, however, the officer is entitled to the qualified immunity defense. . . In Instruction No. 17, the court then added the following: You are instructed that Defendant Jerry Goodwill cannot be held liable to Plaintiff in the event that you determine he is entitled to qualified immunity for his actions. If you find, after considering all the evidence before you, that the actions of defendant Jerry Goodwill were such that a reasonable person would have believed them to be lawful and not violative of some established statutory or constitutional right, which a reasonable person would have known, Defendant Jerry Goodwill is entitled to qualified immunity. . . These instructions clearly contemplated that the jury could find: (1) that Officer Goodwill was deliberately indifferent to Mr. Bass's safety and therefore violated Mr. Bass's constitutional rights; but (2) that Officer Bass was not liable to Mr. Bass for the violation because he made a reasonable mistake as to what the law required in terms of protecting Mr. Bass from other detainees. As the introductory sentence in Instruction No. 16 stated, '[i]f you find that Plaintiff has proven his claim, you must then consider the affirmative defense of Defendant Jerry Goodwill that his conduct was objectively reasonable in light of legal rules clearly established at the time of the incident and that he is therefore not liable.'. . Accordingly, there is a reasonable explanation that reconciles the jury's verdicts, and the explanation is that the jury found that Officer Goodwill violated Mr. Bass's constitutional rights, as necessary to support its verdict against the Jail under principles of municipal liability, but the jury did not impose liability against Officer Goodwill because it found that he nonetheless acted reasonably and was therefore entitled to qualified immunity. The Jail's facially appealing response to this explanation is that the jury could not have found that Goodwill both violated Bass's constitutional rights and that he acted 'objectively reasonably' ... [because] a jail employee who knowingly and recklessly disregards a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate would, by definition, be acting in an objectively unreasonable manner which would preclude a qualified immunity defense. . . But this argument fails for two reasons. First, if correct, this argument means that the jury should not have been instructed on qualified immunity in this case, and the Jail has never made such an argument either below or before this court. Second, it ignores the leading Supreme Court case law in this area which establishes that the reasonableness inquiry for purposes of the affirmative defense of qualified immunity is separate and distinct from the question of whether a government official had the mens rea required for the underlying constitutional violation. [citing Saucier and Anderson] In sum, because the jury was properly instructed that it could not impose liability on Officer Goodwill if he acted reasonably in the qualified immunity sense, even if it also found that he violated Mr. Bass's constitutional rights, the jury's verdicts were not facially inconsistent and there was no plain error.").

Lundstrom v. Romero, 616 F.3d 1108, 1119 (10th Cir. 2010) ("We note that a qualified immunity question may be submitted to a jury when disputed issues of material fact exist. See Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 859 (10th Cir.2009). Where such factual disputes are present, the district court can 'submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts' and '[b]ased on the jury's findings, the [district] court [can] then determine whether the defendant's conduct was [lawful] in light of the clearly established law.'").

Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 859-61 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Qualified immunity is 'almost always' a question of law. Keylon v. City of Albuquerque, 535 F.3d 1210, 1217 (10th Cir.2008). Like many other questions of law raised in pre-trial motions, the trial court often decides the issue before trial. Id . A trial court may submit a question of qualified immunity to the jury only 'A*in exceptional circumstances*"' [where] historical facts [are] so intertwined with the law that a jury question is appropriate as to whether a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated [the] right [at issue].'". . Thus, the predicate for submitting a qualified immunity question to the jury is the existence of disputed issues of material fact–that is, the question of what actually happened.Where such factual disputes are present, there are three possible ways for a trial court to submit the qualified immunity question to the jury. First, the court could submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts. Based on the jury's findings, the court could then determine whether the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the clearly established law. Second, the judge could define the clearly established law for the jury. Then, the court could instruct the jury to determine what the defendant actually did and whether it was reasonable in light of the clearly established law defined by the judge. This second approach is the one apparently taken by the district court in this case. Third, the court could simply allow the jury to determine what the clearly established law is, what the defendant actually did, and whether the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the clearly established law found by the jury. This last approach, of course, is clearly inappropriate. Although our cases have allowed the second approach, they have done so only when narrow issues of disputed material fact are dispositive of the qualified immunity inquiry. . .Consideration of the proper division of labor between courts and juries in civil actions suggests that the second approach should be used rarely for several reasons. First, an 'essential characteristic' of the federal court system is that it 'assigns the decisions of disputed questions of fact to the jury.'. . Legal questions are reserved to the courts. Second, in deciding whether a right is clearly established, an essential part of the qualified immunity inquiry, a court must assess whether the right was clearly established against a backdrop of the objective legal reasonableness of the actor's conduct. . . Letting the jury determine whether the officer's actions were reasonable in light of the clearly established law has the potential of asking the jury to resolve a legal question. Third, allowing the jury to decide qualified immunity almost always generates an issue on appeal as to whether the circumstances were exceptional enough to warrant such a procedure. In those few cases where qualified immunity may turn on a jury's resolution of discrete factual questions, we think that the better approach is for the court to submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts. . . We think that such a procedure is fully consistent with, and indeed better supported by, our past cases. . . . Our most recent cases favor a narrow approach where a jury decides only disputed historical facts underlying a qualified immunity defense.")

Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 862-64 (10th Cir. 2009) (Ebel, J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion completely and write this brief concurrence only to emphasize one point: if a district court submits the question of qualified immunity to the jury because there are disputed historical facts material to resolving the immunity question, the district court should submit to the jury only the disputed factual contentions underlying the immunity question and should reserve for itself the legal question of objective reasonableness. I agree with the majority that a court may submit the issue of qualified immunity to the jury only where there is a dispute of fact pivotal to determining whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity . I also agree with the majority that there were no such material facts in dispute with respect to the Gonzales' Fourth Amendment claims, but that the error in submitting the qualified immunity question to the jury on that claim was harmless. See supra at 14-15.However, I would prefer to conclude unequivocally that there were disputed material facts with respect to Jade Gonzales' Fourteenth Amendment claim. Thus, in my opinion, if the qualified immunity defense was submitted to the jury regarding the Fourteenth Amendment claim (and the majority opinion correctly notes that that proposition is far from clear), then I would conclude that there would have been no error in submitting that defense to the jury had the submission been limited to the factual components. But, I think the district court erred in phrasing the qualified immunity interrogatory in a manner that allowed the jury to resolve the legal question of whether the defendants' conduct was 'objectively reasonable' in light of the clearly established law. Nonetheless, I would find that Gonzales waived her right to rely on this error, and even if she had not, the error was harmless. On this basis, I concur with the majority and agree that this court should affirm. . . .While the district court may not have erred in submitting this particular qualified immunity question to the jury, it did err in how it stated the immunity question to the jury. Specifically, to the extent the interrogatory asked the jury to decide whether the defendants' conduct was objectively reasonable, the district court erred. Stating that a district court may 'submit the question of qualified immunity to the jury' when there are material disputed facts is somewhat misleading. Whether a defendant's conduct is objectively reasonable is always a question of law for the court. The only reason a district court does not resolve the qualified immunity question before the case goes to the jury is because there are underlying disputed historical facts necessary to resolution of that legal issue. The jury needs only to resolve those disputed facts to allow the court to resolve the legal question of objective reasonableness. Thus, the district court should have submitted specific fact-finding interrogatories to the jury that would have allowed it to resolve the material disputed facts, but the district court should have reserved for itself the question of whether the defendants' conduct was objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . In this case, however, the district court's improper submission of the 'objectively reasonable' question to the jury does not mandate reversal. First, Gonzales waived this ground for relief by failing to object at trial to the phraseology of the interrogatory. . .Second, even if Gonzales had raised this issue, the error would be harmless because, as the majority explained in its harmless error analysis, . . .the jury separately reached the merits of Jade Gonzales' Fourteenth Amendment claim and concluded that the defendants committed no constitutional violation.").

Keylon v. City of Albuquerque, 535 F.3d 1210, 1217, 1218, 1220 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Because there were no disputed issues of material fact the question of qualified immunity should not have been submitted to the jury. Qualified immunity issues are almost always questions of law, decided by a court prior to trial. . . Many of our sister circuits have held that qualified immunity is never a question for the jury. . . However, we have recognized that 'in exceptional circumstances historical facts may be so intertwined with the law that a jury question is appropriate as to whether a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated that right.' . . . Because any factual dispute in this case does not go to the question of the objective reasonableness of Officer Barnard's actions, this case is not an 'exceptional circumstance,' and the qualified immunity question should not have been submitted to the jury.").

Mecham v. Frazier, 500 F.3d 1200, 1203 (10th Cir. 2007) ("The district court held 'the question of objective reasonableness is one for the jury to decide.'. . While this proposition might hold where there are disputed issues of material fact, the question of objective reasonableness is not for the jury to decide where the facts are uncontroverted. . . . .Here, although the district court recognized 'there is no dispute as to the underlying events,' it nevertheless found the reasonableness determination was for the jury. In light of Medina, the district court should have decided qualified immunity as a matter of law. See also Scott v. Harris, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007) (deciding qualified immunity on undisputed facts).")

Cortez v. McCauley, 478 F.3d 1108, 1120 & n.15, 1121 (10th Cir. 2007) (en banc) ("In sum, we find that viewing the undisputed facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, an arrest without probable cause occurred. As we discuss below, no exigent circumstances would justify a warrantless arrest either. This conclusion does not, however, end our analysis. Even law enforcement officials who reasonably but mistakenly conclude that probable cause is present are entitled to immunity. . . Therefore, when a warrantless arrest or seizure is the subject of a § 1983 action, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest or detain the plaintiff. . . . Some courts have referred to this standard as 'arguable probable cause.' . . . This principle may appear to be in some tension with the equally established principle that 'it is a jury question in a civil rights suit whether an officer had probable cause to arrest.'. . The tension is resolved in this case by the essential lack of dispute over the historical, predicate facts. The parties agree on the 'what happened' questions. In such a circumstance, for qualified immunity purposes, there is no such thing as a 'genuine issue of fact' as to whether an officer 'should have known' that his conduct violated constitutional rights. . . The conduct was either objectively reasonable under existing law or it was not. . . We find the officers did not have 'arguable probable cause' to arrest Rick Cortez because, as mentioned above, the information relied on to conduct the seizure was not reasonably trustworthy information sufficient on its own to justify the seizure.").

Trujillo v. Large, 165 F. App'x 619, 2006 WL 235262, at *1, *2 (10th Cir. Feb. 1, 2006) (not published) ("Qualified immunity presents two inquiries: (1) whether plaintiff asserted that defendant violated a constitutional or statutory right, and if so, (2) 'whether that right was clearly established such that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated that right.' . . The court is to determine the legal questions of whether the plaintiff's claim asserts a violation of a constitutional right and whether the right was clearly established at the time. . . The jury should determine the defendant's objective reasonableness where this question depends on whose version of the facts are believed . . . . The issue before us is whether Detective Large was entitled to a jury instruction on qualified immunity which directed the jury to decide the objective reasonableness of Detective Large's conduct. Here, as in Maestas, the qualified immunity analysis 'hinges upon whose version of the facts are believed.'. . Consequently, the district court correctly had the jury determine the disputed material facts on the reasonableness element of the qualified immunity analysis. . . The court did not err in giving the challenged jury instruction.").

Maestas v. Lujan, 351 F.3d 1001, 1006-10(10th Cir.2003) ("In his Answer, Mr. Lujan pleaded qualified immunity as an affirmative defense to the § 1983 claim. To determine whether a plaintiff can overcome a qualified immunity defense, courts decide (1) whether the plaintiff has asserted a violation of a constitutional or statutory right, (2) whether that right was clearly established (3) such that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated that right. . .Given the highly contested nature of material facts, the district court presented the final prong of the qualified immunity defense–the reasonableness element–to the jury. . . . Although issues of qualified immunity normally are questions of law decided prior to trial, in exceptional circumstances historical facts may be so intertwined with the law that a jury question is appropriate as to whether a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated that right. . . . But even under such special circumstances, whether plaintiff's claim asserts a violation of a constitutional right and whether this right was clearly established at the time remain questions of law. . . . This case, however, presents the exceptional situation in which the district court cannot complete its qualified immunity analysis without first determining disputed material facts. If Ms. Maestas and Mr. Lujan had engaged in a consensual relationship and Mr. Lujan was not her supervisor, a reasonable person in Mr. Lujan's position would not have known that his conduct violated Ms. Maestas's equal protection rights. . . . . Our holding here is limited. A jury question exists only when a disputed issue of material fact concerning the objective reasonableness of the defendant's actions exists. . . This ruling does not disturb our previous decisions holding that qualified immunity issues, except in special circumstances, present legal questions resolvable on summary judgment. . . Furthermore, because our decision only restates existing law, and we have yet to see a flood of qualified immunity issues sent to juries, we doubt that the district courts will adopt such a practice now.").

Reiss v. Luchetta, 78 F.3d 597 (Table), No. 94-1489, 1996 WL 87051, *4 (10th Cir. Feb. 28, 1996) ("Because the existence of probable cause depends upon the reasonableness of an officer's conduct under particular circumstances, claims challenging the bases for arrests usually present factual questions that must be resolved by a jury. . . . Similarly, when a police officer asserts that he is entitled to qualified immunity from a claim that he has made an arrest without probable cause, factual questions often arise that require resolution by a jury.").

Walker v. Elbert, 75 F.3d 592, 598-99 (10th Cir. 1996) ("In ruling on the motion for summary judgment, the trial court found that the dress code did violate First Amendment rights, and that [defendant] Clark 'is not entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment is inappropriate at this time because material facts are in dispute.' The dress code claim and the issue of qualified immunity were presented to the jury by a special question on the verdict form in the following manner: As of August 1991, clearly established law precluded the publication of a dress code that absolutely prohibited employees like Mr. Walker from wearing slogans at work. Should an employee in Mr. Clark's position reasonably have been aware of this law in August 1991? The jury answered 'No' to this question. Appellant claims that the district court erred in referring to the jury the issue of reasonableness as it related to qualified immunity. . . . While we do recognize that the ultimate question of a defendant's good faith immunity is frequently determined as a matter of law, a defendant may rely on special circumstances to raise an issue of fact to be determined by a jury. . . . . During trial in the case before us, the defendant Clark presented evidence of circumstances which would entitle the jury to find that a reasonable person in his position would not have known of the relevant legal standards. [footnote omitted] Whether defendant Clark was entitled to immunity as a matter of law, or whether he was entitled to immunity under a finding of fact by the jury, we find there was no error on the issue of the immunity defense.").

Rozek v. Topolnicki, 865 F.2d 1154, 1157 (10th Cir. 1989) (facts in dispute were not material "because even if they were resolved in [plaintiff's] favor, defendants...would still be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Stella v. Davis County, No. 118CV00002JNPDBP, 2022 WL 4235141, at *1–2, *7 (D. Utah Sept. 14, 2022) ("In preparation for the trial, both parties briefed the question of how the court should handle qualified immunity at trial. Defendants argued that because the court found a contested issue of fact material to the subjective component of the deliberate indifference claim, the court must instruct the jury on qualified immunity and allow the jury to decide the question of qualified immunity itself. . . Plaintiffs countered that the court should submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts, but that the court should ultimately decide the legal question of qualified immunity. . . After considering the parties' arguments, and the Tenth Circuit's position that 'allowing the jury to decide qualified immunity almost always generates an issue on appeal' and therefore, 'that the better approach is for the court to submit special interrogatories to the jury to establish the facts,' Gonzales v. Duran, 590 F.3d 855, 860 (10th Cir. 2009), the court added the following two questions to the verdict form:

• Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Anderson was aware that Miller faced a substantial risk of serious harm or is there enough circumstantial evidence to support an inference that Anderson failed to verify or confirm a strongly suspected serious risk to Miller?

• Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Anderson consciously failed to take reasonable measures to address the substantial risk of harm to Miller despite his knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm?

The jury answered both questions in the affirmative. . . With those findings of fact in mind, the court now addresses the legal issue of Anderson's qualified immunity. . . . 'Defendants who are unsuccessful in having a lawsuit dismissed on qualified immunity grounds before trial may reassert the defense at trial or after trial.'. . . However, '[w]hen a qualified immunity defense is pressed after a jury verdict, the evidence must be construed in the light most hospitable to the party that prevailed at trial.'. . .The court thus finds that Plaintiffs have demonstrated both the objective and subjective components of deliberate indifference as to Anderson. Therefore, the court finds that Anderson violated Miller's constitutional rights. And, as noted above, that right was clearly established. Accordingly, Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Choate v. City of Gardner, No. 16-2118-JWL, 2018 WL 3389871, at *3–4 (D. Kan. July 12, 2018) ("In the present case, plaintiff alleges that, even if the officers acted reasonably at the exact moment of the shooting, they recklessly created their need to use force and thus acted unreasonably in the totality of the circumstances. Specifically, plaintiff argues that the officers should have taken physical control of decedent while she sat in bed with her empty hands above the covers, before she produced any gun. Defendants argue that the officers were not reckless as a matter of law, but the Court rejects that argument. Plaintiff has submitted the following evidence in support of her argument that defendants should have controlled decedent prior to the shooting: the officers were in the bedroom with decedent for over four minutes before the shooting occurred, during which time they made no attempt to restrain her or to remove her from the bed; the officers had been informed that decedent was intoxicated, was possibly suicidal, and had recently fired a gun; decedent appeared intoxicated or groggy, and she continually failed to respond verbally or physically to repeated questions and commands; Officer Mohny testified that he suspected that decedent had a gun under the covers, and Officer Breneman was worried that she had a gun there; Officer Breneman, who acted as lead officer during the incident and had the most contact with decedent in the bedroom, admitted that he had multiple opportunities to take physical control of decedent; the officers did not merely ask decedent for the location of her gun but actually invited decedent to produce the gun; and the officers declined to restrain decedent not because of any safety concerns, but rather because decedent was apparently naked. Viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, this evidence shows that the officers failed to restrain decedent (or at least her hands), even though she had a gun under the covers, despite the fact that her obvious impairment increased the likelihood that she would act erratically, including producing the gun as requested. In addition, the City's policies demanded that the officers control the situation they encountered first and foremost, and plaintiff's expert witnesses opined that the officers should have physically restrained decedent under these circumstances. Based on this evidence, a jury could reasonably find that defendant officers acted recklessly immediately prior to the shooting and that such conduct created any eventual need to use force against decedent. . .The Court also rejects defendants' argument that they are entitled to immunity because the law prohibiting their conduct was not clearly established. As noted above, the Tenth Circuit has stated that the requirement that officers' use of force be reasonable is clearly established. The Tenth Circuit has also made clear that an officer may be liable if his reckless conduct creates the need to use force. Finally, defendants argue that Officer Breneman cannot be liable because he did not fire upon decedent. Plaintiff alleges, however, that Officer Breneman's reckless conduct created the need for the other individual defendants to use force, and thus plaintiff has alleged Officer Breneman's personal participation in a constitutional violation. Defendants have not addressed his possible liability in the context of plaintiff's reckless-creation theory (defendants did not address this issue in their reply brief), nor have defendants provided any authority to suggest that an officer must have fired the fateful shot in order to be liable for the use of excessive force. Accordingly, the Court denies each individual defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim under Section 1983.")

Choate v. City of Gardner, No. 16-2118-JWL, 2016 WL 2958464, at *4 (D. Kan. May 23, 2016) ("[A]s plaintiff notes, even if decedent did threaten an officer's safety, the officers could still be liable for the use of excessive force if their deliberate or reckless actions before the shooting unreasonably created the need to use force. Plaintiff argues that the officers acted unreasonably in failing to restrain or remove decedent or in failing to locate the gun before it was produced by decedent. From a review of the video recordings, it appears that the officers acted reasonably in patiently asking decedent to put clothes on and to leave the bed while asking about the location of a firearm. The videos, however, do not show decedent throughout the encounter; thus, the videos do not clearly and unequivocally refute the allegation that the officers acted recklessly prior to the shooting, such that the Court should foreclose the later consideration of evidence obtained from the officers during discovery. Accordingly, defendants have not shown that plaintiff's excessive force claim cannot succeed as a matter of law. Because the qualified immunity analysis is closely related to that substantive inquiry, and because the officers' need to act reasonably was clearly established in the law, the Court further concludes that defendants are not entitled to prevail at this stage on the basis of qualified immunity. The Court therefore denies defendants' motion to dismiss the excessive force claim.") Gardetto v. Mason, 854 F. Supp. 1520, 1530-32 (D. Wyo. 1994) ("[T]he procedural question arises as to what happens if there is a genuine issue of material fact on the issue of qualified immunity, specifically, whether the defendant's actions were objectively reasonable, such that summary judgment is precluded. Since the district court cannot resolve this factual issue, is it left for the jury to decide ? If so, then how can this be reconciled with the notion that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit itself ? The Supreme Court recently addressed the former question. In Hunter, the Court summarily reversed the Ninth Circuit's holding that the issue of the defendant's reasonableness for purposes of qualified immunity '[was] a question for the trier of fact[.]' [cites omitted] The next sentence stated that the Ninth Circuit's holding was an erroneous statement of law because '[i]t routinely places the question of immunity in the hands of the jury. Immunity ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial.' [citing Hunter] This statement, however, leaves several important questions unanswered. First, while it rejects the notion that the question of objective legal reasonableness is a factual issue for the jury ('decided by the court'), it is clear that the traditional summary judgment standards are fully applicable. There is, therefore, an inconsistency, in that it appears to be a question for the Court to decide, yet the Supreme Court's trilogy of 1986 summary judgment decisions–Celotex, Liberty Lobby and Matsushita [footnote omitted]–make it clear that the district court's role is limited to identifying factual issues and not resolving them. Second, it is unclear what the Court meant by the use of the modifier 'ordinarily.' This seems to imply that in most cases, the issue should be decided by the court; it does not, however, speak to the 'non-ordinary' case. It appears that the way to reconcile these seemingly conflicting mandates is to understand that although a genuine issue of material fact precludes the entry of qualified immunity prior to trial, it does not prevent the defendant from reasserting the defense at trial. In other words, while a factual issue defeats the 'immunity from suit' component of the qualified immunity, the defendant will still retain the right to renew this motion at trial in an effort to avail himself of the 'immunity from liability' component of the defense. This seems to be the conclusion reached by the Tenth Circuit's recent decision in Guffey v. Wyatt . . . . [O]f course, the trial court's decision whether to find that the defendant was immune will necessarily depend on the evidence adduced at trial regarding the reasonableness of the defendant's conduct. The issue of how this defense should be reasserted 'at and after trial' was not addressed in any of the cases discussed above. Nonetheless, because the answers to several related issues are clear, this Court can infer the proper method for raising this defense during subsequent proceedings. First, the defendant bears the burden of establishing that his actions were reasonable, by a preponderance of the evidence, because qualified immunity is an affirmative defense under Harlow and Gomez. [cites omitted] Second, while the ultimate issue of whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity is a legal question, it appears that the underlying factual question as to the reasonableness component is a question for the trier of fact–since there was a genuine issue of material fact relating to this question in the first place. Thus, in order to reassert this claim 'at' trial, the Court would submit an interrogatory to the jury so that it may resolve this factual issue. [cites and footnote omitted] The Court can then determine the legal issue of qualified immunity based on the jury's answer to this interrogatory. The interrogatory would simply ask the jury whether the defendant has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that his actions were reasonable under the particular facts of the case at hand. The Court believes that this interpretation harmonizes Hunter, Guffey and Dixon with Celotex, Liberty Lobby and Matsushita. [footnote omitted].").

Anthony v. Baker, 808 F. Supp. 1523, 1527 (D.Colo. 1992) ("Although a claim of qualified immunity presents a question of law that ordinarily should be resolved by the court, it also contains within it potential issues of fact that may, in appropriate circumstances, be submitted to a jury.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Prosper v. Martin, 989 F.3d 1242, 1245-54 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Ordinarily, we would be required to decide a case of this posture on the plaintiff's version of the facts. In this case, however, Plaintiff's account is based on a blurry surveillance video that depicts little more than two persons engaged in a two-minute-long struggle in the dark beside a busy highway. We must therefore take the facts as told by the only living eyewitness of those critical two minutes—Defendant Martin. On those facts, we affirm the District Court's decision to grant summary judgment. . . .We agree with the District Court that Martin acted as an objectively reasonable officer both in tasing and in using deadly force on Prosper. But before we explain why, we must determine the contours of the particular right alleged to have been violated, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. . . . If Plaintiff is correct about what the Biscayne Air Video shows, then the question before us is whether Martin violated Prosper's Fourth Amendment rights by tasing and shooting him without provocation while he slowly retreated, and all before he ever bit Martin's finger. We believe Plaintiff makes too much of the video. Where there are 'varying accounts of what happened' on summary judgment, we are required to adopt the account most favorable to the nonmoving party. . . This principle, though, is subject to the caveat that the nonmoving party's version of events must be sufficiently supported by the record that a reasonable jury could find it to be true. . . .Plaintiff's interpretation of the Biscayne Air Video amounts to mere speculation, and the video therefore fails to create the issues of fact that Plaintiff says it does. Plaintiff herself described the video as 'far from a model of clarity,' and the expert witness she retained to interpret it said '[you] can barely make out their bodies. ... You can't make out really much of anything other than some very gross movements.' A blurry video that does not depict much of anything cannot give rise to issues of fact about what did or did not happen on a particular occasion. As the District Court noted, the video 'does not contradict [Martin]'s statements; at best, it fails to corroborate them.' Martin's version of events thus remains unrebutted and controls our analysis. Accordingly, the question before us is whether Martin violated Prosper's Fourth Amendment rights by using deadly force after Prosper struck him in the face, resisted arrest through three taser discharges, and bit down on his finger while 'twisting and turning' with unabating intensity. Since Plaintiff also challenges Martin's use of the taser as excessive, we must decide whether that violated Prosper's Fourth Amendment rights, as well. We are convinced the District Court committed no error in finding that Martin acted as an objectively reasonable officer in both respects. The critical inquiry on the deadly force claim is whether an officer in Martin's position reasonably could have believed that Prosper posed a serious threat of physical harm at the time Prosper had Martin's finger in his mouth. . . In making this assessment, we must consider the 'totality of the circumstances,' including the events leading up to the point at which deadly force was used and the impressions a reasonable officer would have gleaned from them. . . .In this 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, . . . it was reasonable for Martin to believe that Prosper posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm to his person and that deadly force, without any further warning, was necessary to prevent that harm. Therefore, the District Court properly concluded that Martin's use of deadly force did not violate Prosper's Fourth Amendment rights. We also have no doubt that Martin's use of his taser on Prosper was reasonable under the circumstances. We have held that 'the use of a taser gun to subdue a suspect who has repeatedly ignored police instructions and continues to act belligerently toward police is not excessive force.'")

Stryker v. City of Homewood, 978 F.3d 769, 775-77 (11th Cir. 2020) ("In conclusion, all of the Graham factors indicate that, under Stryker's version of events, the initial use of the taser by Officer Davis was objectively unreasonable. Moreover, at the time of the incident it was clearly established that using violent force generally, and a taser specifically, on a compliant, nonaggressive, and nonthreatening misdemeanant violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . Stryker also contends that Officer Davis (along with Officers Waid and Blake) beat, kicked, and choked him once he was out of the truck and after they had control over his body and hands. Assuming this to be true, we have no hesitation concluding that such conduct amounts to a well-established constitutional violation. We have consistently held that 'gratuitous use of force when a criminal suspect is not resisting arrest constitutes excessive force.'. . And there was no doubt at the time of this incident that, in this Circuit, striking a compliant and nonthreatening suspect constitutes excessive force. . . .Very little is clear about exactly what happened in the early morning hours after Stryker arrived at Walmart. The officers articulate a version of events that justifies their use of force. Stryker tells a story that presents a clear constitutional violation. Resolving that dispute is for a trial, not summary judgment. The district court thus erred by resolving disputes of fact against the plaintiff and by granting the officers qualified immunity on that basis. And because of this error, the grant of summary judgment to the City of Homewood and the dismissal of Stryker's state law claims are due fresh consideration. Accordingly, we REVERSE the judgment of the district court and REMAND for further proceedings.")

Cantrell v. McClure, 805 F. App'x 817, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Given the circumstances, the force McClure used to arrest Cantrell was not excessive. This conclusion is not, as Appellant contends, premature or better left to a jury. Courts are to 'ascertain the validity of a qualified immunity defense as early in the lawsuit as possible,' because qualified immunity 'is a defense not only from liability, but also from suit.'. . An evaluation of the reasonableness of the force used is appropriate at this stage because 'the question of whether the force used by the officer in the course of an arrest is excessive is a pure question of law, decided by the court.'. . The district court had before it all the information necessary for a judgment on the pleadings.")

Hinson v. Bias, 927 F.3d 1103, 1118, 1121, 1123 (11th Cir. 2019) ("As we have noted, we view all facts and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party when reviewing a summary-judgment ruling. . . This means that we normally take as true the testimony of the non-moving party and adopt his version of the facts in a qualified-immunity case. . . But here, we cannot do that since Hinson admits that he has no memory of any events after he placed his hands up while sitting inside his truck. Of course, we would not want to reward an officer for unlawfully engaging in actions that rendered the arrestee unable to rebut the officer's version of events. So, that Hinson cannot personally rebut the Officers' story does not mean that we must necessarily accept the Officers' version of events. Flythe v. District of Columbia, 791 F.3d 13, 19 (D.C. Cir. 2015). Rather, we must 'carefully examine all the evidence in the record ... to determine whether the officer's story is internally consistent and consistent with other known facts.'. . Where circumstantial or other evidence, if believed, 'would tend to discredit the police officer's story,' or where such evidence 'could convince a rational factfinder that the officer acted unreasonably,' we do not simply accept the officer's account. . .Here, the other evidence consists of the video footage, Hinson's medical records, and Hinson's deposition testimony. So if sufficient evidence exists for Hinson to withstand summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment qualified-immunity inquiry, it must come from those sources or inconsistencies in the Officers' testimony. . . . When we account for all of the Fourth Amendment excessive-force factors, then, we must conclude that the Officers' conduct in taking Hinson to the ground and fist-striking him were objectively reasonable uses of force on this record. As a result, the Officers did not violate Hinson's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force in securing his arrest. Since Hinson cannot show a violation of his Fourth Amendment right, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hinson's Fourth Amendment claim. And since no Fourth Amendment violation was established, the Officers who allegedly failed to intervene to stop the use of force in Hinson's arrest are also entitled to qualified immunity. . . . At the end of the day, the proof is in the video recordings in this case. Or more accurately, the proof of Hinson's case is not in the video recordings here. Those video recordings simply do not, in any material way, contradict the Officers' version of what occurred during and after Hinson's arrest. Based on those facts, we cannot conclude that the Officers violated either Hinson's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force in effecting an arrest or his Eighth Amendment right to be free from deliberate indifference to medical needs. For these reasons, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity, and the order of the district court must be vacated.")

Greer v. Ivey, 767 F. App'x 706, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("Here, the reasonableness determination turns on two questions: Was Christopher holding a knife when he was killed? And, if so, what was he doing with it? . . . Having reviewed the record, we cannot say that the deputies' conclusion is indisputable—and we certainly cannot say so under the view of the facts most favorable to Randall. The physical evidence and the witnesses' testimony could support the officers' claims that Christopher was poised to attack them. It could also support Randall's claims that the officers did not reasonably fear for their safety. But it is not our place to resolve that dispute of fact; it is the jury's. . . . Between the physical evidence and Holstine's conflicting testimony, then, significant issues of material fact exist regarding whether Christopher was in fact raising a knife and charging at the deputies when they shot him. And as we have previously said, the task of weighing the credibility of police testimony against other evidence 'is the stuff of which jury trials are made.'. . . Accordingly, those counts that turn on the reasonableness of the deputies' use of deadly force must proceed to trial. These counts include the § 1983 claims, because the law was clearly established at the time of Randall's death that shooting a person who has done nothing threatening and thus never posed an immediate danger violates the Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force.")

Simmons v. Bradshaw, 879 F.3d 1157, 1164-67 & n.7 (11th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he question of what circumstances existed at the time of the encounter is a question of fact for the jury—but the question of whether the officer's perceptions and attendant actions were objectively reasonable under those circumstances is a question of law for the court. . . . The facts of the instant case involved contested factual issues bearing on Defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity. In its order disposing of the parties' motions for summary judgment, the district court expressly reserved the qualified immunity question for later determination:

If it were to credit Stephens' account of these events, a reasonable jury clearly could find that Deputy Lin violated his constitutional rights by employing excessive force. Yet, Deputy Lin would still be entitled to qualified immunity if the law were not clearly established. . . .Even though this Court has concluded that Deputy Lin is not entitled to qualified immunity on Stephens' excessive force claim at the summary judgment stage, Deputy Lin is not precluded from pursuing the qualified immunity defense at the trial. . . Should the jury choose not to credit (in whole or in part) Stephens' version of the facts, or should the facts not be presented at trial as alleged here on summary judgment, the qualified immunity analysis may change.

Simmons v. Bradshaw, No. 14-80425, 2014 WL 11456548, at *8-9 (S.D. Fla. Dec. 31, 2014). Rather than submitting the contested factual issues—i.e., the historical facts—to the jury at trial, however, the Court opted to give the following instruction:

Whether a specific use of force is excessive or unreasonable depends on factors such as the nature of any offense involved, whether a citizen poses an immediate violent threat to others, including the police officer, and whether the citizen resists or flees. In assessing these factors, you should consider whether an officer's belief that a citizen is posing an immediate violent threat is an objectively reasonable belief under the circumstances, notwithstanding that it is a mistaken belief. Where an officer's mistaken belief that a citizen poses an immediate and deadly threat is objectively reasonable under the circumstances, then that officer's use of deadly force is not excessive or unreasonable. On the other hand, where an officer's mistaken belief that a citizen poses an immediate and deadly threat is not objectively reasonable under the circumstances, then that officer's use of deadly force is excessive or unreasonable.

This instruction is problematic not only because it is an incorrect statement of the law, but moreover because it effectively delegated resolution of the issue of qualified immunity to the jury—presumably as to both facts and law—and thus the district court never decided whether Deputy Lin was entitled to his claimed defense of qualified immunity. . . Consistent with Supreme Court precedent, we have noted that the factual issues bearing on the excessive force inquiry are distinct from the legal issues bearing on a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . In this case, however, the excessive force inquiry was not sufficiently divorced from the qualified immunity inquiry in that the instruction improperly conflated the two inquiries and presented the jury with both together. The jury was thus essentially forced to find either that Deputy Lin used excessive force and therefore was not entitled to qualified immunity, or that Deputy Lin did not use excessive force at all. . .This instruction was erroneous for two reasons. First, it is not the province of the jury to decide a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity. . . Evidently, the district court believed that the jury instruction at issue properly covered both excessive force and qualified immunity. In its order denying in part the defendants' motion for a new trial, the district court stated that, '[i]n light of the jury instructions given in this case—which the jury is presumed to have understood and followed—the jury's verdict reflects an implicit finding that Deputy Lin did not commit an objectively reasonable mistake when he shot Dontrell Stephens.'. . This 'implicit finding' recognized by the district court, however, does not necessarily answer the qualified immunity question, which must be considered and resolved by the court as a legal issue. . . Because of these errors, Deputy Lin was not afforded the opportunity to have his claimed defense of qualified immunity determined by the court, as he was entitled to have. Furthermore, the errors were not harmless because this is not a case in which 'the jury verdict itself, viewed in the light of the jury instructions, and any interrogatories that were answered by the jury, indicate without doubt what the answers to the refused interrogatories would have been, or make the answers to the refused interrogatories irrelevant to the qualified immunity defense.'. . Because the jury instructions did not accurately reflect the law, and moreover because Deputy Lin was improperly deprived of the opportunity to have his defense of qualified immunity considered by the district court, it was an abuse of discretion for the district court to have denied Deputy Lin's motion for a new trial. . . Accordingly, we will reverse and order a new trial. . . .Had the jury been afforded the opportunity to make specific factual findings relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry—including, for example, whether Stephens had committed a traffic infraction on his bicycle; whether Stephens dismounted from his bicycle and complied with Deputy Lin's commands following the stop; and whether Stephens possessed any weapons, threatened Deputy Lin, or attempted to flee—the district court could (and should) have then determined, as a matter of law, 'whether the legal norms allegedly violated by the defendant were clearly established at the time of the challenged actions.'")

Simmons v. Bradshaw, 879 F.3d 1157, 1169-72 (11th Cir. 2018) (Wilson, J., dissenting) ("I would not disturb the jury's verdict on Dontrell Stephens' excessive force claim brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The jury determined that Deputy Adams Lin used excessive force against Stephens in violation of the Fourth Amendment by shooting him four times at close range—rendering him a paraplegic—after stopping him for riding his bicycle on the wrong side of the road. Appealing the denial of their motion for a new trial, Deputy Lin and Sherriff Bradshaw argue that the district court abused its discretion by improperly instructing the jury in two ways: (1) by not allowing them to present a special interrogatory to the jury, asking whether Deputy Lin made a reasonable mistake; and (2) by refusing to give the jury a '20/20 hindsight' instruction, to let the jury know that it must judge the officer's reasonableness 'at the time of the events, not from hindsight.' But rather than address these specific issues, the majority opinion sets aside the jury's verdict for a different reason—that the jury instructions given did not accurately reflect the law, and that Deputy Lin was deprived of the opportunity to have his qualified immunity defense considered by the district court. Although the panel questioned counsel at oral argument about whether qualified immunity was improperly presented to the jury, the issue was neither briefed, nor appealed. I dissent because the jury instructions did properly state the law. And I disagree with the majority's determination that the district court improperly relinquished consideration of Deputy Lin's entitlement to qualified immunity to the jury rather than retain it for consideration by the district court judge himself. . . .The majority finds this instruction 'problematic not only because it is an incorrect statement of the law, but moreover because it effectively delegated resolution of the issue of qualified immunity to the jury—presumably as to both facts and law—and thus the district court never decided whether Deputy Lin was entitled to his claimed defense of qualified immunity.'. . I disagree on both accounts. The instruction is not an incorrect statement of the law, nor can it reasonably be construed as an improper delegation of the qualified immunity determination to the jury. Whether Officer Lin made an objectively reasonable mistake in believing that Stephens posed a threat is for the jury to decide in making its excessive force determination. . . .Qualified immunity's clearly-established-law requirement, however, looks at whether 'the officer's mistake as to what the law requires is reasonable, [and when it is reasonable] the officer is entitled to the immunity defense.'. . . Here, the trial court did not ask the jury whether the officer made a reasonable mistake as to the law. The court merely asked the jury to determine whether excessive force was used. The trial court could not have separated the question of whether a mistake was reasonable from the question of whether the force was excessive. Doing so would contravene Supreme Court precedent. . . If Deputy Lin's mistake about whether Stephens posed a threat was reasonable, the force he used would not be considered as excessive. And if Deputy Lin's mistake about whether Stephens posed a threat was unreasonable, the force he used would be considered excessive. . . That is exactly what the given instructions said.

The court did not err in submitting the factual reasonableness determination to the jury because it had to submit it to the jury for it to determine whether there was excessive force. It is up to the jury to determine whether an officer's conduct was reasonable in light of the factual circumstances. Here, the jury determined that the force used by Deputy Lin was unreasonable. It is then up to the trial judge to decide whether qualified immunity is applicable by asking whether the officer's conduct was reasonable in light of clearly established law. . . As the majority states, the trial judge 'uses the jury's factual findings to render its ultimate legal determination as to whether it would be evident for a reasonable officer, in light of clearly established law, that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Here, the trial judge did just that. The judge relied on the jury's factual determination—that Deputy Lin's conduct was unreasonable and excessive—to find that Deputy Lin violated Stephens' Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court, not the jury, determined that Stephens' right to be free from excessive force was clearly established under existing law. In any event, the district court had already considered, and rejected, Lin's qualified immunity claim—twice—when the defendants raised it in their motion for judgment as a matter of law and again in the renewed judgment as a matter of law. Therefore, I have no quarrel with the formalities of the district court's resolution of Deputy Lin's entitlement to qualified immunity. And taking the deferential nature of the abuse of discretion standard into account, I see no reversible error. . . Nonetheless, the issues briefed were whether the district court abused its discretion by: (1) not allowing the defendants to present special interrogatories asking whether Deputy Lin made a reasonable mistake; and (2) not allowing the defendants to present the '20/20 hindsight' instruction in an effort to let the jury know that it must judge the officer's reasonableness at the time of the events, and not from hindsight. First, the district court did not err when it declined to provide the jury with a mistaken belief interrogatory, which would have asked: Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Deputy Adams Lin made an objectively reasonable mistake when he perceived that Dontrell Stephens threatened Deputy Adams Lin with a firearm and posed an imminent threat of death or serious physical harm at the time that Deputy Adams Lin shot Dontrell Stephens?

This proposed interrogatory was covered by the given instructions. And there can be no error when 'the trial court[ ] refus[es] to give a requested instruction ... where the substance of that proposed instruction was covered by another instruction which was given.'. . Here, the court instructed the jury that Deputy Lin's use of deadly force could not be excessive if Deputy Lin's mistaken belief that Stephens posed an immediate and deadly threat was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. Thus, for the jury to reach the conclusion that Deputy Lin's use of force was excessive, it necessarily had to determine that his mistake was objectively unreasonable. And because the jury found that Deputy Lin's use of force was excessive, it answered what would have been covered in the defendants' proposed instruction in the negative. The substance of the proposed interrogatory, then, was covered by the jury instructions delivered. And we do not have discretion to assume otherwise because we always assume the jury follows the instructions consistently with their verdict.")

Horn v. Barron, 720 F.App'x 557, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) ("Officer Barron argues that the district court erroneously found that Horn put forth sufficient evidence to create a material issue of fact about whether she resisted arrest and, therefore, whether the use of force was unreasonable and in violation of clearly established law. We agree. . . .Horn does not dispute that Officer Barron had probable cause to arrest her for disorderly conduct. Rather, she argues that the amount of force used by Officer Barron to effectuate her arrest, when viewed in the light most favorable to her, was illegally disproportionate under the circumstances and, therefore, violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In denying summary judgment on qualified immunity, the district court concluded that this case presents two contradictory versions of what happened, Horn's version being that Officer Barron's use of force on her was gratuitous insofar as she merely pulled her arm away from him as a reflex to his touch and was not resisting him, and Officer Barron's version being that Horn resisted his efforts to seize her by jerking or snatching her arm out of his hold. Citing Hall v. Bennett, 447 F. App'x 921, 924 (11th Cir. 2011), for the proposition that 'two competing contradictory stories of what happened' creates a question of fact, the district court concluded that a question of fact existed as to whether the force Officer Barron used in arresting Horn was reasonable because, according to Horn, she was 'totally compliant.'. . . [A]ccording to Horn, she was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee, and there was no need for force beyond that which is ordinarily necessary to effectuate the arrest of a compliant individual. The district court then found that if the facts are credited to Horn, a reasonable jury could find that Horn's crime was not severe, that she was not resisting arrest or attempting to flee and simply pulled her arm towards herself in response to Officer Barron's touch, that the amount of force from the takedown was disproportionate to the need for such force, and that the use of force caused severe injury. We disagree. Even assuming that Horn was totally compliant with Officer Barron, he was allowed to use some force in effecting her arrest. And, even if the force applied by Officer Barron in effecting Horn's arrest—a soft hands, straight arm bar takedown technique, by which he gained control of her by taking hold of her left arm, putting his right arm over her left arm, and using gravity and his own weight to bring her to the ground—was unnecessary, it was not unlawful. Horn was not restrained at the time the force was applied by Officer Barron. For that reason, the cases on which the district court relied for its denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity are distinguishable from Horn's case. . . .Here, . . . Horn was not restrained and had, undisputedly, pulled her arm away from Officer Barron. The force that Officer Barron used, therefore, was not gratuitous. For these reasons, none of the cases relied upon by the district court would put Officer Barron on notice that he could not use a soft hands, straight arm bar takedown technique to handcuff Horn when she admits she pulled her arm away from him. The force used here by Officer Barron was no more severe than the force that we have described as de minimis and lawful in other materially similar cases. . . .Although Horn was not disobeying a lawful command when she admittedly pulled her arm away from Officer Barron, a reasonable officer confronted with these facts would still be entitled to think that she was resisting and posed a threat of resisting further, given her prior volatile and aggressive behavior. Police officers are often called upon to make split-second judgments 'in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly-evolving,' and the typical arrest involves some force and injury. . . Therefore, Officer Barron was entitled to use some degree of force to put her in the handcuffing posture. Officer Barron used a minimal level of force—a soft hands, straight arm bar takedown technique—to do so. He did not use a weapon, he did not hit, punch, or kick her, he did not have assistance from multiple officers, he did not 'throw' Horn to the ground with intentional, or gratuitous, unwarranted force, nor did he use any force against her after she was on the ground. He did not use any force intended to cause injury; rather, Horn's injury was the unfortunate result of Officer Barron's reasonable use of force. In light of the foregoing, the district court's denial of Officer Barron's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity is erroneous.")

Hammett v. Paulding County, 875 F.3d 1036, 1046-47, 1052-54 (11th Cir. 2017) ("So strong is the public interest in protecting government officials in the reasonable discharge of their duties that such officials are insulated not only from damages, but even from the costs of going to trial; for this reason, in most instances interlocutory appeal of district court decisions denying qualified immunity is permitted. . . . In sum, a balance must be struck between the harm to individuals aggrieved by official misconduct and the harm to society resulting from a shackled executive apparatus. Qualified immunity is the path the courts have chosen. . . .The origins and purposes of qualified immunity remind us that although the circumstances of a case may be singularly unfortunate, regrettable facts do not automatically spell personal liability for police officers. We are bound to apply the reasonableness standard set forth by the Supreme Court and this Court. . . .From that vantage point, after the officers repeatedly announced their presence to no response in a dark house occupied by a known meth dealer, Hammett's actions easily could have appeared to be an ambush. Under these circumstances, Horsley and Whitener had probable cause to believe Hammett posed a threat of serious physical harm to Horsley. . . .Hammett's death is undoubtedly tragic. However, qualified immunity exists to protect public servants in precisely these circumstances. After discovery, Plaintiff has produced no evidence that suggests the 'split-second judgments' of Horsley, Whitener, or Mayfield violated the Fourth Amendment as they responded to the 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' events of that day. . . Summary judgment was appropriate, and they are to be spared the burden of defending themselves at trial.")

Hammett v. Paulding County, 875 F.3d 1036, 1057-59 (11th Cir. 2017) (Williams, District Judge., dissenting in part) ("Taken together, these factual findings could support a legal conclusion that the Defendant Officers acted unreasonably in employing deadly force. The majority concedes this point, acknowledging that '[i]f the evidence could legitimately be interpreted as Plaintiff insists it can, the officers' use of force might have been excessive.' They maintain, however, that no such interpretation or reasonable inference can be made. This is not the case. To the contrary, the factual findings outlined here, and by the Plaintiff below, are supported by the forensic and testimonial evidence in the record, by far more than a 'scintilla' as the majority dismissively suggests. Because that is the case, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Defendants Whitener and Horsley. I concede that the majority presents a feasible explanation of the events of October 17, 2012, but that recitation is neither the only reasonable interpretation of the evidence nor the interpretation most favorable to the Plaintiff. . . In holding otherwise, the majority has followed the same path as the district court below: they have weighed the evidence and made credibility determinations that fall squarely within the purview of a jury. It may well be that a jury finds that the subsequent statements of the officers are more persuasive than the initial statements, or that they credit the police officers' account and find it consistent with the forensic evidence. That does not change the fact, however, that, at the summary judgment stage, the evidence must be construed in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, regardless of whether the court feels that one party's version of events is more credible than the other's. . . Finally, I feel compelled to make an additional observation regarding the majority's decision today. I am concerned by the implications of the majority's view that Plaintiff's claim is undermined by the absence of opposing eyewitness testimony. By characterizing Plaintiff's legitimate interpretation of the physical and forensic evidence as 'pure speculation' and 'disputed by affirmative evidence ... most obviously, the officers' testimony,' the majority concludes that Plaintiff's interpretation of the physical evidence amounts to conjecture. Granting summary judgment on qualified immunity under these facts therefore sets up a paradigm where, no matter how many inconsistent accounts of an incident an officer gives and no matter what viable theory is supported by forensic evidence, a fourth-amendment claim arising out of a deadly shooting will never survive summary judgment, unless a third-party eye-witness can support Plaintiff's narrative or the plaintiff survives the shooting. This cannot be the evidentiary standard in qualified immunity cases. In circumstances where, as here, the evidence creates a genuine issue of material fact regarding the conduct of police officers during a deadly shooting, the case should go to trial, where both sides will have a full and fair opportunity to present their best evidence to a jury. That jury—and not this Court or the district court below—should then weigh the evidence, make factual findings, and determine the outcome of this case. For that reason, I respectfully dissent.")

Avery v. David, 700 F. App'x 949, 953 n.5 (11th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) ("The district court's order stated that 'a jury could find that every reasonable officer in Officer Davis's position would conclude that the force was unlawful' and therefore excessive. . . That reasoning conflates the excessive force and qualified immunity issues and seems to assume that the jury is to decide the qualified immunity issue. The law is clear that whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity is a question of law for the court, not a matter for the jury. [collecting cases]")

Montero v. Nandlal, 682 F. App'x 711, 714-17 (11th Cir. 2017) ("In reaching its verdict, the jury considered both a general verdict form and a special interrogatory. The general verdict form asked: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence: (1) That Carlos Montero, as personal representative of the Estate of Richard Montero, deceased, has proved that Ramesh Nandlal intentionally used excessive or unreasonable deadly force upon Richard Montero during his arrest? . . . The jury answered this first question in the affirmative. In the block for damages, the jury indicated that Plaintiff was entitled to $540,000 in compensatory damages. Given that response, the jury then proceeded to the special interrogatory, which asked: Do you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Deputy Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake when he perceived that Richard Montero posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm to the deputies or others at the time that Deputy Nandlal shot Richard Montero with his firearm? . . . The jury answered the special interrogatory in the affirmative. In response, Nandlal renewed his Rule 50 motion for judgment as a matter of law, arguing that insufficient evidence supported a finding of excessive force. He also argued that he was entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim based on the jury's answer to the special interrogatory. Plaintiff argued that the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's finding of excessive force, and that the special interrogatory was improper and should not form the basis of judgment as a matter of law. The district court granted Nandlal's motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity. Summarizing the trial testimony, the court noted that immediately prior to the shooting, Montero had engaged in a prolonged physical struggle with the deputies during which he had violently resisted arrest, knocked the deputies to the ground, tried to bite Nandlal, and ignored repeated commands to surrender. The district court also pointed out that the deputies had been unable to control Montero with hand maneuvers or by tasing him, and that Nandlal had warned Montero that he was in danger of being shot prior to firing at him. . . Based on those facts, and on the jury's finding in the special interrogatory, the court concluded that, 'the evidence presented at trial supports the jury's finding that Nandlal used excessive force against Montero but that Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake in doing so and is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.'. . . Given the inconsistent verdicts, the district court properly entered judgment in favor of Nandlal on the basis of the jury's answer to the special interrogatory. Relatedly, the district court did not abuse its discretion when it determined sufficient evidence supported the jury's special interrogatory finding. Finally, with respect to the second issue, the district court did not abuse its discretion in submitting the special interrogatory to the jury. The district court did not ask the jury to make a legal finding on the ultimate issue of qualified immunity. Instead, the special interrogatory asked the jury to make a factual determination about whether Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake. . . .Here, it is clear that this case involves Rule 49 rather than Rule 50. . . . When the jury returned an answer to the special interrogatory that was inconsistent with the general verdict, the district court was required to exercise one of three options: approve the answer notwithstanding the general verdict, direct the jury for further consideration, or order a new trial. Because the jury's finding that Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake was supported by evidence in the record, the district court was well within the scope of its discretion to enter judgment according to the special interrogatory notwithstanding the general verdict. . . .Qualified immunity is a legal question to be decided by the court and cannot be submitted to the jury. . .It is improper to even mention the term qualified immunity in the jury interrogatory; the jury is 'restricted to the who-what-when-where-why type of historical fact issues.'. . Here, the special interrogatory did not ask the jury to decide a legal question, nor did it mention the term qualified immunity. Rather, it asked a factual question–whether Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake–albeit at a higher level of abstraction than the Plaintiff would have preferred. Although the district court could have framed the questions more narrowly, e.g., whether Montero grabbed Nandlal's gun belt, or whether Montero was subdued before the shooting, it was not required to. As such, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in propounding the special interrogatory.")

Montero v. Nandlal, 682 F. App'x 711, 718-20 (11th Cir. 2017) (Walker, J., concurring) ("I fully agree with the majority's decision to affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officer Nandlal. However, I arrive at that result by different reasoning. In short, I believe that (1) the district court abused its discretion by giving the jury what amounted to a question of law regarding Officer Nandlal's qualified immunity defense, and (2) that there is no inconsistency between the jury's general verdict and its answer to the special interrogatory. I ultimately conclude that no remand is required, however, because on the undisputed facts adduced at trial, Officer Nandlal was entitled to qualified immunity. . . The district court effectively gave the qualified immunity ruling to the jury by asking it to determine whether the officer made an objectively reasonable mistake. The court should have asked the jury to resolve specific factual disputes, such as whether Montero was out of control, or reaching for Nandlal's gun. See Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1318 (11th Cir. 2002) (noting that special interrogatories relating to a qualified immunity defense should be limited to the "who-what-when-where-why type of historical fact issues"). Based on the jury's answers to those questions, the court should have determined for itself and without jury input whether Nandlal made an objectively reasonable mistake of fact in believing that Montero posed such a threat to him as to warrant the use of deadly force, and thus whether he had arguable probable cause to use such force. . . . This method of resolving Nandlal's qualified immunity defense is consistent with the weight of federal precedent, which holds that the 'objective reasonableness' of an officer's use of force is a question of law for the court alone to resolve. [collecting cases] This precedent makes perfect sense because, in the context of an alleged violation of the Fourth Amendment, whether an officer's conduct is objectively reasonable in light of the surrounding circumstances is a question of constitutional law that only a court can decide. The reasonableness of an officer's use of force is subject to the same analysis as the Fourth Amendment standard for 'reasonable' seizure. . . .Thus, the question of what circumstances existed at the time that the defendant effected a seizure is a question of fact for the jury. The question of whether the defendant's actions or perceptions were 'objectively reasonable' under those circumstances is a question of constitutional law for the court. . . .I believe that the Plaintiff Estate's proposed special interrogatory, which asked discrete factual questions such as whether Montero attempted to grab a gun during the struggle, more accurately reflected the role of special interrogatories in resolving a motion for judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds. My view is that it was error for the district court to submit to the jury the question of whether Officer Nandlal made an 'objectively reasonable mistake,' and then to rely upon that finding to conclude that there was qualified immunity. . . .I further believe that the jury's finding in the general verdict that Officer Nandlal used excessive force can be reconciled with a finding that he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In other words, there is nothing inconsistent in a court concluding that the officer's conduct violated the Constitution, but that the officer reasonably believed that it did not. That is precisely what happened here in the context of the use of excessive force. In such a case, the verdicts are not inconsistent, and Fed. R. Civ. P. 49 is not implicated. Rather, the defendant is entitled to seek judgment as a matter of law on his qualified immunity defense under Fed. R. Civ. P. 50. . . . To the extent that the majority believes the jury's verdicts were inconsistent because the general verdict form listed a specific dollar amount of damages to which the Estate was entitled, while the special interrogatory afforded Nandlal qualified immunity, I must disagree. The general verdict asked the jury whether Officer Nandlal intentionally used excessive force, and if so the amount of money in damages for which he was liable. The jury found that Nandlal did use excessive force, and calculated a damages amount. The jury then proceeded to answer in the affirmative what was (in the majority's interpretation) a question of fact: Whether Nandlal had made an 'objectively reasonable' mistake of fact as to Montero's dangerousness. Relying on that answer, the court (not the jury) confirmed that Officer Nandlal was entitled to qualified immunity, and therefore not liable. I believe the inconsistency issue would have been even easier to resolve had the jury simply been asked to determine discrete questions of narrative fact in the interrogatories, and the court alone had determined qualified immunity, but in any event there is no inconsistency here. The jury found Officer Nandlal liable for damages, but it also made a (consistent) finding, on the basis of which the court confirmed that qualified immunity applied. Such results are routinely sustained by appellate courts.")

Williams v. Deal, 659 F. App'x 580, 583 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("A case involving a police officer's use of deadly force may present a special concern on summary judgment. '[T]he witness most likely to contradict [the police officer's] story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.' O'Bert ex rel. Estate of O'Bert v. Vargo, 331 F.3d 29, 37 (2d Cir. 2003) (quotation omitted). In such circumstances it is 'wise to examine all the evidence to determine whether [the police officer's] story is consistent with other known facts.' Maravilla v. United States, 60 F.3d 1230, 1233–34 (7th Cir. 1995). A reviewing court 'undertake[s] a fairly critical assessment of the forensic evidence, the officer's original reports or statements and the opinions of experts to decide whether the officer's testimony could reasonably be rejected at a trial.' Plakas v. Drinski, 19 F.3d 1143, 1147 (7th Cir. 1994). But if the circumstantial evidence doesn't contradict a police officer's direct testimony, conjecture cannot create a genuine issue of material fact. See Rodriguez v. Farrell, 280 F.3d 1341, 1353 n.20 (11th Cir. 2002).")

Wate v. Kubler, 839 F.3d 1012, 1021 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Construing the evidence in favor of Plaintiff, the unambiguous facts are that Barnes was no longer resisting at least after the first two tasings, and that Kubler's further use of the Taser was wholly unnecessary, and grossly disproportionate to the circumstances. Kubler had arrived on the scene six and a half minutes earlier, found Barnes bleeding from the face and observed Tactuk striking Barnes multiple times. The two officers immobilized Barnes face down on the sand. Barnes had no weapon and was awkwardly handcuffed, which, drawing inferences from the facts in a light favorable to Plaintiff, had a greater than normal effect of further neutralizing Barnes. The record establishes that while the first or maybe even the second Taser deployment may have been warranted, there is competent unambiguous evidence that by the third tasing, Barnes was handcuffed, immobile and still, such that a reasonable officer in Kubler's position would conclude that Barnes did not present a risk of flight, or a threat of danger to the officers or to the public. Under these circumstances, further shocks were unnecessary and grossly disproportionate, and a jury could find that Kubler's use of a Taser on Barnes five times was unreasonable force. To be sure, Kubler and Tactuk both testified that Barnes continued to resist violently throughout all of the tasings, and other witnesses agreed that Barnes was still rising up, kicking, struggling and refusing to comply with the officers' commands. As noted by the Supreme Court in a similarly charged and disputed excessive force case, '[t]he witnesses on both sides come to this case with their own perceptions, recollections, and even potential biases. It is in part for that reason that genuine disputes are generally resolved by juries in our adversarial system.'. . We are tasked at this summary judgment stage not with weighing the evidence, making credibility choices or determining the truth of the matter, but with deciding whether there is a genuine issue for trial, viewing the evidence and making reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. . . .A reasonable officer in Kubler's position and under these circumstances would have had fair warning that repeatedly deploying a Taser on Barnes, after he was handcuffed and had ceased resisting, was unconstitutionally excessive. [court discusses precedent] In light of this precedent, a reasonable officer in Kubler's position would have had fair warning that repeatedly tasing Barnes after he was handcuffed and had ceased struggling and resisting was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Kubler is not entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's excessive force claim at this stage of the proceedings.")

Ayers v. Harrison, 650 F. App'x 709, 716-18 (11th Cir. 2016) ("During trial, Officer Harrison requested that the district court submit a number of special interrogatories to the jury, which were designed to elicit facts he believed were critical to his qualified immunity defense. Through these special interrogatories, Officer Harrison wanted to have the jury determine whether it believed that he identified himself to Rev. Ayers as a police officer, approached Rev. Ayers with his gun holstered, and only shot at Rev. Ayers once he began to drive towards him. The district court refused to submit the interrogatories to the jury, ruling that the questions were likely to cause confusion. The district court also found that the proposed interrogatories were irrelevant, and determined that, even if the jury answered all of the questions in Officer Harrison's favor, qualified immunity would still be inappropriate. . . After the jury returned its verdict, Officer Harrison renewed his objection to the district court's refusal to submit the special interrogatories through a motion for a new trial. He argued that, had the jury answered the interrogatories in his favor, the district court would be required to grant him qualified immunity because any Fourth Amendment violation under the circumstances would not have been clearly established. The district court denied the motion. On appeal, Officer Harrison argues that the district court committed error because, under Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1318 (11th Cir. 2002), the decision to submit special interrogatories 'is not discretionary with the court.' In Johnson, we reaffirmed the important role that special interrogatories serve at a trial like this one. Although the purpose of qualified immunity is to protect government officials from suit, there are times when a defendant's efforts to take advantage of the defense are unsuccessful at the motion to dismiss or summary judgment stages. . . In such cases, we emphasized that 'a defendant is entitled to have any evidentiary disputes upon which the qualified immunity defense turns decided by the jury so that the court can apply the jury's factual determinations to the law and enter a post-trial decision on the defense.'. . We explained that, in this regard, special interrogatories can be a helpful tool, and cautioned that the failure to grant 'a timely request for jury interrogatories directed toward such factual issues' could constitute error. . . We also clarified, however, that the denial of such a request 'may not be error, or if error may be harmless.'. . We held that reversible error would not occur if the jury verdict itself—when viewed in light of the jury instructions and any interrogatories that were answered by the jury—made the answers to the refused interrogatories irrelevant to the qualified immunity defense, or indicated without doubt what the answers to the refused interrogatories would have been. . . Officer Harrison argues that Ms. Ayers did not meet either of these exceptions. But the list in Johnson could not have been, and was not meant to be, exhaustive. And for several reasons, we conclude that the district court's failure to submit Officer Harrison's special interrogatories here was, at most, harmless error. First, as we noted earlier, a prior panel of this court denied Officer Harrison qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage of the case. . . And that panel's decision, on the facts presented at summary judgment, constitutes a legal ruling that is binding ... and may not be revisited in later proceedings. Consequently, once we deny defendants summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds because the plaintiff has alleged violations of clearly established rights, the defendants may not later attempt to re-assert qualified immunity against those claims on purely legal bases (e.g. by arguing that the rights do not exist or are not clearly established). The only remaining issues are questions of fact—i.e., whether the plaintiff can actually prove at trial that the alleged violations occurred. . . The prior panel based its denial of qualified immunity on the following basic facts (viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Ayers): (1) despite conceding that he did not have probable cause to arrest Rev. Ayers, Officer Harrison (while dressed in plain clothes) approached Rev. Ayers without identifying himself as a police officer and drew his weapon; (2) Rev. Ayers thought he was being robbed and attempted to drive out of the gas station, but Officer Harrison fired two shots at his car, one of which struck Rev. Ayers in the abdomen; and (3) at the time of the fatal shot, Rev. Ayers did not present an immediate threat of harm to Officer Harrison or anyone else at the scene. See Harrison, 506 F.

App'x at 884. The trial record here, as explained above, shows that Ms. Ayers presented more than sufficient evidence to the jury to support each of the basic facts on which the prior panel denied qualified immunity on interlocutory appeal. Second, as we have said, we are required to view the verdict in favor of Ms. Ayers as if the jury resolved 'every relevant factual issue' in her favor and against Officer Harrison. . . So we must infer that the jury rejected Officer Harrison's factual contentions (e.g., that he approached the driver's side of Rev. Ayers' car, that he identified himself as a police officer to Rev. Ayers, that he did not approach Rev. Ayers with his gun drawn, and that he only fired his weapon after seeing Rev. Ayers' car strike Officer Oxner and then head in his direction). In sum, because Ms. Ayers presented ample evidence that allowed the jury to find the facts on which the prior panel denied qualified immunity to Officer Harrison, and because we have to infer that the jury resolved every relevant factual dispute in favor of Ms. Ayers, any error in failing to submit the special interrogatories to the jury in this case was harmless.")

Felio v. Hyatt, 639 F. App'x 604, 609-10 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We recognize that the struggle occurred inside of a single bedroom. But even if the defendants could argue that Mr. Felio still could have gotten up from the floor and thus remained within striking distance of Officer Hydrick, the individualized circumstances of this case would lead us to the same result. Our standard focuses on whether the 'suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm' and the immediacy of that harm. . . Mrs. Felio's testimony suggested that the situation had stabilized before Officer Hyatt fired his gun, and that the room had been still for enough time that a reasonable officer would have recognized that Mr. Felio had stopped resisting. With Mr. Felio subdued, and Officer Hydrick's holstered gun no longer close to Mr. Felio's hands, which a jury could find were near the floor, there was not an immediate threat. . . Having determined that the plaintiffs' facts showed a Fourth Amendment violation, we also conclude that, at this juncture, the district court erred by granting Officer Hyatt qualified immunity. The Supreme Court held long ago that deadly force is not justified when the suspect is unarmed and poses no immediate threat to the law enforcement officers at the scene. . . Moreover, shooting a compliant individual is 'conduct [that] lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct [should have been] readily apparent.'. . Under Mrs. Felio's version of the facts, Officer Hyatt's actions violated a clearly established right, and qualified immunity does not apply. . . Therefore, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Hyatt on the plaintiff estate's § 1983 claim for excessive force. 'Our holding today does not mean [Officer Hyatt] is entirely precluded from enjoying qualified immunity; there are numerous disputed issues of material fact, which a fact-finder may ultimately resolve in his favor.'. . Our holding is only that a trial is required for a jury to find the relevant facts.")

Speight v. Griggs, 620 F. App'x 806, 809-10 (11th Cir. 2015) ("In this circuit, there is no clearly established right to be free from the accidental application of force during arrest, even if that force is deadly. But we have long held that it is a violation of the Fourth Amendment for a police officer to intentionally 'use[ ] gratuitous and excessive force against a suspect who is under control, not resisting, and obeying commands.'. . So the outcome of this case turns on the issue of whether Officer Griggs intended to shoot D.M.C. But that issue is only 'genuine' for summary judgment purposes if 'the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict' in the plaintiffs' favor, which is to say reasonably could find that Griggs intended to shoot D.M.C. . . Juries may infer intent, or the lack of it, from the surrounding circumstances and the defendant's conduct. . . And ordinarily, courts presume government officials have properly discharged their duties. . . Given the unique facts of this case, we are unable to say that no jury reasonably could find that Officer Griggs' shooting of D.M.C. was intentional. Griggs is a highly trained and by all accounts competent officer whose training, and the regulations he was supposed to follow, included the admonition that he must not place his finger on the trigger unless he was in a situation in which he intended to use deadly force. He admits that he had his finger on the trigger, and he admits that he pulled the trigger, though he denies doing so intentionally. There are conflicting stories from Officer Griggs and Officer Henry about the moments leading up to the shooting and the actions Griggs took to bring D.M.C. under control. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs (as we must) and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor (as we must) on this record and given these highly unusual circumstances we cannot say that a jury could not reasonably infer that Officer Griggs meant to fire his gun. For that reason we will vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Griggs and remand the case for further proceedings.")

Teal v. Campbell, 603 F. App'x 820, 823 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Applying the Graham factors in this case, it is clear that this case involved a severe, serious crime. Teal had led the officers on a dangerous high-speed chase followed by dangerous flight on foot despite the approaching officer pointing his handgun at and ordering Teal to stop and hold up his hands. Thus, this factor points strongly in favor of the Defendants. With respect to the second and third Graham factors, as noted above, in the tense seconds while Teal was on the ground following his aggressive and dangerous flight from the officers and in the absence of any indication from Teal that he was surrendering, we cannot conclude that a reasonable officer under these circumstances would perceive Teal as no longer resisting or no longer a threat. These factors too favor the Defendants. . . .For the foregoing reasons, we are not persuaded that every reasonable officer in the shoes of these Defendants would conclude that the force used was unlawful. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court denying these Defendants the protection of qualified immunity is reversed.")

Teal v. Campbell, 603 F. App'x 820, 823-25 (11th Cir. 2015) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("In this excessive-force case, the Defendants moved for summary judgment, arguing they are entitled to qualified immunity. As is common in these cases, the Plaintiff, Daniel Teal, and the Defendants paint starkly different pictures of what happened between them. The District Court recognized that, on summary judgment, it must 'accept the Plaintiff['s] version of the facts and draw all justifiable inferences in [his] favor.'. . Following this principle, the District Court accepted the version of the facts described by Mr. Teal. In reversing, the majority rejects Mr. Teal's version of the facts. I respectfully dissent. I will not restate the facts in detail. I agree with the majority's statement, except on the most relevant point. That point—the key question on which this appeal turns—is whether, after he fell to the ground, Mr. Teal signaled to the Defendants that he had surrendered, stopped fleeing, stopped resisting, and was no longer a threat. If he did, the majority seems to agree that the District Court was right to deny qualified immunity. . .The Defendants testified that Mr. Teal gave no such sign. They said he continued to resist after he fell to the ground in these ways: trying to stand up; struggling while they attempted to handcuff him; and refusing their commands to put his hands behind his back and instead lying on top of his arms. The majority insists Mr. Teal has adduced no evidence rebutting this testimony. It says it can find 'no evidence at all that [Mr. Teal] signaled in any way to the officers that he had surrendered and that he was no longer resisting and no longer a threat.' But the evidence to that effect is, well, evident. Mr. Teal testified that after he fell to the ground, he was 'flat on [his] stomach,' 'was stunned,' 'couldn't move,' and could not get up. As for his hands (and, literally, by extension, his arms), Mr. Teal testified that while he was lying flat on his stomach, his hands were 'behind [his] back on his side,' and were 'never' 'underneath [his] chest.'. . Mr. Teal's testimony and that of the Defendants are in direct conflict. The Defendants say he tried to stand up; Mr. Teal says he could not get up. The Defendants say he struggled and resisted their efforts to handcuff him; Mr. Teal says he was stunned and couldn't move. The Defendants say he refused their commands to put his hands behind his back; Mr. Teal says he was lying on his stomach and his hands were behind his back and never underneath him. Given this conflict, at the summary judgment stage of the proceedings our precedent compels us to 'draw all justifiable inferences in [Mr. Teal's] favor.'. . Specifically, we must accept Mr. Teal's story—that he had surrendered; he had stopped fleeing; he had stopped resisting; he was no longer a threat; and his actions (or inactions, as the case may be) would have conveyed as much to the Defendants or any other reasonable police officer. Mr. Teal's statement that he 'was stunned,' 'couldn't move,' and could not get up seems to me to demand an inference that he had surrendered and was no longer trying to flee. Accepting his version of the facts, the inference must be that Mr. Teal was no longer a threat. If a person is on the ground, stunned, and can neither move nor get up, how can he flee? How can he pose a threat? How can he do anything but surrender? Likewise, if he was lying 'flat on [his] stomach,' and his hands were 'behind [his] back' and 'never' 'underneath [his] chest,' does that not demand an inference that he complied with the Defendants' commands to place his hands behind his back? This is a quintessential factual dispute. Plaintiff says the struggle happened one way; the Defendants say it happened another way. The District Court properly recognized that we are not in the business of settling disputes like this on summary judgment. As the Supreme Court has said time and again: 'it is clear ... that at the summary judgment stage the judge's function is not himself to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter.". . In reversing, the majority faults the District Court for refusing to do what the Supreme Court has forbidden—weigh evidence on summary judgment. I recognize that when faced with the choice, most people are inclined to believe the story told by several police officers rather than by a felon who fled a DUI checkpoint, led the police on a high-speed chase, careened off the road, and continued to flee on foot. But countless qualified-immunity cases pit upstanding state actors against convicts. And just as in any other case, on summary judgment we must accept the plaintiff's facts and draw reasonable inferences in his favor. . . Of course, this does not mean that Mr. Teal's story is right. . . Neither does it mean that Mr. Teal will ultimately succeed at trial. He still must persuade a fact-finder to believe his story. And if he cannot, the police officers may then be entitled to qualified immunity. . . But trial, not summary judgment, is the time to decide whose story is right. The majority may be betting on the favored horse, but we must let them run the race before crowning the winner. It deserves mention that there is an even simpler way to correctly decide this case. Even if the majority disagrees with the way I have interpreted Mr. Teal's facts or with the inferences I have drawn in his favor, we need not conduct our own review of the facts. The Supreme Court has authorized us to simply 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment.'. . We may then analyze the legal issue (i.e., whether the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity) based on the facts as the District Court saw them. . . Taking this route would be appropriate here. The District Court's order was laudably comprehensive. It identified but rejected the Defendants' facts. It then identified Mr. Teal's facts and explained that it was required to accept the latter as true and draw inferences in Mr. Teal's favor. At each step, the District Court's findings were amply supported by the record. Indeed, the Defendants failed in their briefing on appeal to explain why the District Court's findings of fact were unsupported. The Defendants simply stated their own version of the facts, without ever confronting the District Court's findings or arguing they were incorrect. Despite our clear authority to accept the facts found by the District Court, . . . and our usual practice of 'affirm[ing] a district court's decision ... for any reason supported by the record,'. . . the majority ignores Johnson and disregards facts favorable to Mr. Teal, all with the result of reversing the District Court's denial of qualified immunity. The District Judge did careful work here, and followed the precedent. He should be affirmed.I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Hampton v. Atzert, 590 F. App'x, 942, 946-47 (11th Cir. 2014) ("[I]t is clearly established that killing a person merely to prevent his escape is not justifiable. Assuming, as we must, that Hampton held no weapon, received no warning from Atzert, and was running away from Atzert while partially restrained when he was shot, 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that [shooting Hampton] was unlawful in the situation [Atzert] confronted.'. . Thus, the district court correctly held that it was 'possible that Atzert was not justified in using deadly force to prevent Hampton's escape.'")

Barnes v. Zaccari, 669 F.3d 1295, 1308 (11th Cir. 2012) ("Therefore, the decisions of this court and the Supreme Court clearly established in May 2007 that (1) Barnes had a protected property interest and that (2) he was due some predeprivation process before VSU could deprive him of that interest. Because Barnes received no predeprivation process, we affirm the district court's denial of Zaccari's motion for summary judgment grounded on qualified immunity. However, Zaccari's qualified immunity defense does not drop out of the case. See Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1487 (11th Cir.1996). At trial, the district court can use a special verdict or written interrogatories to determine any disputed facts and the reasonable inferences drawn from those facts. Id. Once these issues are decided, Zaccari may reassert his qualified immunity defense in a motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Chaney v. City of Orlando, No. 07-14169, 2008 WL 3906838, at *2, *5 (11th Cir. Aug. 26, 2008) (appeal after remand) ("Although a qualified immunity defense is typically considered early in a case, the qualified immunity issue may proceed to trial if the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, indicates that there are facts that do not support a qualified immunity defense. . . Through the use of special interrogatories, a jury 'decides the issues of historical fact that are determinative of the qualified immunity defense.'. . The court then has a duty and responsibility to 'apply the jury's factual determinations to the law and enter a post-trial decision' on a defendant's Rule 50(a) motion regarding a qualified immunity defense. . . . The determination of whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity is one of law to be made by the court and not submitted to a jury.").

Chaney v. City of Orlando, 483 F.3d 1221, 1228 (11th Cir. 2007) ("The jury's findings should be excluded from the decision-making calculus on a Rule 50(b) motion, other than to ask whether there was sufficient evidence, as a legal matter, from which a reasonable jury could find for the party who prevailed at trial. Here, in ruling on Officer Cute's renewed motion under Rule 50(b), the court should have limited its inquiry as to whether there was sufficient evidence in the record to support a jury's finding of excessive force and its imposition of liability on Officer Cute. By placing an undue emphasis on the jury's particular findings as to probable cause–and by repeatedly making decisions on the Rule 50 motion through the lens of what the jury found–the court engaged in an erroneous analysis in deciding Officer Cute's renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law. As a result, we conclude that the analysis of district court's judgment granting Officer Cute judgment as a matter of law was flawed and that the judgment must be reversed. We remand this case to permit the district court to address Officer Cute's renewed motion in a manner consistent with this opinion.").

Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1317, 1318 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Even at the summary judgment stage, not all defendants entitled to the protection of the qualified immunity defense will get it. The ones who should be given that protection at the summary judgment stage are those who establish that there is no genuine issue of material fact preventing them from being entitled to qualified immunity. And that will include defendants in a case where there is some dispute about the facts, but even viewing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff the law applicable to that set of facts was not already clearly enough settled to make the defendants' conduct clearly unlawful. But if the evidence at the summary judgment stage, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, shows there are facts that are inconsistent with qualified immunity being granted, the case and the qualified immunity issue along with it will proceed to trial. Defendants who are not successful with their qualified immunity defense before trial can re-assert it at the end of the plaintiff's case in a Rule 50(a) motion. . . That type of motion will sometimes be denied because the same evidence that led to the denial of the summary judgment motion usually will be included in the evidence presented during the plaintiff's case, although sometimes evidence that is considered at the summary judgment stage may turn out not to be admissible at trial. . . Where there is no change in the evidence, the same evidentiary dispute that got the plaintiff past a summary judgment motion asserting the qualified immunity defense will usually get that plaintiff past a Rule 50(a) motion asserting the defense, although the district court is free to change its mind. . . It is important to recognize, however, that a defendant is entitled to have any evidentiary disputes upon which the qualified immunity defense turns decided by the jury so that the court can apply the jury's factual determinations to the law and enter a post-trial decision on the defense. When the case goes to trial, the jury itself decides the issues of historical fact that are determinative of the qualified immunity defense, but the jury does not apply the law relating to qualified immunity to those historical facts it finds; that is the court's duty. . . A tool used to apportion the jury and court functions relating to qualified immunity issues in cases that go to trial is special interrogatories to the jury. . . . In a proper case, the use of special jury interrogatories going to the qualified immunity defense is not discretionary with the court. . . .But the failure to give requested jury interrogatories may not be error, or if error may be harmless, where the jury verdict itself, viewed in the light of the jury instructions, and any interrogatories that were answered by the jury, indicate without doubt what the answers to the refused interrogatories would have been, or make the answers to the refused interrogatories irrelevant to the qualified immunity defense. That is the conclusion we reach in this case.").

Willingham v. Loughnan, 261 F.3d 1178, 1185 n.9 (11th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e have said that when the question of qualified immunity turns on specific questions of fact, the use of special verdicts or written interrogatories can be very helpful to a judge in determining the legal question of whether qualified immunity applies. [citing Priester and Cottrell] But Defendant Officers did not request, nor did the court use special verdicts or written interrogatories to determine, disputed issues of fact in this case. Therefore, all lawfully disputed factual issues and all reasonable inferences therefrom must be taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiff."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Willingham v. Vista Community Services v. Dean, 107 F.3d 840, 845-46 (11th Cir. 1997) ("The Pickering balancing test and the remainder of the qualified immunity inquiry must be done before a case is sent to the jury for its determination of whether a plaintiff was actually fired for his speech. To do otherwise deprives defendants of the benefit of their qualified immunity defense[.]").

Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1487-88 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Where the defendant's pretrial motions are denied because there are genuine issues of fact that are determinative of the qualified immunity issue, special jury interrogatories may be used to resolve those factual issues. . . Because a public official who is put to trial is entitled to have the true facts underlying his qualified immunity defense decided, a timely request for jury interrogatories directed toward such factual issues should be granted. Denial of such a request would be error, because it would deprive the defendant who is forced to trial of his right to have the factual issues underlying his defense decided by the jury. We do not mean to imply, of course, that district courts should submit the issue of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity to the jury. Qualified immunity is a legal issue to be decided by the court, and the jury interrogatories should not even mention the term. . . Instead, the jury interrogatories should be restricted to the who-what-when- where- why type of historical fact issues.").

Bendiburg v. Dempsey, 19 F.3d 557, 561, 562 (11th Cir. 1994) ("Our precedent suggests that a district court's submission of the factual component of a qualified immunity defense to the jury through a special interrogatory, without mentioning the term 'qualified immunity,' is proper.

[citing Stone and Ansley] [Plaintiff] argues, however, that the district court incorrectly submitted the entire issue of qualified immunity to the jury. . . [W]e need not decide whether the district court improperly submitted the entire issue of qualified immunity to the jury or properly submitted only the factual component of that issue [because plaintiff failed to] voice an objection suggesting that the court was improperly submitting the issue of qualified immunity to the jury....").

Post v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 7 F.3d 1552, 1557 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The objective nature of qualified immunity defines what fact issues are material for summary judgment purposes. To avoid summary judgment it is not enough for a plaintiff to produce evidence, which [if believed] would allow a fact-finder to find just that the government-agent defendant was, in reality, wrong about the facts on which the defendant acted. Instead, to defeat summary judgment because of a dispute of material fact, a plaintiff facing qualified immunity must produce evidence that would allow a fact-finder to find that no reasonable person in the defendant's position could have thought the facts were such that they justified defendant's acts."), deleted from opinion by 14 F.3d 583 (11th Cir. 1994).

Stone v. Peacock, 968 F.2d 1163, 1166 (11th Cir. 1992) ("The law is now clear... that the defense of qualified immunity should be decided by the court, and should not be submitted for decision by the jury....If there are disputed issues of fact concerning qualified immunity that must be resolved by a full trial and which the district court determines that the jury should resolve, special interrogatories would be appropriate.").

Adams v. St. Lucie County Sheriff's Department, 998 F.2d 923 (11th Cir. 1993) (per curiam) (en banc), adopting dissenting opinion of Judge Edmondson, 962 F.2d 1563, 1579 n.8 (11th Cir. 1992)("While the legal question of qualified immunity does not go to the jury,...today's court correctly notes, ...that the trial judge retains the power to determine the question in defendants' favor. I would add that, apart from finding qualified immunity on a directed verdict or a JNOV, the judge can and, when needed, should use special verdicts or written interrogatories to the jury to resolve disputed facts before the judge rules on the qualified immunity question.").

Ansley v. Heinrich, 925 F.2d 1339 (11th Cir. 1991) (jury should seldom, if ever, be instructed on qualified immunity; once defense has been denied at summary judgment stage, due to disputed issues of material facts, jury should determine factual issues without any mention of qualified immunity).

DaSilva v. Lamberti, No. 08-62106-CIV, 2010 WL 680925, at *2 & n.3, *4 (S.D. Fla. Feb. 24, 2010) ("In the instant case, the jury was asked whether they found by the preponderance of the evidence the following:
1. That Defendant Deputy Bures gave the canine warning?
2. That Deputy Bures ordered Plaintiff Dasilva to the ground?
3. That Plaintiff Dasilva continued to approach Deputy Bures until he was in the range of the canine bite?

4. That Plaintiff Dasilva stopped after he came off the porch and remained still?
5. That Deputy Bures released the leash before the canine made the initial contact with Plaintiff Dasilva?
The jury returned a general verdict in favor of BSO and Deputy Bures. In response to the special interrogatories, the jury found the following: Deputy Bures gave a canine warning; Bures ordered DaSilva to the ground; DaSilva continued to approach Bures until he was in range of the canine's bite; DaSilva did not stop after stepping off the porch and did not remain still; and Bures did not release the canine's leash before the canine made initial contact with DaSilva. Based on the jury's findings, Deputy Bures moved for dismissal of the claims on the ground of qualified immunity. . . The Court must now apply the law on qualified immunity to the factual findings made by the jury. . . . Taking the facts as found by the jury, the second and third Graham factors–the danger to the officer and the risk of flight–also weigh in Deputy Bures' favor. According to the jury's findings, Bures gave a canine warning and ordered DaSilva to the ground. DaSilva, however, failed to follow Deputy Bures' commands; instead, DaSilva continued advancing until he was within range of the canine's bite. The jury further found that Deputy Bures did not release the canine prior to the bite. When faced with the same circumstances as Deputy Bures, a reasonable officer could have concluded that DaSilva posed both a potential risk to the safety of the deputies and the public and a potential risk of flight; the suspect sought was believed to be armed, and DaSilva's advancement, despite being ordered to the ground, raised a reasonable belief that he might attempt to flee. Accordingly, the Court finds that Deputy Bures did not violate DaSilva's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force, and thus he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Phillips v. Irvin, 2007 WL 2156413, at *1, *2 (S.D.Ala. July 26, 2007) ("With respect to the federal claim, defendant would submit the issue of qualified immunity to a jury, and proposes an instruction . . . under which the jury would decide whether 'a reasonable police officer ... would hold an objectively reasonable belief that his actions were constitutional' as a question of fact. In addition to being unrealistic and unworkable without providing the jury a lengthy tutorial on Fourth Amendment excessive force law, this charge is simply incorrect. Circuit precedent makes it absolutely clear that whether a reasonable officer would believe that his actions are constitutional is purely a question of law. . . . By contrast, only the 'predicate factual element[s] of the underlying constitutional tort' are questions of fact for qualified immunity purposes because they 'involve the determination of facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . So, how, then, is a qualified immunity issue presented to a jury? The answer is, it isn't, at least not directly. As the Eleventh Circuit has explained, 'the jury itself decides the issues of historical fact that are determinative of the qualified immunity defense, but the jury does not apply the law relating to qualified immunity to those historical facts it finds; that is the court's duty.'. . Johnson teaches that the proper means of submitting qualified immunity issues to a jury is through special interrogatories that 'should be restricted to the who-what-when-where-why type of historical fact issues' necessary to determine whether the predicate factual elements justify the legal application of the qualified immunity defense. . . This is the course that the Court urged the parties to follow when the issue arose at the Final Pretrial Conference; however, they have not done so. It is the responsibility of the parties to fashion special interrogatories that will elicit jury findings on any evidentiary disputes upon which the qualified immunity defense turns. The parties are therefore ordered to reexamine their proposed jury charges and verdict forms in light of the principles outlined in Johnson.").

Beaulah v. Muscogee County Sheriff's Deputies, 447 F.Supp.2d 1342, at 1376 n.44 (M.D. Ga. 2006) ("The Court's rulings should not be interpreted to suggest that Price and Stinson may not eventually be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Court simply finds today that based on the CI's affidavit, genuine issues of material fact exist to be tried, and thus Price and Stinson are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law at the summary judgment stage. At trial, the Court intends to submit special interrogatories to the jury on the factual conflict that exists between Price and Stinson's testimony and the testimony of the CI. Based on the jury's resolution of the conflict in the evidence, the Court will make a ruling at that time on whether Price and Stinson are entitled to qualified immunity.").

VIII. QUALIFIED IMMUNITY AND FOURTH AMENDMENT CLAIMS

In Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987), the Supreme Court held that the language of the Fourth Amendment proscribing "unreasonable" searches and seizures did not preclude the possibility that an officer can act in an objectively reasonable fashion even though in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Court noted that determinations of probable cause are often quite difficult and officials should be held liable in damages only where their conduct was clearly proscribed. In the wake of Anderson, a number of circuits employ the concept of "arguable probable cause" in Fourth Amendment qualified immunity analysis. See, e.g., Escalera v. Lunn, 361 F.3d 737 (2d Cir. 2004) (infra); Storck v. City of Coral Springs, 354 F.3d 1307, 1317 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2003) (infra). See also Bailey v. Swindell, 940 F.3d 1295, 1300 n.5 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Some of our decisions have erroneously suggested that the 'arguable probable cause' standard applies at the first step of the qualified-immunity analysis, in determining whether a constitutional violation has occurred. See, e.g., Storck v. City of Coral Springs, 354 F.3d 1307, 1317 (11th Cir. 2003) ("[V]iewing the facts in the light most favorable to Storck, she has not established a constitutional violation because, at the very least, McHugh had arguable probable cause."). Controlling case law makes clear, however, that 'arguable probable cause' is a step-two standard. See Post v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 7 F.3d 1552, 1559 (11th Cir. 1993) ("Sellers-Sampson is entitled to qualified immunity because he had arguable probable cause to arrest Lirio. Put differently, Lirio has not shown that the law of probable cause is so clearly established that no reasonable officer, faced with the situation before Sellers-Sampson, could have believed that probable cause to arrest existed."), modified, 14 F.3d 583 (11th Cir. 1994); see also Huebner, 935 F.3d at 1190 n.6 ("Accordingly, we needn't reach the question whether McDonough had 'arguable probable cause,' which comes into play only at the second, 'clearly established' step of the qualified-immunity analysis." (citation omitted)).")

Does Anderson control in Fourth Amendment Excessive Force Cases?

A. Saucier v. Katz

In Saucier v. Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151 (2001), a majority of the Supreme Court held that in a Fourth Amendment excessive force case, the qualified immunity issue and the constitutional violation issue are not so intertwined that they "should be treated as one question, to be decided by the trier of fact." Id. at 2154. The Court determined that the analysis set out in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987) is not affected by the Court's decision in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), and that "[t]he inquiries for qualified immunity and excessive force remain distinct, even after Graham." 121 S. Ct. at 2158 . Graham protects an officer who reasonably, but mistakenly, believed the circumstances justified using more force than in fact was needed. The qualified immunity inquiry, on the other hand, has a further dimension. The concern of the immunity inquiry is to acknowledge that reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct." Id.

The respondent in Saucier, a sixty-year-old animals' rights advocate, filed a Bivens action in federal court, claiming that a military policeman used excessive force in arresting him when he attempted to unfurl a protest banner during a speech given by Vice President Gore at the Presidio Army Base in San Francisco. Id. at 2154. Because the district court had concluded there was a material issue of fact as to the reasonableness of the force used, and because the merits inquiry on the excessive force claim was considered to be identical to the immunity inquiry, summary judgment was denied. On interlocutory appeal, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to the officer, holding that the law on excessive force was clearly established by Graham, and that the question of objective reasonableness essential to the merits of the Fourth Amendment claim was identical to the question of objective reasonableness presented by the claim of qualified immunity. A determination of the reasonableness issue by the jury would resolve both the merits and the immunity questions. Id. at 2155.

In reversing the Ninth Circuit, Justice Kennedy, writing for the majority, reinforced, but did not apply, the Court's Ainstruction to the district courts and courts of appeal to concentrate at the outset on the definition of the constitutional right and to determine whether, on the facts alleged, a constitutional violation could be found . . . ." 121 S. Ct. at 2159. Constrained by the limited question on which the Court had granted review and expressing doubt that a constitutional violation did occur, the Court Aassume[d] a constitutional violation could have occurred under the facts alleged based simply on the general rule prohibiting excessive force. . . ." Id.

Assuming a constitutional violation, the next question that must be asked is whether the right was clearly established. On this question, the Court explained that "[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted." Id. at 2156. The Court admonished that consideration of the question of whether the right was clearly established must be on a "more specific level" than that recognized by the Ninth Circuit. Id. at 2155. On the other hand, the Court observed:

> This is not to say that the formulation of a general rule is beside the point, nor is it to insist the courts must have agreed upon the precise formulation of the standard. Assuming, for instance, that various courts have agreed that certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand, the officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity based simply on the argument that courts had not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.

Id. at 2157.

The Court concluded that given the circumstances confronting Officer Saucier and, given the lack of Aany case demonstrating a clearly established rule prohibiting the officer from acting as he did," the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. Id. at 2160.

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Stevens and Justice Breyer, concurred in the judgment but disagreed with the Acomplex route the Court lays out for lower courts." Id. at 2160 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Stevens and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment). For the concurring Justices, application of the Graham objective reasonableness standard was both necessary and sufficient to resolve the case. The only inquiry necessary was Awhether officer Saucier, in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him, could have reasonably believed he acted lawfully." Id. at 2161. Applying the Graham standard, Justice Ginsburg concluded that respondent Katz Atendered no triable excessive force claim against Saucier." Id. at _2162.

The concurring Justices did not share the majority's fears that eliminating the qualified immunity inquiry in excessive force claims would lead to jury trials in all Fourth Amendment excessive force cases. Id. at 2163. Justice Ginsburg noted the not uncommon granting of summary judgment in excessive force cases where courts have found the challenged conduct to be objectively reasonable based on relevant undisputed facts. Where the determination of reasonableness depends on which of two conflicting stories is believed, however, there must be a trial. Once a jury finds, under the Graham standard, that an officer's use of force was objectively unreasonable, the concurrence concludes that Athere is simply no work for a qualified immunity inquiry to do." Id. at 2164.

Justice Kennedy wrote for the majority and was joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O'Connor, Scalia and Thomas. Justice Souter joined in Parts I and II of the majority opinion but would have remanded the case for application of the qualified immunity standard. Justice Ginsburg wrote the opinion concurring in the judgment. She was joined by Justices Stevens and Breyer.

B. Brosseau v. Haugen

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 599 (2004) (per curiam) ("We express no view as to the correctness of the Court of Appeals' decision on the constitutional question itself. We believe that, however that question is decided, the Court of Appeals was wrong on the issue of qualified immunity. . . Graham and Garner, following the lead of the Fourth Amendment's text, are cast at a high level of generality. . . . Of course, in an obvious case, these standards can 'clearly establish' the answer, even without a body of relevant case law. [citing Hope v. Pelzer]. . . . The present case is far from the obvious one where Graham and Garner alone offer a basis for decision. . . . We therefore turn to ask whether, at the time of Brosseau's actions, it was ' "clearly established"' in this more ' "particularized"' sense that she was violating Haugen's Fourth Amendment right. . . The parties point us to only a handful of cases relevant to the 'situation [Brosseau] confronted': whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight. . . .These three cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case. None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that Brosseau's actions fell in the ' Ahazy border between excessive and acceptable force."' . . The cases by no means 'clearly establish' that Brosseau's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.").

C. Post-Saucier Case Law

D.C. CIRCUIT

Johnson v. District of Columbia, 528 F.3d 969, 976, 977 (D.C. Cir. 2008) ("Despite the similarity of phrasing, the two Saucier reasonableness questions are distinct though overlapping. Accordingly, Part II.A of this opinion asks whether it was reasonable for Bruce to kick Johnson's groin, while Part II.B asks whether it was reasonable for Bruce not to know that it was unlawful to kick Johnson's groin. . . . The district court erred in concluding that Bruce was entitled to qualified immunity. Summary judgment was premature because there exists a genuine issue of material fact, namely, whether Johnson's prone position was threatening or suggested escape. That dispute can only be resolved by evaluating the conflicting testimony of Johnson and Bruce.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Solis-Alarcon v. U.S., 662 F.3d 577, 581(1st Cir. 2011) ("Qualified immunity applies not only to the question whether a constitutional right exists but also to the judgment whether the general standard applies to the facts at hand. . . This extra layer of protection does not disappear merely because the underlying Fourth Amendment standard is itself one of reasonableness. The Supreme Court has drawn attention to the potential confusion, Saucier, 533 U.S. at 203-205 ("reasonable mistakes"); Anderson, 483 U.S. at 643-44 (possible to 'reasonably' act unreasonably); but, in the end, qualified immunity against personal liability exists even for constitutional mistakes and 'protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . The Fourth Amendment standard is objective . . .and, where qualified immunity is asserted, the district judge may apply it on summary judgment so long as any disputed facts are assumed arguendo in favor of the non-moving party.")

Cox v. Hainey, 391 F.3d 25, 29-32 (1st Cir. 2004) (" The Supreme Court has set up a sequential analysis for determining whether a defendant violated clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would have known. . . This court has construed that framework to consist of three inquiries: '(i) whether the plaintiff's allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation; (ii) whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the putative violation; and (iii) whether a reasonable officer, situated similarly to the defendant, would have understood the challenged act or omission to contravene the discerned constitutional right.' . . Under ordinary circumstances, the development of the doctrine of qualified immunity is best served by approaching these inquiries in the aforestated sequence. . . . The first prong of the qualified immunity analysis operates at a high level of generality, and Hainey, based on Cox's allegations, concedes this prong. . . . We accept this concession. The Fourth Amendment undoubtedly recognizes the right to be free from unreasonable seizures of the person. . . Hence, the undisputed facts, construed in the light most favorable to the appellant, make out a colorable claim of constitutional dimension. No more is exigible to satisfy the first part of the tripartite inquiry. We can be equally quick in executing the second step of the qualified immunity pavane. As said, Cox alleges that Hainey arrested him with insufficient information to constitute probable cause. The right to be free from arrest without constitutionally adequate probable cause is clearly established. . . That satisfies the second part of the tripartite inquiry. Even though the right to be free from an arrest without probable cause is clearly established, a further hurdle remains. In Anderson, the Supreme Court clarified the qualified immunity analysis by explaining that, although it was firmly established that warrantless searches, not subject to any recognized exception, violate the Fourth Amendment, more was needed before qualified immunity could be deemed irrelevant. . . The court below was required to determine whether the defendant had confronted particular circumstances in which the application of general principles did not yield a certain answer and, if that were the case, to determine whether the defendant had responded reasonably to that idiosyncratic fact pattern. . . In short, to set aside the buckler of qualified immunity 'the right the official is alleged to have violated must have been 'clearly established' in a more particularized, and hence more relevant, sense.'. . This guidance is pertinent here. In settings that invite balancing tests, it is often the case that the first two prongs of the qualified immunity inquiry do not satisfy Anderson's requirement of heightened specificity. This is particularly true of alleged false arrests, given the fact-dependent nature of the probable cause determination. No two probable cause equations are exactly alike and, therefore, in most of these situations precedent will take a court only so far. Thus, such cases frequently turn on the third prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, which channels the analysis from abstract principles to the specific facts of a given case. . . Under that prong, a defendant 'is entitled to immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest.' . . We turn to that requirement. . . . The qualified immunity doctrine is designed to afford officials an added measure of protection against civil liability. To achieve that goal, the doctrine eschews a line that separates the constitutional from the unconstitutional and instead draws a line that separates unconstitutional but objectively reasonable acts from obviously unconstitutional acts. . . When properly drawn, that line 'provides ample protection to all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . It follows that this suit may go forward only if the unlawfulness of the arrest would have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer standing in Hainey's shoes. . . We now consider what Hainey knew and when he knew it. The point of our inquiry is to determine whether, at the time of the arrest, an objectively reasonable officer could have concluded that the salmagundi of facts added up to probable cause. . . . Although the existence vel non of probable cause is arguable–we regard that question as very close, but see no need to decide it definitively–it simply cannot be said, on this record, that probable cause clearly was lacking at the time of the arrest. . . .Qualified immunity therefore attaches.").

Stoddard v. Somers, No. Civ.A.03-10461-DPW, 2004 WL 2830704, at 9-11 (D. Mass. Dec. 7, 2004) ("The application of qualified immunity is most appropriate when there is a dispute about the proper interpretation of particular actions taken by the party alleging excessive force. . . . When there exist multiple explanations for observed actions, it is not the place of a court or, for that matter, a jury to supplant a police officer's judgment. . . . Again, however, as mentioned in addressing whether an unreasonable amount of force was used by the police, the handling of the situation is only of minor import because there is a very real dispute about the nature of the situation itself–namely, what, if anything, Stoddard did in the presence of the arresting officers. . . If Stoddard's version of events is credited, no amount of force would be reasonable, thereby making immaterial the dispute over the extent of the contact. . . .The defendant attempts to make this aspect of the case turn on an officer's freedom to interpret actions, rather than on–as it actually does– whether any actions were taken by the plaintiff. Somers implies that he is basing his arguments on inferences drawn in Stoddard's favor but, in fact, does the opposite. . . . Here, the case is one of whether he acted a certain way, not to what extent or why he did so. In this sense, it is distinguishable from a case such as Roy in which a court should refuse to second-guess an officer's response to particular actions taken by a suspect. Stoddard contends that he neither moved at all, nor said anything, and that he was neither armed nor holding anything. There is no indication that Stoddard was himself suspected of a crime, nor was there any background knowledge that would lead an officer to be concerned for his safety in Stoddard's presence. If inferences are properly drawn in Stoddard's favor, Somers would be hard-pressed to find a justification for his actions–indeed he doesn't try to. For purposes of summary judgment, inferences are so drawn [footnote omitted] and, therefore, I find that Somers does not enjoy the protection of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings and reserve the question of qualified immunity for a later date. . . . Although qualified immunity is designed to create a shield of protection permitting officers to make necessary decisions in often dangerous situations, the shield has limits. To extend the protection of qualified immunity to this case would be to impose a nearly insurmountable burden on the plaintiff. If events actually unfolded as the plaintiff contends but immunity were granted at the summary judgment stage–thereby precluding a fact-finder from resolving the key factual disputes–there would rarely be recourse for a plaintiff when it is his testimony against the testimony of the police. To apply immunity here would subvert the summary judgment paradigm, flipping the inferences drawn and the allocation of burdens. That is not the purpose served by the doctrine. In the end, a jury may find Stoddard's version of events not credible. At this stage, however, it is sufficient to survive summary judgment. In sum, conceptualizing a jury drawing inferences in favor of the plaintiff, I cannot find that an objectively reasonable officer would deem it permissible to punch, hold down, and abuse a bystander to an arrest who had neither moved nor spoken.").

Gonzalez Perez v. Gomez Aguila, 312 F.Supp.2d 161, 170, 171 (D.P.R. 2004) ("In this case the analysis of defendants' qualified immunity defense turns upon the issue of whether Anthony was in fact carrying and firing an AK- 47. The three factors set forth in Saucier v. Katz, involve a determination of whether Anthony was in possession of the rifle. For example the severity of the crime factor presupposes the commission of a crime. If Anthony was not carrying a firearm, no crime was being committed. In addition, the determination of whether Anthony was in possession of the rifle also hinges on the officers' belief that he posed a threat to the officers or to others. Finally, the issue also relates to the officers' belief that the suspect was attempting to evade arrest by flight, or simply running away from an undoubtedly chaotic situation. . . . Consequently, given the conflicting evidence presented at trial, I find that there is a factual dispute regarding the reasonableness of the officers actions which in turn depends on the contested factual question of whether Anthony was carrying an AK-47. The defendants are, therefore, not entitled to the qualified immunity defense.").

Burbank v. Davis, 238 F. Supp.2d 317, 320 (D. Me. 2003) ("If this case reduced to the simple question of whether Davis's use of the knee kick to subdue the passively resisting defendant, although viewed by the jury as excessive force, was nonetheless objectively reasonable under the second part of the Saucier analysis, it would be a different case and might very well present an interesting qualified immunity question. The qualified immunity claim really reduces to the argument that because the injuries in this case were not serious, any officer in the Portland Police Department would be entitled to qualified immunity no matter what role he or she may have played in effecting this arrest. If the plaintiff is gratuitously hit in the back of the head instead of the face where more visible and photogenic marks are likely to appear, liability cannot attach. That argument misses the main point of the factual dispute in this record. Force applied to effectuate a lawful arrest is one thing; force applied after a suspect has submitted to arrest and is compliant is quite another thing. Davis's 'minimal injury' theory of the case is not supported by First Circuit case law, as I noted in my memorandum of decision on the earlier motion for summary judgment.").

Mulkern v. Cumberland County, No. 00-382-P-C, 2001 WL 1519409, at 23-25 (D.Me. Nov. 30, 2001) (not reported) ("As an initial matter, the County Defendants and the plaintiffs quarrel over whether a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity entails analysis of the underlying merits. . . The County Defendants have the better of the argument; the Supreme Court has directed that '[a] court required to rule upon the qualified immunity issue must consider

... this threshold question: Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? ... If no constitutional right would have been violated were the allegations established, there is no necessity for further inquiries concerning qualified immunity.' [citing Saucier v. Katz] . . . . The plaintiffs adduce no evidence that any of the individual defendants knew that Hale had suicidal tendencies, something that even Dr. Katz and the PHS nursing staff did not detect. . . Nor do the plaintiffs succeed in demonstrating deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The Jail staff on several occasions requested that the medical staff attend to Hale or asked Hale directly whether he needed medical attention. While, in the opinion of Dr. Cohn, corrections officers who were aware of Hale's escalating behaviors should have sought medical help sooner, this does not establish as a legal matter that these officers subjectively appreciated and disregarded a risk of serious harm to Hale. . . . . At bottom, the plaintiffs' theory is that Hale was punished when he should have been medicated. . . With proper medication, Hale would not have misbehaved; without misbehavior, he would not have been confined to disciplinary segregation; without disciplinary segregation, he would not have acted out further or, ultimately, attempted to take his life. While this theory, tragically, is plausible on these facts, the hurdle to making out a constitutional violation based on failure to medicate adequately or the unwarranted infliction of punishment is high. Here, where there were repeated (if bungled) attempts to address Hale's problems with medication, and where there is no evidence that disciplinary segregation was imposed for any reason other than underlying misconduct (even if that misconduct stemmed from improper medical management), the plaintiffs fall short of making out a case of failings of constitutional magnitude on the part of the corrections officers entrusted with Hale's care.").

Caron v. Hester, No. CIV. 00-394-M, 2001 WL 1568761, at 7-10 (D.N.H. Nov. 13, 2001) (unpublished) ("A difficult question is presented in this case regarding the level of specificity with which it is appropriate to define the constitutional right Caron claims was violated. All can agree that the right not to be subjected to 'unreasonable' or 'excessive' force during the course of an arrest was, when Caron was taken into custody, clearly established. However, 'a reasonable official's awareness of the existence of an abstract right, such as a right to be free from excessive force, does not equate to knowledge that his conduct infringes the right.' . . . And, if the constitutional right Caron claims was infringed must necessarily be defined more precisely, it is far less clear that such a right was 'clearly established' at the time. The record demonstrates that the force employed by Hester against Caron was, objectively, de minimus. And, as the Supreme Court has observed, 'the right to make an arrest or investigatory stop necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it.' . . . Except for Caron's preexisting shoulder injury, and the fact that it allegedly rendered him more fragile than an ordinary person, he would have suffered no discomfort or lasting effects from the manner in which Hester applied the handcuffs. Reduced to its essence, then, the question presented is whether Caron had a clearly established right not to be handcuffed behind his back after he allegedly informed Hester of his shoulder injury. He did not. Caron has pointed to no precedent that would support his necessary claim that, at the time of his arrest, it was clearly established that police officers use unlawful and excessive force when they handcuff a suspect behind the back, notwithstanding the suspect's unsupported claim to suffer from an injury that either prevents, or would be exacerbated by, such conduct. . . . To be sure, as noted above, there are cases that involved police officers' use of excessive force against a suspect who had visible signs of an injury or medical condition that should have established the reasonable likelihood of a suspect's vulnerable condition and counseled against the level of force actually employed. . . . In cases of that sort, it is both logical and reasonable to expect police officers to recognize that the suspect is potentially more susceptible to injury than the ordinary citizen and to require the officers to act accordingly. In this case, however, the only 'evidence' of Caron's preexisting shoulder injury was his statement to that effect–a statement, no doubt, uttered by many suspects who, if given the choice, would prefer not to be handcuffed at all and, if they must be restrained in that manner, would prefer that the handcuffs be in front. Trooper Hester was not confronted with any objective manifestation of Caron's claimed shoulder problem. . . . Although the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit has yet to confront this particular issue, several other courts have done so and concluded, at a minimum, that a suspect who displays no visible signs of being unusually vulnerable or fragile, is not subjected to excessive force when a police officer uses customary, reasonable force in applying handcuffs or otherwise effecting an arrest. . . . In light of the current legal landscape, the court cannot conclude that Caron had a 'clearly established' right to be handcuffed in front (or not at all) after he informed Hester of his shoulder injury or, viewed somewhat differently, that he had a 'clearly established' right not to be handcuffed with his hands behind his back once he invoked a shoulder injury. Consequently, a reasonable officer would not have understood that attempting to handcuff Caron with his hands behind his back after he claimed to have a shoulder injury amounted to a violation of Caron's constitutional right to be free of excessive force. Trooper Hester is, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity.").

Cummings v.Libby, 176 F. Supp.2d 26 (D. Me. 2001) (post-Saucier decision denying qualified immunity to officer in excessive force case because material issues of fact were in dispute).

SECOND CIRCUIT

Bryant v. Egan, 890 F.3d 382, 386 (2d Cir. 2018) ("Before trial, factual questions precluded a determination that Slezak and Egan were entitled to qualified immunity. And, as to the issues before us, that remains the case here. When determining whether factual questions remain on a post-trial claim, this Court may look to the undisputed facts adduced at trial and to any factual issues resolved by the trial. . . But in this case, the officers concede that '[n]early every fact material to [Bryant's] Fourth Amendment claims, including [his claim] premised on the Taser use, was disputed by the parties at trial.'. . And given the district court's conclusion that the jury's verdict—with respect to Slezak's tasering and Egan's failure to intervene—was against the weight of the evidence, that verdict no longer resolves those factual disputes. . . Fundamentally, then, this case is not in a meaningfully different posture than it was prior to trial, where the officers acknowledged that a finding of qualified immunity would have been premature. It remains premature now.")

Kass v. City of New York, 864 F.3d 200, 213 (2d Cir. 2017) ("Given the context in which Kass repeatedly refused to comply with the officers' orders—on a public sidewalk where pedestrians were passing, at a time of day when the sidewalks might shortly become more congested, and in close proximity to a public protest—and because Kass became increasingly hostile and resistant toward the officers, it was objectively reasonable for the officers to infer that Kass's continued defiance of their orders recklessly created a risk that he would 'cause public inconvenience, annoyance or alarm,' including a public disturbance. . . At the very least, competent police officers could reasonably disagree as to whether, by remaining on the sidewalk despite numerous requests to move on, Kass recklessly created such a risk. In sum, we conclude that Ernst and Alfieri had arguable probable cause to arrest Kass for violating both New York Penal Law § 195.05 and § 240.20(6) and are entitled to qualified immunity for Kass's federal false arrest and imprisonment claim. Any other conclusion, in our view, would not appropriately confine the denial of qualified immunity to officers who are 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate the law.'")

Jenkins v. City of New York, 478 F.3d 76, 87 (2d Cir. 2007) ("'Arguable' probable cause should not be misunderstood to mean 'almost' probable cause. The essential inquiry in determining whether qualified immunity is available to an officer accused of false arrest is whether it was objectively reasonable for the officer to conclude that probable cause existed. . . There should be no doubt that probable cause remains the relevant standard. If officers of reasonable competence would have to agree that the information possessed by the officer at the time of arrest did not add up to probable cause, the fact that it came close does not immunize the officer.").

Escalera v. Lunn, 361 F.3d 737, 743 (2d Cir. 2004)("Even if probable cause to arrest is ultimately found not to have existed, an arresting officer will still be entitled to qualified immunity from a suit for damages if he can establish that there was 'arguable probable cause' to arrest. Arguable probable cause exists 'if either (a) it was objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that probable cause existed, or (b) officers of reasonable competence could disagree on whether the probable cause test was met.' . . Thus, the analytically distinct test for qualified immunity is more favorable to the officers than the one for probable cause; 'arguable probable cause' will suffice to confer qualified immunity for the arrest.").

Cowan ex rel Estate of Cooper v. Breen, 352 F.3d 756, 761, 762 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Breen argues that no constitutional violation occurred, and that even if there was a constitutional violation, he is entitled to qualified immunity. As explained above, whether a constitutional violation occurred focuses on whether the officer's conduct was objectively reasonable. Thus, if the analysis focuses on whether an officer made a reasonable mistake of fact that justified his conduct, what is being examined is whether there was a constitutional violation, not whether the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Whether the officer is entitled to qualified immunity is resolved by the latter part of the Saucier analysis, which looks at an 'officer's mistake as to what the law requires,' . . . Thus, when Breen argues that his conduct was 'objectively reasonable,' . . . his contention is that there was no constitutional violation. When he argues instead that even if there was a constitutional violation he is entitled to qualified immunity, then his contention must be that his belief that his conduct was lawful was reasonable. . . .Breen would be entitled to qualified immunity if he reasonably believed at the moment he fired at Cooper that she posed a significant threat of death or serious physical harm to him or others. But this question–whether it was reasonable for Breen to believe that his life or person was in danger–is the very question upon which we have found there are genuine issues of material fact. [footnote omitted] Because in this case genuine, material, factual disputes overlap both the excessive force and qualified immunity issues, summary judgment must be denied.").

Torres v. Village of Sleepy Hollow, 379 F.Supp.2d 478, 483, 484 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("It is no defense to a claim of qualified immunity that the defendant did not do what plaintiff said he did. At this early stage of a lawsuit, before discovery takes place, we are presuming that the plaintiff's version of events is true, so a court cannot take into account assertions by the accused officer that contradict the plaintiff's allegations. Nothing in Saucier can be read to deprive the plaintiff of his Seventh Amendment right to have a jury resolve all disputed issues of material fact. If plaintiff's version of the facts is wrong and defendant's is correct, then the defendant will prevail, not on the ground of qualified immunity, but because he did nothing wrong. To explain with example: in this case, as in so many others, plaintiff alleges that the defendant used excessive force against him. The right to be free from the use of more force than is reasonably necessary to effect a lawful arrest is certainly well-settled, and no reasonable police officer could possibly believe otherwise. Therefore, unless the facts as asserted by plaintiff in the complaint (and, under my rules, in his deposition). . .could never be found by a reasonable trier of fact to constitute excessive force (for example, if plaintiff alleged only that the defendant took him by the hand), an officer accused of using excessive force will ordinarily not be able to get out of a lawsuit prior to discovery on the ground of qualified immunity. If the officer's defense is that the force he used was not excessive–that is, the force used was reasonably necessary to effect the arrest–then the officer is asserting that he did not violate the plaintiff's constitutional rights, and while he may ultimately prevail on the merits, he is not entitled to dismissal of the lawsuit at an early stage.").

Bolden v. Village of Monticello, 344 F.Supp.2d 407, 421 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("Qualified immunity does not attach because plaintiffs have alleged with some particularity the use of more force than was reasonably necessary under the circumstances. Of course, as the case develops, the evidence may demonstrate that O'Connor and/or Deitz (1) did not conduct, authorize or witness any illegal strip search of the plaintiffs; (2) had probable cause to strip search some or all of the plaintiffs; (3) did not engage in the various humiliations alleged by plaintiffs; (4) were reasonably required to use force against some or all of the plaintiffs in order to secure the premises during the search. However, if the evidence exonerates defendants, it will be because they did not commit any constitutional violation–not because they are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kent v. Katz, 327 F.Supp.2d 302, 308, 309 (D. Vt. 2004) ("Kent also moves for JMOL based on the excessive force and qualified immunity jury instructions. Kent does not contend that these instructions varied from the standard instructions on excessive force and qualified immunity. Instead, Kent argues that the instructions on excessive force and qualified immunity both required the jury to determine whether Katz acted reasonably when using force to arrest Kent. According to Kent, the reasonableness inquiry for excessive force is essentially the same as that for qualified immunity. Therefore, Kent contends the jury rendered a legally inconsistent verdict when it determined that Katz had used excessive force against Kent, but was nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. Kent failed to object to the excessive force and qualified immunity instructions at trial and is therefore barred from raising the objection now. . . Even in the absence of this procedural impediment, Kent's argument is without merit. The Supreme Court has held that the reasonableness inquiry in a qualified immunity determination is distinct from the reasonableness inquiry in an excessive force determination. . . In Saucier, the Court explained that the inquiry as to whether a police officer used excessive force hinges on the facts and circumstances facing the officer at the scene. . . An officer could be reasonably mistaken about a given fact, for example, whether a suspect was likely to fight back, and would therefore be justified in using more force than was needed. . . In contrast, in a qualified immunity determination the relevant question is whether the officer's mistake about the legality of his conduct was reasonable. . . . In its finding for Kent on the excessive force claim, the jury could have concluded that Katz was unreasonably mistaken about the facts and circumstances facing him during the incident with Kent and was therefore unreasonably mistaken about the appropriate level of force needed to arrest Kent. The jury also could have found that Katz reasonably believed the amount of force he used to arrest Kent was legal, and thus concluded that Katz was entitled to qualified immunity. These are legally consistent determinations that a reasonable jury could have reached.").

Tiffany v. Tartaglione, No. 00 Civ. 2283(CM)(LMS, 2004 WL 540275, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2004) ("[B]ecause defendants did not raise [qualified immunity] at an early point in the proceedings, we find ourselves in just the sort of posture where the meaning of qualified immunity becomes muddy. As noted above, in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), the Supreme Court indicated that qualified immunity ought to be decided by the Court at the earliest possible opportunity–preferably at the outset of the case, which is the point at which plaintiff's well pleaded allegations are assumed to be true, and defendant's version of the facts has not even been developed. Here, the parties have engaged in extensive discovery, and defendants' version of events has taken on a life of its own. But as our own Court of Appeals made plain in its most recent discussion of this convoluted doctrine, in Stephenson v. John Doe, Detective, 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir.2003), when the issue on the table is qualified immunity as a matter of law, the defendants' version of the facts is absolutely irrelevant. The only relevant inquiry on a motion for qualified immunity as a matter of law is whether the constitutional right that plaintiff claims was violated rests on law that is well-settled–because if it is, 'the immunity defense ordinarily should fail, since a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . Claims that a public officer made a reasonable mistake of fact, as opposed to a mistake of law, 'go to the question of whether the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated, not the question of whether the officer was entitled to qualified immunity.' Stephenson, 332 F.3d at 78 (citing Saucier, 533 U.S. at 205, 206).")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Istvanik v. Rogge, Nos. 01-3395, 01-3536, 2002 WL 31412508, at 1-3 (3d Cir. Oct. 28, 2002) (unpublished) ("[W]hen Rogge first raised the issue of qualified immunity in his Rule 50(a) motion, the district court followed the majority of courts of appeals that had ruled on that issue. The court reasoned that the standard for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims and the standard for qualified immunity collapse into a single objective reasonableness inquiry that must be decided by the jury. Under this majority view, a finding of excessive force precludes a finding of qualified immunity. . . . The district court therefore denied Rogge's Rule 50(a) motion and ultimately submitted the issue of his objective reasonableness to the jury. The jury concluded that Rogge used excessive force. Rogge then filed a post-trial motion under Rule 50(b) arguing once again that he was entitled to qualified immunity. However, before the district court ruled, the Supreme Court decided Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), in which the Court clarified the relevant analysis. . . . In adjudicating Rogge's Rule 50(b) motion for judgment as a matter of law, the district court applied Saucier' s two-step process and held that Rogge was entitled to qualified immunity, and therefore granted Rogge's motion for judgment as a matter of law. . . . The heart of Istvanik's excessive force claim is that Rogge applied the handcuffs too tightly when he was double-cuffed to a steel cot in the holding cell. In its Saucier analysis, the district court found that the first step was answered by the jury's finding that Rogge's actions constituted excessive force in violation of Istvanik's Fourth Amendment rights. In its analysis of the second step, i.e., whether the constitutional right was clearly established, the district court fully surveyed the state of the law and determined that, at the time of the incident, the question of whether tight handcuffing constitutes a violation of Fourth Amendment rights against excessive force was not established even in a general sense. Therefore, it clearly was not established in the particularized sense required for qualified immunity. . . We find no error in the district court's Saucier analysis. Quite frankly, if the various circuit courts of appeals and the district courts disagree on the question, we can hardly fault Officer Rogge, especially since it is apparent that he was dealing with a thoroughly uncooperative person who had been arrested for drunk driving.").

Curley v. Klem, 298 F.3d 271, 278-82 (3d Cir. 2002) (Curley I) ("As this Court has noted previously, . . . the imperative to decide qualified immunity issues early in the litigation is in tension with the reality that factual disputes often need to be resolved before determining whether the defendant's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Thus, while we have recognized that it is for the court to decide whether an officer's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right, we have also acknowledged that the existence of disputed, historical facts material to the objective reasonableness of an officer's conduct will give rise to a jury issue. . . .Our sister circuits agree upon this general prohibition against deciding qualified immunity questions in the face of disputed historical facts. [citing cases] Further, the prohibition does not appear at all inconsistent with the analytical framework recently detailed by the Supreme Court in Saucier. . . .[A]t this stage of the qualified immunity analysis, where we discern simply whether Curley alleges conduct in violation of a constitutional right, we must consider only the facts alleged by Curley, taken in the light most favorable to him. . . . We conclude that these facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Curley, are sufficient to support the claim that Klem's shooting of Curley constituted an unreasonable seizure, violative of Curley's rights under the Fourth Amendment. While we recognize the great pressure and intensity inherent in a police officer's hot pursuit of a suspect known to be armed and highly dangerous, we find that under Curley's account of events, it was unreasonable for Klem to fire at Curley based on his unfounded, mistaken conclusion that Curley was the suspect in question. Having thus found that the facts alleged by Curley demonstrate the violation of a constitutional right, we next ask whether the right was clearly established or, more precisely, 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . Based on this assessment of the circumstances confronting Klem, the District Court concluded that his decision to shoot was not objectively unreasonable. The problem with the District Court's analysis, however, is that it did not recognize the existence of disputed historical facts that are clearly material to the question of objective reasonableness. There are disputed issues of material fact with regard to at least two key events–the inspection of the suspect's vehicle and the actual confrontation between Klem and Curley. . . . A jury must resolve these issues before a court can determine whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that Klem's conduct was unlawful. Thus, we conclude that the District Court could not have properly viewed these unresolved factual issues in the light most favorable to Curley and still find that Klem's conduct was protected under the qualified immunity doctrine.").

Bennett v. Murphy (Bennett II), 274 F.3d 133, 136, 137 (3d Cir. 2001) ("After Saucier it is clear that claims of qualified immunity are to be evaluated using a two-step process. First, the court must determine whether the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, show a constitutional violation. If the plaintiff fails to make out a constitutional violation, the qualified immunity inquiry is at an end; the officer is entitled to immunity. In this case it is clear that Bennett's submissions, viewed in the light most favorable to her, do make out a constitutional violation. In Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), the Supreme Court held that the use of force contravenes the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness. If, as the plaintiff's evidence suggested, David Bennett had stopped advancing and did not pose a threat to anyone but himself, the force used against him, i.e. deadly force, was objectively excessive. Once it is determined that evidence of a constitutional violation has been adduced, courts evaluating a qualified immunity claim move to the second step of the analysis to determine whether the constitutional right was clearly established. That is, in the factual scenario established by the plaintiff, would a reasonable officer have understood that his actions were prohibited? The focus in this step is solely upon the law. If it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer what the law required under the facts alleged, he is entitled to qualified immunity. If the requirements of the law would have been clear, the officer must stand trial. Saucier's holding regarding the availability of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage does not mean that an officer is precluded from arguing that he reasonably perceived the facts to be different from those alleged by the plaintiff. An officer may still contend that he reasonably, but mistakenly, believed that his use of force was justified by the circumstances as he perceived them; this contention, however, must be considered at trial. . . . The decision in Saucier clarified what was not apparent before–that the immunity analysis is distinct from the merits of the excessive force claim. We have concluded that the first prong of the two-step Saucier test is satisfied. Given the District Court's thorough familiarity with all of the aspects of this matter, it is appropriate that it be given the first opportunity to apply the second part of the Saucier analysis. We will, therefore, vacate the order of the District Court and remand this matter for further consideration.").

Griffin v. Hickson, No. CIV.A. 98-3805, 2002 WL 988003, at *7 (E.D. Pa. May 9, 2002) (not reported) ("[O]nce a civil rights plaintiff has surmounted the obstacles imposed by the first two components of the qualified immunity inquiry, the burden shifts to the law enforcement officers to demonstrate that 'the evidence [will] not support a reasonable jury finding that [their] actions were objectively unreasonable.' . . . Stated differently, if the evidence supports a reasonable finding that agents' actions were objectively unreasonable, they are not entitled to qualified immunity. As delineated, supra, the legal proposition that it is objectively unreasonable–and thus a Fourth Amendment violation–to use deadly force against an unarmed, unthreatening person is well settled and uncontroversial. . . In this case, . . . the record evidence would support both a reasonable finding that Griffin did not possess a gun at the time of the shooting and a similarly reasonable finding that the agents did not reasonably believe that Griffin possessed a gun. Nothing within defendants' pleadings or argumentation establishes contrarily. Moreover, the agents advance no contention as to the reasonableness of their actions other than the assertion that Griffin either actually or apparently was holding or fired a gun. . . Accordingly, insofar as plaintiffs' excessive force claim is concerned, defendants have not demonstrated that 'the evidence [will] not support a reasonable jury finding that [their] actions were objectively unreasonable.'").

Nardini v. Hackett, No. Civ.A. 00 CV 5038, 2001 WL 1175130, at *7 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 19, 2001) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court's recent decision in Saucier v. Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151 (2001), has resolved a long-standing debate within the circuits regarding whether the qualified immunity analysis with its emphasis on 'objective reasonableness' is distinct from the Fourth Amendment 'objective reasonableness' inquiry under Graham. In Katz, the Supreme Court concluded that the qualified immunity analysis is indeed separate and appropriate in a Fourth Amendment excessive force context. . . . With this recent guidance from the Supreme Court, we are compelled to conclude that even if Plaintiff's allegations rise to the level of a constitutional violation, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Reasonable police officers in Individual Defendants' position could reasonably conclude that the force applied in arresting Ms. Nardini was proper and not excessive in violation of her clearly established Fourth Amendment rights.").

Estate of Smith v. Marasco, No. Civ.A. 00-5485, 2004 WL 633276, at *11, *12 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 29, 2004) (on remand) ("[In Saucier] the Court held that the inquiries of excessive force and qualified immunity are distinct and offered the following explanation. In the case of excessive force, an officer is justified in the level of force used if the 'officer reasonably, but mistakenly, believed that a suspect was likely to fight back.'. .. In the case of qualified immunity, however, an officer is entitled to immunity if his mistake as to the amount of force that was legal under the circumstances was reasonable. . . While this distinction appears to be clear on its face, we are uncertain how we are to assess whether an officer was reasonable in his understanding of the amount of force the law allows under certain circumstances without also determining whether the officer was reasonable his assessment of the threat he faced. Thus, even if we were to conclude, as the Third Circuit seems to urge, that the amount of force used in this case was a constitutional violation, we respectfully find that any mistakes made by the officers in determining the amount of force that could be legally used against Smith were reasonable. In doing so, we again rely on Sharrer. It seems to us that if we, as a federal court learned in the law, interpreted Sharrar as justifying the use of SERT and the tactics it employed in this case, then it seems reasonable that a police officer at the time of the incident would have come to the same conclusion.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Young v. Prince George's County, 355 F.3d 751, 757 (4th Cir. 2004) ("After considering the totality of the circumstances, we hold that Officer Hines reasonably sought to limit Young's access to his firearm by handcuffing him. We cannot, however, conclude as a matter of law that the force used by Officer Hines subsequent to Young's being handcuffed was reasonable. Officer Hines was confronted with a situation in which he pulled over two suspects for a minor traffic violation, namely the failure to have an operable trailer tail-light. Upon being stopped by Officer Hines, both Young and Pringle were fully cooperative. They promptly sat down on the curb and placed their hands on their heads when asked to do so by Officer Hines. Indeed, Young sought to assist and put Officer Hines at ease by immediately volunteering that he himself was a law enforcement officer, that his law enforcement credentials were in his automobile and that he was carrying a firearm. Given the cooperation of Young and Pringle, it is not readily apparent why Officer Hines, after handcuffing Young and Pringle, needed to grab Young from behind, place him in a headlock, spin him around and throw him head-first to the ground. Once Young and Pringle were both handcuffed, Officer Hines could have easily disarmed Young, who at no point resisted, without the use of such force. Even more questionable is Officer Hines's use of force once Young was lying face-down on the ground, handcuffed behind his back and disarmed. At this point, Young presumably posed little, if no, threat to Officer Hines. Nonetheless, Officer Hines proceeded to strike Young in the back of the head with his forearm and pound his knee into the center of Young's back. When Young complained about the use of such force, Officer Hines responded by telling Young to 'shut up' and further pounding his knee into Young's back. Defendants argue that the use of such force was reasonable because Young was armed. The fact that a suspect is armed, however, does not render all force used by an officer reasonable. The measures taken by an officer to disarm a suspect must be reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Here, Young was stopped for a minor traffic violation, was completely cooperative and posed little, if no, threat once he was handcuffed behind his back. . . When viewed in this light, we believe that a reasonable jury could find excessive the force used by Officer Hines once Young was handcuffed. Based on the foregoing, the district court's grant of summary judgment on Young's excessive force claim was erroneous." [footnotes omitted]).

Martin v. Dishong, No. 02-1173, No. 02-1193, 2003 WL 194776, at *2 (4th Cir. Jan. 30, 2003) (unpublished) ("[W]e uphold the decision of the district court. As that court detailed in its order, the evidence in the summary judgment record would support different conclusions, depending on which evidence was believed by the trier of fact. One possible conclusion–that Dishong was standing outside his vehicle and Martin was driving directly toward him at the moment the fatal shot was fired–would support Dishong's assertion that he used deadly force to protect himself. But this assertion fails under other scenarios supported by other evidence, in which Dishong was safely inside or behind his vehicle. The district court correctly concluded that this dispute of fact precludes the entry of summary judgment based on the assertion that Dishong reasonably feared for his own safety when he fired the shot that killed Martin.")

Gomez v. Atkins, 296 F.3d 253, 261, 262 (4th Cir. 2002) ("In our assessment of whether Atkins is entitled to qualified immunity . . . the question is not whether there actually was probable cause for the murder warrant against Isidro, but whether an objective law officer could reasonably have believed probable cause to exist.").

Clem v. Corbeau, 284 F.3d 543, 552-54 (4th Cir. 2002) ("In sum, viewed in the light most favorable to Clem, the evidence is that Corbeau shot a mentally disabled, confused older man, obviously unarmed, who was stumbling toward the bathroom in his own house with pepper spray in his eyes, unable to threaten anyone. Of course, Clem ultimately may not be able to prove these facts, but, if he can, it would require no improper second- guessing, or the application of '20-20 ... hindsight' to conclude that Officer Corbeau violated Mr. Clem's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive police force. . . Having determined that Clem has alleged a violation of a constitutional right, we must now proceed to the second sequential step of the Saucier analysis–determination of whether Officer Corbeau is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity from suit. . . . . To carry out this analysis, we must consult relevant case law to determine whether a closely analogous situation had been litigated and decided before the events at issue, making the application of law to fact clear. . . In doing so, however, we must also keep in mind the Supreme Court's warning that this is not a mechanical exercise, and that the test is not whether 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,' but rather, whether pre-existing law makes the unlawfulness of an act 'apparent.'. . . Accordingly, a constitutional right is clearly established for qualified immunity purposes not only when it has been 'specifically adjudicated' but also when it is 'manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked'" . . . Thus, 'when "the defendants' conduct is so patently violative of the constitutional right that reasonable officials would know without guidance from the courts" that the action was unconstitutional, closely analogous pre- existing case law is not required to show that the law is clearly established.' . . To hold otherwise would allow an officer who understood the unlawfulness of his actions to escape liability simply because the instant case could be distinguished on some immaterial fact, or worse, because the illegality of the action was so clear that it had seldom before been litigated. . . . Well before 1998 it was clearly established that a police officer could not lawfully shoot a citizen perceived to be unarmed and non-dangerous, neither suspected of any crime nor fleeing a crime scene. The decision to use deadly force in these circumstances simply does not lie near the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' and any mistaken belief to the contrary would not have been reasonable. . . Accordingly, Officer Corbeau is not entitled to qualified immunity, as a matter of law, on the present record.").

Cowles v. Peterson, 344 F.Supp.2d 472, 483, 484 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("It is not enough to find that the force used was unreasonable under the objective standards of the Fourth Amendment; the Court must also find that the objectively reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful. Although the two analyses may seem similar, the qualified immunity analysis of reasonableness contains an additional dimension. . . Officers will be entitled to qualified immunity where, although they correctly perceived all the relevant facts, they made 'reasonable mistakes as to the legality of their actions.' . . The key is whether existing law gave the officers fair warning that their conduct would be unconstitutional. . . .The question before the Court, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, is whether an objective officer could reasonably believe that when an individual objects to a search of his car, but otherwise poses no threat to the officer, it is legally acceptable to strike that individual in the forehead twice with sufficient force to cause a contusion, and then when that individual flees from the assault, to throw the person to the ground, shove his head against the ground, and force his hands behind his back in such a way as to injure his shoulder. No objectively reasonable officer could believe this to be the case. It is clear from the Fourth Circuit's decision in Jones that it was well-established by September 2000 that when an individual does not pose an objective threat to an officer, the officer's right to use force is severely limited . . . The Court notes that many of the incidents described in Jones involved more serious injuries than those which occurred in this case, but these cases also involved individuals whom the officers deemed dangerous enough to at least handcuff. . . Here, the Defendants were so confident in their relationship with and knowledge of Plaintiff that they made no attempts to even frisk him, never mind secure or restrain Plaintiff, before beginning the alleged search of Plaintiff's car. The Court cannot perceive of any objectively reasonable officer who would believe that the Constitution allowed him to strike a non-threatening free person in the forehead with any object, and then to tackle and injure that person when he fled from the assault. Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on this issue is DENIED.")

Bartram v. Wolfe, 152 F. Supp.2d 898, 903, 904 (S.D.W.Va. 2001) ("[T]he second operative question under Saucier is this: Was it clearly established as objectively unreasonable in August 1998 to punch or otherwise batter a handcuffed suspect who was complying and cooperating with a law enforcement officer's instructions? Although one has difficulty finding a case directly on point for that proposition, this is one of those rare instances where the question ineluctably leads to an affirmative answer. . . . The conduct alleged here is not so much a reasonable mistake concerning the amount of force required, but rather a purposeful and gratuitous attack on a suspect who was neither resisting arrest nor posing a threat to anyone's safety.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Thibodaux City, 887 F.3d 726, 733-35 (5th Cir. 2018) ("According to the officers, they had probable cause to arrest Johnson for failing to provide identification, an alleged violation of Louisiana Revised Statute 14:108. That statute requires an 'arrested or detained party' to provide identification only when the officer is making 'a lawful arrest' or a 'lawful detention.'. . . The statute could not extend more broadly. Under the Fourth Amendment, police officers may not require identification absent an otherwise lawful detention or arrest based on reasonable suspicion or probable cause. . . While officers are free to demand identification in the circumstances of a lawful stop or arrest, they 'may not arrest a suspect for failure to identify himself if the request for identification is not reasonably related to the circumstances justifying the stop.'. .The cases cited by the city are not to the contrary. . . . Thus, under both Louisiana law and the Constitution, Johnson was required to provide identification only if she was otherwise lawfully stopped. The officers would have no probable cause to arrest if the request for identification came during an illegal seizure. Accordingly, the verdict contains an implicit legal conclusion: Johnson was lawfully detained when the officers asked for identification. The city maintains that Johnson was lawfully detained because Amador had a valid justification for the initial traffic stop: to arrest Robertson on an outstanding warrant. We disagree. . . .The purpose of the stop was to arrest Robertson, who was known to have an outstanding warrant. The identification of Johnson had nothing to do with that purpose; none of the officers suspected Johnson of having a warrant or being connected to Robertson. Nor was there any evidence that would support a finding of reasonable suspicion. The only evidence the city points to is that Every attempted to get out of the vehicle earlier during the stop and that Johnson and Every were later on their cell phones. But Every then complied with Amador's command to close the door and remain in the vehicle, and the mere use of a cell phone does not establish a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. More importantly, the officers who asked for Johnson's identification explicitly testified that they had no suspicion of ongoing or future criminal activity. Those officers explained that they asked for identification only because Johnson was already stopped. But again, asking for identification is not itself a reason to prolong a stop. This case is thus distinguishable from those in which officers developed enough reasonable suspicion to justify detaining passengers for reasons beyond the initial stop. . . .No such emerging facts were present here. The officers tried to identify Johnson merely because she was a passenger. Yet once the officers had effected their purpose for stopping the truck and discovered nothing establishing a reasonable suspicion that Johnson were involved in criminal activity, she should have been free to go. Therefore, the verdict was predicated upon an erroneous legal conclusion: that Johnson was lawfully stopped when the officers asked for identification. Because she was not lawfully stopped, she committed no crime by refusing. . . The officers could not have had probable cause to arrest, and the verdict 'cannot in law be supported' by the evidence. . . Accordingly, we remand for consideration of qualified immunity and, if necessary, of damages on Johnson's unlawful-arrest claims against Amador, Buchanon, Gaudet, and Thibodeaux.")

Simmons v. City of Paris, 378 F.3d 476, 480, 481(5th Cir. 2004) ("Defendants argue that they made an honest mistake in going into the Handley home and that they accordingly are entitled to qualified immunity. If the evidence was undisputed that this was all that occurred, defendants would be correct, and they would be entitled to qualified immunity. However, plaintiffs offered evidence that defendants did not immediately depart after learning that they were in the wrong house. That is an issue to be resolved by a jury. Qualified immunity does not provide a safe harbor for police to remain in a residence after they are aware that they have entered the wrong residence by mistake. A decision by law enforcement officers to remain in a residence after they realize they are in the wrong house crosses the line between a reasonable mistake and affirmative misconduct that traditionally sets the boundaries of qualified immunity.").

Mace v. City of Palestine, 333 F.3d 621, 624 n.7 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Mace argues that Saucier requires us to make this determination [whether constitutional right to be free from excessive force was violated] based on the pleadings alone, and urges us to take her conclusory allegations of constitutional violations as definitive on this point. We do not read the Supreme Court's decision in Saucier to have changed the rules governing summary judgment. In ruling on a summary judgment motion of any kind, courts must consider 'the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file together with the affidavits, if any'. . . To limit a summary judgment inquiry based on qualified immunity to a consideration of the pleadings alone would destroy the central purpose of granting immunity from suit. . . . Finally, it is well established that a nonmovant cannot overcome summary judgment with conclusory allegations and unsubstantiated assertions.").

Mace v. City of Palestine, 333 F.3d 621, 627, 628 (5th Cir. 2003) (Wiener, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I remain mindful of our duty to avoid 'second-guessing' the 'split second judgment' of Chief Henderson and his officers during this unquestionably tense encounter with an inebriated, deeply disturbed and volatile young man. Given the conflicting eyewitness testimony, however, and viewing the disputed facts, as we must, in the light most favorable to Mace, as the non-movant, I simply cannot accept that, at this liminal stage of litigation, we can hold that Henderson's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. . . Several questions, including (1) whether Revill was threatening to harm the officers, (2) whether he was advancing, or retreating, or standing still when he was shot, and (3) whether the overall situation was rapidly deteriorating (as the defendant, Henderson, claims) or steadily improving (as the disinterested witness, Frix, testified) cannot be resolved without weighing the evidence and evaluating the credibility of witnesses– functions exclusively reserved for the trier of fact.").

Branton v. City of Dallas, 272 F.3d 730, 744, 746 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Although we have just determined above that under present law Chief Click's punitive employment action against Branton because of her speech pointing out dishonest conduct by another officer violated the First Amendment, the question remains whether this was clearly established in January of 1997, when Click decided to strip her of all internal affairs investigative duties and to relegate her to taking down walk-in complaints. We conclude that, at that time, Branton's right had been defined at the appropriate level of specificity so that a court could determine that it was clearly established and that its contours had become sufficiently clear so that a reasonable official, identically situated, would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . . After reviewing the foregoing cases, we conclude that, at the time Branton spoke out, it was clearly established under facts 'not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts in the case at hand,' that Branton's speech revealing false testimony by a fellow police officer was protected and that 'the officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity based simply on the argument that courts had not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.' . . Consequently, a reasonably objective public official, identically situated in Chief Click's position, would have known that adverse employment action against an employee for her speech concerning false testimony by a fellow officer would violate a clearly established constitutional right. Therefore, the defendants here are not entitled to summary judgment on their claim of qualified immunity.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Dunigan v. Noble, 390 F.3d 486, 489 n.2 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Prior to Saucier, a majority of Circuits, including our own, held the question of whether an officer was entitled to qualified immunity from an excessive force claim was identical to the inquiry on the merits of the claim. See, e.g., Bass v. Robinson, 167 F.3d 1041, 1051 (6th Cir.1999); Katz v. United States, 194 F.3d 962, 968 (9th Cir.1999) (collecting cases). Thus, under prior law the existence of a genuine factual dispute always precluded summary judgment.").

Mills v. City of Barbourville, 389 F.3d 568, 577 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right was violated by the deficient affidavit supporting the warrant. Although officers are entitled to rely on a judicially-secured warrant for immunity in a Section 1983 action claiming illegal search, if the warrant is so lacking in indicia of probable cause that official belief in the existence of probable cause is unreasonable, qualified immunity is not appropriate. . . . . Because the officers presented absolutely no information in the affidavit presented to the magistrate indicating that the place to be searched was connected to Lisa Mills, either through a sworn statement that Cox had identified the residence as the place of the drug purchase or through independent investigation corroborating that it was the home of Lisa Mills, the affidavit was 'so lacking in indicia of probable cause that official belief in the existence of probable cause is unreasonable.'").

Solomon v. Auburn Hills Police Department, 389 F.3d 167, 172-75 (6th Cir. 2004) ("In the case before us, the district court reached the correct decision in denying Officer Miller summary judgment, but its rationale intertwined the standard for determining qualified immunity and the standard for granting summary judgment. The district court failed to completely evaluate the second prong of the Saucier test. Instead of concluding whether or not Officer Miller acted objectively reasonable under the circumstances, the district court merely found that a jury question exists on that issue. This comes, however, as no surprise. As recognized by the concurring Justices in Saucier, the two-part test 'holds large potential to confuse.'. . Because we are to review the district court's decision de novo, the district court's confusion of the standard does not require reversal. Set forth below is the proper analysis for determining whether qualified immunity should result in summary judgment for a defendant–in this case, Officer Miller. . . . As instructed by the Court in Saucier, this court must 'concentrate at the outset on the definition of the constitutional right and [then] determine whether, on the facts alleged, a constitutional violation could be found....' . . . . After the constitutional right has been defined, we still must inquire whether a violation of Solomon's right to be free from excessive force could be found. . . . Under the circumstances '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury,'. . .Officer Miller's overly aggressive actions could have violated Solomon's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force during an arrest. . . . Once a potential violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right has been established, we next decide whether that right was clearly established. In so deciding, we must ask 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation confronted.' . . . If an officer, therefore, makes a mistake as to how much force is required, he will still be entitled to qualified immunity so long as that mistake was reasonable. . . Thus, to find Officer Miller shielded from his actions and therefore entitled to qualified immunity, we must find that Officer Miller's use of force under the circumstances was objectively reasonable. . . . In applying these considerations [the Graham factors] to the facts at hand, it would be clear to a reasonable officer that the amount of force used against Solomon by Officer Miller was unlawful. . . .Officer Miller's actions, in total, were excessive and resulted in Solomon suffering from bruising and a fractured arm. In viewing the facts in favor of Solomon, we conclude that no reasonable officer would find that the circumstances surrounding the arrest of Solomon required the extreme use of force that was used here. Officer Miller is no exception. Because Officer Miller's conduct was unlawful under the circumstances, he is not able to escape liability through qualified immunity.")

Solomon v. Auburn Hills Police Department, 389 F.3d 167, 176 (6th Cir. 2004) (Rogers, J., dissenting) ("It is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts. An officer might correctly perceive all of the relevant facts but have a mistaken understanding as to whether a particular amount of force is legal in those circumstances. If the officer's mistake as to what the law requires is reasonable, however, the officer is entitled to the immunity defense. . . In the instant case the objective facts are that an officer with a heavy build was legally trying to handcuff a person of slighter build who was physically trying not to be handcuffed. The precise amount of force needed to accomplish this without injury in the circumstances of this case is so obviously a difficult determination that the mere fact that injury occurred does not amount to evidence of unreasonable force. At worst it was a reasonable mistake for which qualified immunity is appropriate.").

Humes v. Gilless, Nos. 03-5630, 03-5631, 03-5632, 2004 WL 1794604, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Aug. 10, 2004) (not published) ("We have no difficulty in assuming that defendants' actions violated plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. Plaintiffs, however, have failed to establish that any reasonable officer would have understood that his actions would violate that right under the circumstances of this case. . . While plaintiffs cite Supreme Court precedent establishing that for Fourth Amendment purposes, a seizure occurs when a person reasonably believes that she is not free to leave, plaintiffs have failed to cite any case, statute, rule, regulation, or other authority that would have put the officers in this case on notice that by conducting a training exercise that interfered with other officers' freedom of movement, they were unreasonably seizing the other officers. . . . Though Defendants' actions might support a claim of unreasonable seizure, such a claim was (and is) not clearly established with respect to this law enforcement training situation. Accordingly, we find that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Reynolds v. City of Anchorage, 379 F.3d 358, 364, 366, 367 (6th Cir. 2004) ("The situation of the juvenile delinquent inmates of the Bellewood Home lay somewhere between that of prison inmates and students in school. The Bellewood inmates were not as closely confined or strictly controlled and supervised as prison inmates or detainees. Perhaps their expectations of privacy in that situation were somewhat greater than those of prisoners, but this slight difference appears insignificant. On the other hand, they were still subject to substantial restraint; they were required to live and remain in the Home and they were not free to leave it as they wished. Their confinement to the Home, like that of inmates in a prison, was punishment for prior criminal misdeeds. In comparison to students in school, whose mandatory attendance is not punishment for criminal misconduct but a method of insuring their education, the inmates of the Home were under substantially greater restraint and had a lesser expectation of privacy than do students. Applying this balancing approach, we conclude that Officer Watson's strip search of Reynolds was not unreasonable. . . .Even if our conclusion that the strip search did not violate the Fourth Amendment were to be rejected, we still would affirm the district court's summary judgment for Officer Watson dismissing the complaint. That is because we agree with the district court that Officer Watson had qualified immunity for conducting the search. . . . There has been no decision of the Supreme Court, this court or any courts within this circuit–or, as far as we know, of any other court–that has addressed the application of the Fourth Amendment to strip searches of juvenile delinquents in an institutional home in which they are confined. Moreover, as is shown by the analysis, in Part II above, of existing precedent that deals with the Fourth Amendment status of strip searches in other contexts, the question is close and difficult. It involves subtle legal distinctions and inferences that a reasonable police officer would not and could not be expected to make. In these circumstances, any mistake that Officer Watson may have made about her authority to conduct the strip searches was reasonable. It cannot be said that at that time it was clearly established that Reynolds had a constitutional right not to be so searched except pursuant to a valid search warrant.").

Rogers v. Gooding, No. 02-5891, 2003 WL 22905308, at * (6th Cir. Nov. 24, 2003) (unpublished) ("The Saucier holding is particularly instructive in this case. In holding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity in the Saucier case, the Court noted that the actions of the officers in dragging the protestor across a parking lot and violently shoving him into a van did not violate any clearly established principles. . . In that case, the officer was concerned that the protestor, who had unfurled a banner near a gate that was designed to separate the public from the speakers, was a threat to the Vice President. . . In this case, the facts and circumstances of the situation reveal that Gooding was faced with protecting the state legislators from the potential harm that could be caused by a large group of protestors, including Rogers. Rogers had gone into a restricted area and was actively led away from the area at 6:00 p.m. by Gooding, who told Rogers that the doors would not be open until 7:30 p.m. Rogers then returned to the area ten minutes later. Upon his return, Rogers placed himself in an area where Gooding could not miss his presence, thereby implicitly defying Gooding's authority. When Gooding told Rogers to clear himself from the area, Rogers openly defied him. Based on the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable officer in Gooding's position could have believed that pushing Rogers out of the hallway was necessary to protect the legislators. Furthermore, Rogers has not directed this court or the district court to any cases or other law to establish that Gooding violated any clearly established rights. Thus, the district court did not err in finding that Gooding was entitled to qualified immunity.").

Minchella v. Bauman, No. 02-1454, 2003 WL 21957034, at *5 (6th Cir. Aug. 13, 2003) (unpublished) ("There cannot be a finding that the arrest involved excessive force and a finding that the Officers' actions were reasonable. By definition, that which is excessive is unreasonable. See, e.g., Adams v. Metiva, 31 F.3d 375, 388 (6th Cir.1994) (stating that the use of excessive force is an objectively unreasonable action in light of clearly established law) . . . We agree with the district court's initial determination that there exists a genuine issue of material fact whether the Officers' actions were excessive. Under the totality of the circumstances and the factual disputes that exist, we find summary judgment inappropriate and believe it necessary to reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment and remand this case for trial.").

Smith v. Kim, No. 02-2102, 2003 WL 21698915, at *4 (6th Cir. July 23, 2003) (not published) ("We believe that the difference in the testimony of the officers' and that of Smith's witnesses as to Smith's behavior during the incident is material. At minimum, the difference in the evidence is germane to the ultimate question of the officers' objective reasonableness. The jury must be the arbiter of the credibility of the evidence. We refuse to make such a determination today. Because we find that material facts are in dispute in this case, we hold that we have no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. For that reason, we do not reach the question of the objective reasonableness of the officers' behavior . . . .").

Smith v. Kim, No. 02-2102, 2003 WL 21698915, at *6, *8 (6th Cir. July 23, 2003) (not published) (Krupansky, J., dissenting) ("[T]he Supreme Court recently rejected the Ninth Circuit's approach, indistinguishable from that adopted by the majority opinion in the instant case, of denying summary judgment any time a material issue of fact remained on an excessive force claim. . . . Even assuming, arguendo, that the alleged facts were enough to prove the officers' conduct excessive under objective standards of reasonableness, pursuant to Saucier, this would not end the analysis. . . The court must also conduct a second, qualified immunity review, separate from the reasonableness inquiry, in which it must determine the officer's perception of the alleged violated right. . . In contrast to the Graham constitutional violation analysis, which focuses on the reasonableness of the officials' actions, the qualified immunity analysis probes whether the officers' belief in the state of the law was reasonable.").

Greene v. Barber, 310 F.3d 889, 898, 899 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Mr. Greene's supposed crime was not severe; he was being arrested for creating a low-level disturbance in a public place. He was not threatening anyone's safety or attempting to evade arrest by flight. He does appear, however, to have been actively resisting arrest, and he does not contradict the officers' testimony that he refused to be handcuffed. On these facts, at least for purposes of analysis, we are prepared to concede that Lt. Barber's use of pepper spray might be found to have constituted excessive force under Graham. . . . Our conclusion as to Lt. Barber requires us to move on to the question whether the right to be free from the level of force used here was clearly established. . . In other words, we must decide whether it would have been clear to a reasonable police officer in Lt. Barber's position that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. . . We are satisfied that a reasonable officer in Barber's position would not necessarily have known that it might be unlawful for him to use pepper spray on a plaintiff who was actively resisting arrest. According to the Grand Rapids Police Department's Manual of Procedures, police officers are allowed to use oleoresin capsicum in one to two second bursts so long as they comply with the specifications of the 'Use of Force Continuum'–another departmental policy document. The Use of Force Continuum permits an officer to administer pepper spray to a person who is aggressively resisting arrest, either verbally or physically. It is undisputed that Mr. Greene was verbally resisting arrest in an aggressive manner. He has offered no evidence, moreover, to counter the officers' testimony that he was also resisting arrest physically. Given the fact that Lt. Barber was simply following established departmental procedures for dealing with non-cooperative arrestees, we do not think he should be deemed to have known that his conduct might be illegal. The district court thus acted properly in granting him qualified immunity on this score.").

Wilkey v. Argo, No. 01-5515, 2002 WL 1869440, at *5, *6 (6th Cir. Aug. 13, 2002) (unpublished) ("[W]e conclude that the record in the present case, when viewed in the light most favorable to Wilkey, would permit a jury to find that Argo used excessive force against Wilkey in violation of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard. The district court therefore erred in concluding as a matter of law that Argo's use of force was objectively reasonable. Our decision does not, however, prevent the district court from considering on remand whether Argo was entitled to qualified immunity, an affirmative defense that Argo raised as an alternative basis for summary judgment. . . . Despite the linguistic similarity between the 'objective reasonableness standard' for evaluating excessive force claims, on the one hand, and the 'reasonable officer' inquiry involved in the qualified immunity analysis, on the other, the two standards are not coterminous.").

Ewolski v. City of Brunswick, 287 F.3d 492, 505 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Even if genuine issues of material fact did exist as to whether a reasonable officer would have perceived an immediate threat to the Lekans, we would still find summary judgment to be appropriate on the basis of the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity test. As the above discussion indicates, we can find no controlling authority where a court has held similar conduct to be unconstitutional 'under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand.' [citing Saucier] . . . . [A] reasonable officer could not anticipate that a court might decide exigent circumstances were absent where the danger of suicide was compounded by an apparent threat to the suspect's family.

Therefore, summary judgment for the officers on the grounds of qualified immunity is appropriate regarding the warrantless entry claim.").

Lucijanic v. City of Columbus, No. 2:04-CV-751, 2006 WL 1000225, at *4 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 13, 2006) ("Here, plaintiff's version of what happened after he was handcuffed and placed in the police van differs from that of the officers. In conducting a qualified immunity analysis, this court must review the evidence in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, taking all inferences in his favor. . .The use of mace on an arrestee who is handcuffed may constitute the excessive use of force in violation of the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights. . . If the officers' version of the incident is accepted by a jury, the jurors could reasonably conclude that the use of mace was justified under the circumstances. . . However, if plaintiff's version is accepted, the jury could reasonably conclude that the force used was excessive. Since qualified immunity in this case depends on which version is accepted by the jury, genuine issues of fact preclude summary judgment on plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim against the officers.")

Dorsey v. Barber, No. 5:04-CV-2151, 2005 WL 2211176, at *22 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 9, 2005) ("[T]he Court finds that while the initial stop may have been reasonable for the purposes of qualified immunity, the fact that Officer Begin almost immediately forced the Plaintiffs to lie face down on the ground and then refused to talk to them about why he was stopping them not objectively reasonable given that Plaintiffs did not try to resist or flee. There is also a question of fact as to whether it was objectively unreasonable, given the circumstances for the Defendants to continue to detain Plaintiffs in that manner after Defendant Dawson arrived, whether this is considered a detention or a de facto arrest. The Court further finds that Plaintiffs have pointed to sufficient evidence to raise doubt as to whether Defendants' use of force was objectively reasonable. For example, Defendant Woodward, another officer who arrived on the scene, stated in his deposition that he saw no reason for need for Plaintiffs to lie on the ground. . . . While the exact nature of Defendants Begin and Dawson's conduct remains in doubt, drawing inferences in favor of the nonmoving parties, Plaintiffs Dorsey and Clark have alleged 'sufficient facts supported by sufficient evidence' showing Defendants acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. . .The Court thus denies Defendants claims of qualified immunity.").

Mechler v. Hodges, No. C-1-02-948, 2005 WL 1406102, at *13 (S.D. Ohio June 15, 2005) (" In the instant case, Mechler was being arrested for failing to comply with an administrative subpoena duces tecum concerning taxes allegedly owed to the City of Milford, a misdemeanor. There is no evidence that Mechler posed any threat to the safety of the arresting officers or others. In addition, there is no evidence that Mechler physically resisted the arrest or was uncooperative. The issue of fact in this matter was whether the handcuffs were applied too tightly and whether Hodges ignored Mechler's complaints that the handcuffs were painful. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mechler, the Court finds that no reasonable officer would find that the circumstances surrounding Mechler's arrest required the use of force that was used here in the application of the handcuffs. Defendant Hodges is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity under the circumstances of this case.").

Dye v. City of Warren, 367 F.Supp.2d 1175, 1186-89 (N.D. Ohio 2005) ("In instances of excessive force claims, this Court considers the facts and circumstances of each particular case, taking into account such nonexhaustive factors as enunciated in Saucier, including 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . The first part of the Saucier test requires the Court to determine whether Mr. Dye has properly alleged a constitutional deprivation when viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . Even assuming, arguendo, that the alleged facts were material to prove the Chief's conduct excessive under objective standards of reasonableness, pursuant to Saucier, this would not end the analysis. . . The court must also conduct a second, qualified immunity review, separate from the constitutional reasonableness inquiry, in which it must determine the officers' perceptions of the alleged violated right. . . In contrast to the Graham constitutional violation analysis, which focuses on the reasonableness of the officials' actions, the qualified immunity analysis probes whether the officers' belief in the state of the law was reasonable. . . . Thus, even if the officer unreasonably used force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, qualified immunity should be granted if the officer had a reasonable, albeit mistaken, belief about the legality of the officer's actions. . . Thus, under the controlling analysis enunciated in Saucier, if Chief Mandopoulos and the unnamed officers reasonably, but mistakenly, believed that Mr. Dye's behavior created an imminent safety hazard to himself or others, the officers would be justified in using more force than might in fact have been needed. . . The alleged facts, taken in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, certainly indicate the officers could reasonably believe that Mr. Dye's erratic behavior created an imminent danger. The Warren police were entitled to qualified immunity for arresting Mr. Dye for disorderly conduct when his admitted erratic behavior raised questions concerning whether Mr. Dye would harm himself or others. Under those circumstances, it cannot be said there was a clearly established rule that would prohibit using the force the officers exercised to secure Mr. Dye and his vehicle. The volatility of Mr. Dye's behavior was witnessed during the second traffic stop by an independent observer who substantiated Mr. Dye's seeming instability and loss of control. In addition, the contours and cause for Mr. Dye's behavior that day were admitted by Mr. Dye's counsel in state court proceedings where he acknowledged that Mr. Dye's failure to maintain his medication during the time of the incident spawned his erratic behavior and loss of self-control. Finally, as the hospital records indicate, the sole physical consequence to Mr. Dye was an abrasion and contusion of the right wrist caused by Mr. Dye's admitted struggle against the handcuffs. Consequently, the officers could have reasonably been concerned for their safety, Mr. Dye's safety, and the safety of others in the plaintiff's vicinity, forcing the officers to make a difficult, split-second decision regarding the amount of force required to detain Mr. Dye.").

Leisure v. City of Cincinnati, 267 F. Supp.2d 848, 853, 855 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("The Court finds that the facts in this situation, taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, militate against a grant of qualified immunity to Defendant Roach. The first step of the qualified immunity analysis is met here because Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint adequately alleges that Thomas' Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force was violated. . . . The Court finds that Plaintiff's allegations viewed under Garner, taken as true as required by the law at this stage of the proceedings, establish the basis for a constitutional violation. In the case at hand, Thomas was also a unarmed youth fleeing in the dark of night. Though Defendant Roach definitely had probable cause to arrest or stop Thomas based upon his flight, it is not so clear that Roach had a reasonable belief that Thomas was armed or dangerous. Defendant Roach argues that the flight was at night through the neighborhood with the highest crime in the city. However, in the same way that it was not enough in Garner that the events took place in the dark of night, darkness is also not enough in this case to warrant the use of deadly force. The Court likewise finds that the surroundings of a high-crime neighborhood is not enough of a reason to conclude, without more, that a fleeing suspect is armed and dangerous. Finally, Roach's knowledge that Thomas had a number of outstanding warrants, with nothing more, did not necessarily support the conclusion that Thomas was dangerous, as the facts ultimately demonstrated. . . .The dispositive question at the second step of the qualified immunity analysis is whether it was reasonable under the circumstances alleged for Officer Roach to pursue Thomas with his gun out and his finger on the trigger. . . . [T]he Court finds that a reasonable officer would be acutely aware of the constitutional principles surrounding the use of deadly force. If an officer lacks probable cause that a fleeing perpetrator presents a threat to the officer or to others, the use of deadly force to stop the perpetrator violates the Constitution. Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985). There is no doubt that this constitutional violation was clearly established in April of 2001.").

Wingrove v. Forshey, 230 F. Supp.2d 808, 823 (S.D. Ohio 2002) ("The Court finds that the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. First, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the facts establish that the Defendants violated Delbert Bonar's right to be free from excessive force because the officers had no reasonable basis for believing that he posed an immediate threat at the time that they shot him. Second, the right to be free from excessive force was clearly established at the time of this incident. . . Third, the Defendants acted unreasonably in light of this clearly established right. Specifically, it was unreasonable for the Defendants to mistake either the water bottle or the phone for a gun. The room in which they were executing the warrant was small and well-lit. As such, it should have been fairly easy for the officers to discern precisely what Delbert was holding in his hand. Significantly, neither a water bottle nor a phone resembles a gun or a rifle in a manner that would make it reasonable for those items to be confused. Accordingly, viewed in that light, the Defendants could not have made a reasonable mistake of fact that would have justified their actions in light of the Plaintiffs' clearly established rights.").

Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F. Supp.2d 875, 883 (N.D. Ohio 2002) ("[R]egardless of whether the officer believed that he thought he was going to be struck, Plaintiffs have not presented relevant, controlling authority from this jurisdiction, or a consensus from other jurisdictions, regarding the constitutionality of neckholds. . . . [T]he various studies presented by Plaintiffs do not establish that as of 1998, either the Supreme Court or any other court had ruled so as to clearly establish the unlawfulness of Leitter's actions. The studies, while interesting, and perhaps more relevant to Plaintiff's failure to train claim, do not adequately establish that as of 1998; there existed clear legal authority as to the neck hold issue.").

Jones v. Marcum, 197 F.Supp.2d 991, 999-1003 (S.D. Ohio 2002) ("The Kettering Defendants do not argue that there are no facts giving rise to a genuine issue of material fact as to the reasonableness of the conduct of Officers Wabler and Marcum, such that a jury could not find them liable for violating the strictures of the Fourth Amendment; they argue only that when viewed in light of the law surrounding use of excessive force, the officers' actions could have been understood by them at the time of the incident in question as being reasonable. As such, they argue they are entitled to immunity from suit. . . . Saucier reaffirmed a principle previously announced in Anderson, . . . to wit, even if it is conceded that a genuine issue of material fact exists on the question of whether officers used excessive force, the law may not be so well established as to that particular set of facts to enable a court to conclude that in all instances, a reasonable officer would necessarily recognize that her conduct is unreasonable, and thus impermissible and unconstitutional. . . . . Although Saucier is consistent with its prior rulings, such as Anderson and Hunter, what is perhaps confusing about the logic employed therein is that the Court expressly stated that the paradigm of reasonableness that the Court is to use in its qualified immunity analysis, the Fourth Amendment, is the same as that to be used by the jury. . . In effect, what the Court has announced is that, before sending a Fourth Amendment question of disputed fact to the jury in a § 1983 case, it must pre-evaluate the reasonableness question by paying close attention to all of the facts, and even the potential subjective considerations that could have been going through the mind of the defendant officer at the time, and decide whether there is any doubt as to the question of reasonableness. If the plaintiff does not submit, and/or the court cannot find, authority putting beyond doubt the question of whether a reasonable officer should have known that he was violating the § 1983 plaintiff's rights by using excessive force, such that it is clearly settled, the Court must allow qualified immunity to attach. This doctrine has the effect of taking some jury questions away from the jury, but that is precisely why qualified immunity is a principle of law, not fact. . . . Saucier stands for the proposition that, even assuming that the plaintiff's version of the facts is correct, if it cannot be firmly concluded, after conducting a detailed evaluation of the defendant's conduct in light of those facts, such as Justice Kennedy did in writing for the Court in Saucier, that the law is clearly established as to what is reasonable under those specific circumstances, such that the officer should have known that the § 1983 plaintiff had a clearly established right not to be subjected to that conduct, then qualified immunity must attach; the case should not go to the jury. By contrast, the case should go to the jury, and Brandenburg should apply, where the Court can firmly conclude, again assuming that the plaintiff's version of the facts is true, that the law is clearly established under those facts, such that the officer should have known that the § 1983 plaintiff had a clearly established right not to be subjected to that conduct. It is then up to the jury to determine just what that conduct was in the final analysis. . . . [M]erely citing to Saucier, indeed, the mere existence of Saucier in the corpus of qualified immunity case law, is not itself a reason for the Court to recognize the applicability of the qualified immunity doctrine in a given case. Saucier does not hold that police will always be immune from § 1983 liability. Had the Supreme Court intended that to be the case, it certainly would have said so. Thus, at some point, even the Saucier Court would have to recognize that police can be held liable under § 1983."). See also Hummel v. City of Carlisle, 229 F. Supp.2d 839, 851-56 (S.D. Ohio 2002) (same).

Daniels v. City of Columbus, No. C2-00-562, 2002 WL 484622, at *9, *10 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 20, 2002) (not reported) ("If the Court finds that the right allegedly violated was clearly established, the Court must then determine whether a reasonable officer in Officer Wingard's position should have known that his conduct violated that right. Normally, these are questions of law. There are, however, exceptions. In Saucier, the Supreme Court cautioned that the question of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity cannot be fused with the question of whether excessive force was used. . . To submit both questions to a jury simply because the questions of objective reasonableness are intertwined defeats the purpose of qualified immunity. Nevertheless . . . . [w]here the exact character of the defendant's actions are in dispute, a jury must determine 'the credibility of the defendant's account of the need for force.' . . . .[W]hen the true nature of the defendant's actions turns on the parties' credibility, summary judgment is inappropriate. The Court acknowledges that there may be cases where the allegations are so frivolous and factual discrepancies so slight that no genuine issues of material fact exist. This, however, is not one of those cases. Whatever transpired during the investigatory stop, the end result was that Ms. Daniels suffered a serious shoulder injury.").

Leong v. City of Detroit, 151 F. Supp.2d 858, 864 & n.5 (E.D. Mich. 2001) ("Plaintiff argues that 'summary judgment is inappropriate where there are contentious factual disputes over the reasonableness of the use of deadly force.' [citing Sova] . . . . In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Saucier, this is not strictly true in all cases. Even if it were concluded, upon resolving all such factual disputes in the plaintiff's favor, that an officer's use of deadly force was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, the officer still would be entitled to qualified immunity if, under the present state of the law, a reasonable officer could have concluded–albeit mistakenly– that deadly force was authorized under the circumstances.").

Garvin v. Wheeler, 304 F.3d 628, 633 (7th Cir. 2002) ("In this instance, defendant Wheeler claims that Saucier . . . worked a fundamental change in the law of qualified immunity that should allow him to reopen his motion for summary judgment. But defendant Wheeler overstates the import of Saucier. Saucier was not a hallmark reformulation of the qualified immunity analysis. Instead, Saucier stressed that a trial court must engage in the two-part qualified immunity analysis (asking first whether a constitutional right was violated and second whether that right was clearly established) before it engages in other analysis. . . Judge Dillin did just that when he expressly noted that Garner governed an officer's use of deadly force and that if Wheeler's version of events were believable, then in that instance he would be entitled to qualified immunity. Judge Dillin, however, found that Officer Wheeler's version of events was less than credible and therefore that the plaintiffs had established that a reasonable officer could not have believed his action (fatally shooting an unarmed suspect) to be reasonable. Thus, Judge Dillin did engage in the two-part qualified immunity test required by Saucier.").

Marshall v. Teske, 284 F.3d 765, 772 (7th Cir. 2002) ("Saucier held that even in cases in which the question of qualified immunity is factually intertwined with the question of whether officers violated the Fourth Amendment (in that case, by using excessive force), judges must still make an immunity determination separate from the jury's finding on whether the officers violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Saucier established a two-part qualified immunity inquiry. First, the court must ask whether, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the facts alleged show that the officers' conduct violated a constitutional right. . . If the facts alleged make out a constitutional violation, the court must then ask whether the right was clearly established. As we have discussed, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Marshall, the officers violated his right not to be arrested without probable cause. The next step is determining whether Marshall's right not to be arrested under these circumstances was clearly established. The probable cause standard–requiring that an officer's knowledge of the facts be sufficient to warrant a prudent person in believing that the suspect had committed or was committing a crime–was clearly established at the time of this incident. . . Here, the facts and circumstances within the officers' knowledge were not sufficient to warrant a prudent officer to believe that Marshall had committed or was committing a crime. With regard to the drug lookout theory, the officers found no evidence on Marshall's person that identified him as a drug lookout. Nor did Teske find any weapons, drugs, or other evidence of a crime when he retraced Marshall's steps back to the point at which the chase began. Therefore, probable cause did not exist to arrest Marshall for being a drug lookout. Likewise, the officers lacked probable cause to arrest Marshall for knowingly resisting or obstructing their activities. The plain language of both the state statute and the city ordinance covering resistance and obstruction prohibit only knowing resistance or obstruction. Because the officers did not sufficiently identify themselves, a prudent person in their position would not have cause to believe that Marshall was knowingly resisting or obstructing.").

McNair v. Coffey, 279 F.3d 463, 464-68 (7th Cir. 2002) (on remand from Supreme Court after Saucier) ("Our initial decision in this case followed Frazell and concluded that a jury verdict in plaintiffs' favor on their claim that defendant used excessive force in arresting them precluded any possibility of qualified immunity for the arresting officer. . . . Plaintiffs contend that we should maintain our position despite [Saucier], but we conclude that it requires a change in outcome as well as analysis. . . . According to Saucier, the first question whenever a public official asserts qualified immunity must be whether that official violated the Constitution at all. . . The Court assumed, when writing Saucier, that this decision would be made before trial; it did not inquire what happens if the official concedes that his conduct was unconstitutional (as Coffey did, by not contesting the jury's verdict) and contends only that the right was not clearly established 'in light of the specific context of the case'. . . It is hard to see how these can be separated when the defendant's concession influences the inquiry. For the underlying constitutional question, made context-specific, must be something like: 'Does an excessive show of force, as opposed to an excessive use of force, violate the fourth amendment when undertaken in a dangerous neighborhood after a suspect fails to surrender on demand?' Then the immunity question would be whether an affirmative answer to this question is 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . It is hard to answer the latter question about a reasonable public official's understanding if the former question has been framed poorly, answered incorrectly, or, in this appeal, not posed in the first place. Yet Saucier insists that it be posed and answered. . . . Viewing matters through the objective reasonableness standard, we conclude that, even taking the record in the light most favorable to the McNairs, a jury could not properly have found that Officer Coffey personally behaved unreasonably. . . . Plaintiffs have not cited even one post-Graham decision holding that an excessive number of squad cars or drawn guns can violate the fourth amendment by giving fright or offense, if the seizure is supported by probable cause and otherwise reasonable. At least two–one from this circuit–hold that a simple display of force along these lines does not violate the fourth amendment. See Sharrar v. Fesling, 128 F.3d 810 (3d Cir.1997); Wilkins v. May, 872 F.2d 190 (7th Cir.1989). . . . Although we do not foreclose the possibility that the circumstances of an arrest could become "unreasonable" without the application of physical force, nothing in the circumstances of this case approaches that line, so it is unnecessary to determine where it may be located. It is enough to say that a reasonable officer in Coffey's position would not have understood that what he was doing violated the McNairs' rights under the fourth amendment and therefore cannot be required to pay damages. The district court reached this conclusion also, and its judgment is affirmed.").

McNair v. Coffey, 279 F.3d 463, 471, 475 (7th Cir. 2002) (on remand from Supreme Court after Saucier) (Coffey, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority's decision only insofar that the jury's verdict must be set aside. However, I believe, unlike the majority, that the Supreme Court has made it clear in their remand and directed us to undertake a thorough review of the record. Upon review, I would dismiss this case on the basis that the McNairs failed to establish that Officer Coffey's conduct violated their constitutional rights, despite the jury verdict to the contrary. I am convinced, as a matter of law, that the McNairs failed to produce sufficient evidence to warrant submitting their Fourth Amendment claims to the jury in the first instance. . . . [I]t is a non-sequitur for us at the late stage of this litigation to cloak our decision in the language of immunity. When considering Coffey's post-verdict motion, I am convinced that we should use the same legal analysis as other cases, with the initial inquiry being whether there were sufficient facts to support the verdict rendered, in light of the applicable law. I agree that if the facts substantiated the view that Coffey violated the Constitution, then the proper recourse would be through the doctrine of immunity. But because his actions were reasonable in the first instance, he is entitled to a ruling that affirmatively characterizes his conduct as lawful and prudent, without any discussion of a defense that implies the existence of a valid antecedent claim against him. . . Based on the law of the land and my review of the evidence adduced at trial, I agree with the law enforcement officer that this case should never have gone to trial and, furthermore, should never have been submitted to the jury.").

King v. City of Indianapolis, 969 F.Supp.2d 1085, 1092 (S.D. Ind. 2013) ("The Court must consider the particularities and context of the right at issue in this case. Although the facts of this case are similar to Glik, that case was decided months after the incident with Mr. King. Moreover, the additional facts present here, a person resisting arrest and tense crowd, distinguish the facts from Smith and Glik. The Court agrees with Mr. King that First Amendment interests are foundational and strong. However, the contours of the right in these circumstances had not been settled as of February 2011 by the Seventh Circuit. Although not dispositive, the circuit split is somewhat indicative of the uncertainty in this area of law, and also of the importance of the factual circumstances in each case. . . Moreover, Smith recognized that the right to video record police would be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. The Court cannot say with certainty that it was clearly established in February 2011 that Mr. King's actions during a tense active arrest situation with crowd control concerns would not be viewed as subject to some reasonable restrictions. Therefore, Mr. King's right was not clearly established and Defendant Officers are granted qualified immunity on this claim.")

Buchanan v. City of Milwaukee, 290 F.Supp.2d 954, 963 (E.D. Wis. 2003) ("If the facts are as plaintiff describes them, Sullivan is not entitled to qualified immunity. Sullivan employed deadly force on a suspect who threatened no one but himself. As an objective matter, on February 21, 2000, a reasonable police officer would have known that it was unreasonable to use deadly force against a person who did not pose a threat of death or serious bodily harm. If the facts are as Sullivan claims, the result could be different. . . The Seventh Circuit has consistently held that if further factual development is necessary to determine whether the officer is entitled to qualified immunity the court may deny the officer's pre-trial motion. . . Because I cannot decide on summary judgment whose version of the facts is correct, I cannot determine as a matter of law whether Sullivan is entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, defendant's motion for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity must be denied.")

Brown v. City of Milwaukee, 288 F.Supp.2d 962, 974, 975, 979 (E.D. Wis. 2003) ("I must determine whether, in January of 1998, it would have been apparent to a reasonable police officer: (1) that he could not conduct a Terry stop based on a report that a woman driving a van on particular street had a gun, and (2) that he could not employ the highly intrusive tactics used to effectuate the seizure here. Taking the facts in a light most favorable to plaintiff, I conclude that while Garcia is entitled to qualified immunity from liability for the initial stop, he is not entitled to immunity from liability for the manner in which it was carried out. [footnote omitted] It has been well established since 1968 that in order to justify a Terry stop the activity of which the detainee is suspected must actually be criminal. . . As discussed, the mere possession of a gun, without more, is not a crime. However, I cannot conclude that the state of the law in 1998 was so clear that only a 'plainly incompetent' [footnote omitted] officer would have conducted a Terry stop. . . .[A]t the time Garcia conducted the Terry stop of plaintiff, his decision had some support in circuit precedent. Therefore, I find that he has qualified immunity from liability regarding the initial stop. However, Garcia is not immune from liability based on the manner in which plaintiff was seized. Garcia and the other officers surrounded plaintiff, shined lights at her to prevent her from seeing, pointed weapons at her, cocked them and bombarded her with profanity-laced threats to shoot, based only on an anonymous tip that she had a gun. This conduct, if proven, would constitute a violation of plaintiff's clearly established rights. . . . Further, as an objective matter, the force allegedly used here was so plainly excessive that Garcia would have been on notice that he was violating the Fourth Amendment. . . . Construing the facts in plaintiff's favor, there is nothing to suggest that Garcia was justified in using force sufficient to cause the injury alleged: a reasonable officer would know that he should not twist the arm of a non-combative, fifty-five year old woman with force sufficient to tear a ligament and cause permanent injury.").

Threlkeld v. White Castle Systems,Inc., 201 F. Supp.2d 834, 841, 842 (N.D. Ill. 2002) ("Although the Seventh Circuit has not specifically addressed the viability of an excessive force claim for tight handcuffing, other circuit courts have recognized such a claim. [citing cases] A reasonable jury could conclude here that the Officers placed the handcuffs tighter than was reasonably necessary under the circumstances, and that their indifference to Ms. Threlkeld's complaints led to long-term injuries to her wrists. The Officers argue that, even if Ms. Threlkeld can make out a claim for excessive force, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .It is Ms. Threlkeld's burden to show that the right not to be handcuffed so tight that it causes lasting injury was clearly established at the time of her arrest, and she may do so by (1) pointing to a closely analogous case that established the right to be free from the type of force the police officers used on [her], or (2) showing that the force was so plainly excessive that, as an objective matter, the police officers would have been on notice that they were violating the Fourth Amendment. . . . Ms. Threlkeld points to no closely analogous case, but I must use my full knowledge of relevant precedents. Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516 (1994). My own research uncovered no cases from this circuit or the Supreme Court that are on all fours with the facts of Ms. Threlkeld's claim, and the cases from the Ninth and Sixth Circuits involved more egregious conduct by the police officers than is evident from the record here. The question is thus whether the Officers should have known, objectively, that they were putting the handcuffs on Ms. Threlkeld so tightly that they would cut into her skin and cause permanent damage . . . . However, too little is known, on this record, about the type of training that the Officers receive in handcuffing, and about the specific circumstances of the handcuffing, to conclude that the Officers' behavior was reasonable as a matter of law in light of the minimal degree of harm and risk of flight presented by Ms. Threlkeld at the time. . . Where '[k]ey facts [and circumstances] are unknown and disputed,' denial of summary judgment on the question of qualified immunity is proper.").

Estate of Thurman v. City of Milwaukee, 197 F. Supp.2d 1141, 1151 (E.D.Wis. 2002) ("In the present case the question of whether Miller was on notice that his conduct was unreasonable depends on the resolution of factual issues that are presently disputed. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Miller is not entitled to qualified immunity. As an objective matter, on August 3, 1996, a reasonable police officer would have known that it was unreasonable to precipitate a physical confrontation with a nonviolent and unarmed offender without calling for backup, without identifying himself as an officer, and with the intent to physically harm the offender. Qualified immunity is not designed to shield from civil liability the plainly incompetent. . . If Miller committed the acts alleged by plaintiffs his conduct may well fall into this category. Thus, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is inappropriate.").

Campbell v. Brizendine, No. IP 00-1443-C-B/S, 2001 WL 1399517, at *5 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 7, 2001)(not reported) ("Although the Seventh Circuit has noted that the Fourth Amendment protection against excessive force has long been clearly established, . . . Plaintiff has not offered evidence that Defendant should have been on notice that his conduct constituted excessive force, either by virtue of a closely analogous case or by the egregious nature of his actions.").

Palma v. Edwards, No. 99 C 4896, 2001 WL 1104716, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 19, 2001)(not reported) ("This Court has held that summary judgment based on qualified immunity is not proper when the question of immunity turns on issues of disputed fact. . . The Defendant argues that a recent Supreme Court ruling holding that even when there is a question of fact, summary judgment may still be granted on qualified immunity grounds if the officer's mistake as to the facts or law which caused the violation was reasonable. [citing Saucier] However, this case is distinguishable from the present case given that the respondent did not suffer any injury whereas in this case, Mr. Palma is deceased as a result of the shooting. . . It has been established that the extent of the injury inflicted is one of the factors considered in determining when the use of excessive force may give rise to a claim under Section 1983. . . Even without distinguishing Saucier, it has been illustrated that Officer Edwards' belief was not reasonable viewing the facts in a light most favorable to the Plaintiff.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Webster v. Westlake, 41 F.4th 1004, 1013 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Because the detectives did not have arguable probable cause to arrest Webster for interference with official acts, and they likewise didn't have arguable or actual probable cause to arrest her for another offense, her Fourth Amendment right to be free from warrantless arrests under these circumstances was clearly established on October 16, 2018. And because the detectives subjected Webster to a warrantless arrest that was unsupported by probable cause, they violated her clearly established rights. The detectives are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brown v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 40 F.4th 895, 901-03 (8th Cir. 2022) [W]e have assigned consideration of actual probable cause to our constitutional violation prong analysis while reserving any consideration of arguable probable cause for our clearly established prong analysis. . . . [T]he Supreme Court has also treated the doctrines of actual probable cause and arguable probable cause as pertaining to the qualified immunity analysis this way, finding that the law was not clearly established and the defendant-officers were entitled to qualified immunity where those officers 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.'. . In sum, 'even if an officer arrests an individual without actual probable cause—in violation of the Constitution—he has not violated that individual's "clearly established" rights for qualified immunity purposes if he nevertheless had arguable probable cause to make the arrest.'. . . [W]e find that Officers Boettigheimer and Korte had arguable probable cause to arrest and then initiate prosecution against

Brown, meaning that it was not clearly established that doing so would violate Brown's right to be free from unlawful seizure, malicious prosecution, or First Amendment retaliation. Thus, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officers Boettigheimer and Korte.")

White v. Jackson, 865 F.3d 1064, 1080-81 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Defendants argue that we should affirm the grant of qualified immunity because Matthews is unable to identify the defendants who performed these acts. Defendants are correct that '§ 1983 liability is personal.'. . To prevail on a § 1983 claim, a plaintiff must show each individual defendant's personal involvement in the alleged violation. . . That does not mean however that a § 1983 excessive force plaintiff must be able to personally identify his assailants to avoid summary judgment. . . Testimony of the officers on the scene, including that of Vinson and Bates, confirms that Vinson and Bates physically removed Matthews from the culvert. Patterson confirmed that he deployed pepper spray. Payne testified that he observed the arrest and yelled at Matthews to stop resisting. When Matthews was handcuffed, he sat up and leaned against Payne's leg. Payne helped Matthews up and brought him to the paramedics. This is sufficient evidence to identify Vinson, Bates, Patterson, and Payne as officers who personally participated in Matthews's arrest. While the officers and Matthews vehemently disagree about whether Matthews was resisting and the extent and reasonableness of the force applied, these fact disputes cannot be resolved on summary judgment. Therefore, the district court erred in granting these defendants qualified immunity.")

Ulrich v. Pope County, 715 F.3d 1054, 1059 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The probable cause standard inherently allows room for reasonable mistakes by a reasonable person, but the qualified immunity standard affords law enforcement officials an even wider berth for mistaken judgments 'by protecting all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . We recognize this accommodation for reasonable error is necessary 'because officials should not err always on the side of caution because they fear being sued.'. .Notwithstanding the distinction between the two legal concepts, an analysis of arguable probable cause necessarily includes consideration of probable cause. In analyzing whether arguable probable cause exists in this case, we must determine whether Mitchell and Thesing's arrest of Ulrich was based on an objectively reasonable—even if mistaken—belief that the arrest was based in probable cause. . . . Drawing inferences in favor of Ulrich, while viewing the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer, we conclude that the district court did not err in finding that Mitchell and Thesing were entitled to qualified immunity on Ulrich's Fourth Amendment claim")

Parks v. Pomeroy, 387 F.3d 949, 955-57 (8th Cir. 2004) ("In the present case, the issue of whether Pomeroy used objectively unreasonable force when he fatally shot Parks is a question of fact. . . .Accordingly, we lack interlocutory appellate jurisdiction to review the district court's conclusion that plaintiff may be able to prove as a matter of fact that Pomeroy's use of force was not objectively reasonable. . . . Therefore, when the facts are taken in the light most favorable to plaintiff for purposes of the 'initial inquiry' under Saucier v. Katz, . . . we must assume that the amount of force used by Pomeroy was unreasonable. . . . However, our inquiry does not end there. . . . we now ask–not whether plaintiff may be able to establish a constitutional violation–but, rather, whether she may be able to establish a violation of a constitutional right of which the contours were so defined at the time of the shooting that a reasonable officer in Pomeroy's position would have understood that what he was doing violated the law. . . .Stated differently, Pomeroy is entitled to qualified immunity even if he wrongly, but reasonably, believed his actions were lawful. . . . In the present case, even if we assume that Pomeroy could see Parks's left hand on the floor at the moment of the shooting, it cannot be disputed that Gottstein's gun was nevertheless just inches from Parks's hand. As in Nelson, the physical struggle between Parks and Gottstein was hostile and intense, the circumstances were extremely volatile and potentially deadly, and the events were evolving rapidly. Therefore, notwithstanding plaintiff's citation of arguably contrary Fourth Amendment cases, we hold, upon de novo review, that–given the state of the law at the time and the particular facts of this case–Pomeroy did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.").

Parks v. Pomeroy, 387 F.3d 949, 959 (8th Cir. 2004) (Colloton, J., concurring in the judgment) ("For essentially the reasons discussed by the court in its immunity analysis, . . . I conclude that the evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Mr. Parks, does not establish that this tragic situation involved a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Even assuming that Pomeroy could see Parks's left hand on the floor at the moment of the shooting, the undisputed facts remain that Pomeroy heard Officer Gottstein yell that he thought Parks was reaching for Gottstein's gun earlier in the encounter, the gun remained within reach of Parks during the ongoing struggle with Gottstein, and Parks refused to acquiesce in commands that he cease what the court rightly describes as a 'hostile and intense' struggle. Given these 'extremely volatile and potentially deadly' circumstances, . . . the evidence taken in the light most favorable to Parks does not support a conclusion that Pomeroy's use of force was objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, I concur in the judgment.").

Wilson v. City of Des Moines, 293 F.3d 447, 449 (8th Cir. 2002) ("We affirm the decision of the District Court [denying qualified immunity.] We do so primarily because differences in the two officers' testimony about what happened during the crucial last moments of their encounter with Mr. Mozee raise a genuine issue of material fact about the reasonableness of what the officers did. . . . Because of the internal discrepancies and variations in the officers' testimony, among other things, there remain factual issues in dispute that prohibit a grant of summary judgment. The current record does not conclusively establish the reasonableness of the officers' actions or beliefs.").

Sinclair v. City of Des Moines, 268 F.3d 594, 596 (8th Cir. 2001) (per curiam) ("The district court properly granted summary judgment to the officers after considering the qualified immunity question: Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? See Saucier v. Katz, 121 S.Ct. 2151, 2156 (2001) (holding that in excessive force cases, the question of qualified immunity must be the initial inquiry and, in resolving this question, the district court must specifically consider the facts alleged). Here the district court properly concluded that no constitutional or statutory right exists that would prohibit a police officer from using deadly force when faced with an apparently loaded weapon.").

Johnston v. Dek , No. 8:00CV324, 2002 WL 803368, at *3, *4 (D. Neb. Jan. 25, 2002) (not reported) ("The Saucier two-step analysis for qualified immunity claims does not assist in the resolution of this particular claim, because there are material facts remaining in dispute that must be decided by the trier of fact. Despite the Supreme Court's enthusiasm for ruling on the issue of qualified immunity early in the proceedings, . . . the Plaintiff's submission in opposition to the Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment makes that impossible. Like the circumstances contemplated in Justice Ginsburg's concurring opinion in Saucier, this case 'turns on which of two conflicting stories best captures what happened on the street.' . . . At that crucial moment when Dek decided to shoot Johnston, the parties' sworn statements of what happened are diametrically opposed. Johnston states that he had stopped; his empty hands were in the air; and then Dek shot him. Dek and a witness state that Johnston never stopped his flight from Dek even after being ordered to stop; Johnston held a gun in his right hand; the gun was pointed in Dek's general direction; and the gun remained in Johnston's hand until Dek shot Johnston. These disputed facts are material facts because they are outcome-determinative. Moreover, the issues relating to the material facts are genuine. This Court cannot say that no reasonable jury could return a verdict in favor of Johnston.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Brooks v. Clark Cty., 828 F.3d 910, 920-22 (9th Cir. 2016) ("[A]ssuming the allegations Brooks has made are true, was it 'beyond debate,' at the time Keener seized him, that the amount of force Keener employed violated the Constitution? If the answer is no—if Keener's actions did not clearly violate Brooks's rights under the Fourth Amendment—then Keener is entitled to qualified immunity, and his motion to dismiss must be granted. . . . Given the standard governing excessive force claims, the allegations in Brooks's complaint are not sufficient to survive a qualified immunity defense even at the motion to dismiss stage. Assuming all of Brooks's allegations are true, it still cannot be said that Keener's use of force was indisputably unconstitutional. That is, a reasonable marshal could have believed that the Fourth Amendment permitted him to use the amount of force Brooks claims Keener employed, even if the circumstances were exactly as Brooks describes. For that reason alone, Keener is entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court should have granted his motion to dismiss. . . . The district court concluded otherwise, but its analysis betrays a fundamental misunderstanding about how to assess a qualified immunity defense to an excessive force claim. In denying Keener's motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity, the district court reasoned that 'Keener's conduct could be inferred to have violated objective standards of reasonableness regarding the removal of Mr. Brooks from the courtroom.' Brooks takes the same tack, arguing simply that 'the well-pled allegations ... set forth that Keener's actions were not objectively reasonable.' Those propositions may be true, but they are not enough to defeat Keener's qualified immunity defense. The district court and Brooks's analysis says only that, on the merits, Keener's conduct may have violated the Fourth Amendment. But, crucially, they both have failed to consider the distinct question discussed above: whether, based on the allegations in the complaint, Keener's conduct could be inferred to have violated a 'clearly established' right. The answer is no, because as we have explained, the allegations in the complaint do not plausibly place the illegality of Keener's conduct 'beyond debate.' In other words, the district court here committed the same error the Supreme Court corrected in Saucier v. Katz: equating the excessive force question on the merits (did Keener employ an objectively unreasonable amount of force?) with the qualified immunity question (did existing law remove any doubt that such force was objectively unreasonable?). The two questions are not the same. . . . The Court has made clear that to defeat qualified immunity, Brooks must not only allege that Keener used an unreasonable amount of force, but also that no reasonable officer could disagree that Keener used an unreasonable amount of force. . . . As we have already discussed, Brooks's allegations do not suffice to overcome Keener's qualified immunity defense. The complaint should have been dismissed on those grounds.")

Menotti v. City of Seattle, 409 F.3d 1113, 1154 (9th Cir. 2005) ("The question before us then becomes whether a reasonable officer in Smith's position would have understood that he could not lawfully seize Skove's sign absent an arrest of Skove or exigent circumstances. We have rejected the position that a seizure could be made based on probable cause to arrest, when the arrest was not completed. Moreover, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Skove, we cannot say that the circumstances were indisputably exigent at the time and place Officer Smith confronted Skove and seized his sign. Because the exceptions to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement have been categorically defined, and because 'in the ordinary case, seizures of personal property are unreasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment ... unless ... accomplished pursuant to a judicial warrant issued by a neutral and detached magistrate after finding probable cause,'. . . we hold that a reasonable officer in Smith's position would have understood that his warrantless seizure of Skove's sign without an arrest and without exigency offended the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment.").

Carter v. Denison, No. 03-16509, 2004 WL 1895018, at *1 (9th Cir. Aug. 24, 2004) (not published) ("In determining that genuine issues of fact precluded summary judgment on the police officers' qualified immunity claim, the district court improperly collapsed the reasonableness element of the qualified immunity analysis with the reasonableness element of the excessive force analysis. The two issues are separate; the district court may not simply stop with a determination that a triable issue of fact exists on an element of the plaintiff's case, but must assume those facts are true and examine the legal issue of qualified immunity. . . . The officers were confronted with a nearly naked, clearly delusional person, wielding first a knife and then a rock, and who continuously flailed her arms and legs to resist being subdued. The officers' use of oleoresin capsicum spray, and their need to physically hold Parker down while she was being handcuffed and ankle cuffed, does not establish a Fourth-Amendment violation. The summary judgment record is clear that force was used only while Parker actively resisted, and used only while she posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers. . . . In addition, a reasonable police officer confronting a nearly naked, delirious, and armed suspect, would reasonably believe that using force to subdue the individual and prevent injury to themselves and the public was justified. A reasonable officer would have reasonably believed that using oleoresin capsicum and pinning the suspect down while her hands and legs were being immobilized was lawful.").

Beier v. City of Lewiston, 354 F.3d 1058, 1071, 1072 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Finally, the officers argue that their arrest of Beier was reasonable given the lack of case law clearly establishing the distinction between prohibitions on 'visitation' and 'contact.' The relevant question at this stage of the qualified immunity analysis, however, is whether a reasonable officer could have believed Beier's arrest was supported by probable cause, 'in light of clearly established law and the information the [arresting] officers possessed.'. . [The officers] did not know the terms of the protection order, because they made no attempt to learn them. The officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on the basis of a mistaken interpretation of the order, even a reasonable one, that they did not actually make. To shift the focus of the inquiry, as the officers would have us do, away from their actual actions to hypothetical decisions they would have faced had they behaved reasonably cannot be reconciled with the policy precepts underlying the qualified immunity doctrine. The qualified immunity doctrine rests on a balance between, on the one hand, society's interest in promoting public officials' observance of citizens' constitutional rights and, on the other, society's interest in assuring that public officials carry out their duties and thereby advance the public good. Without some room to make mistaken but reasonable decisions, the fear of making an unforeseeable error and thereby incurring liability could dissuade public officials from pursuing their duties with vigor. Police officers charged with protecting public safety, for example, could become bystanders rather than law enforcers whenever faced with any but the most clear circumstances implicating constitutional rights. . . Under the incentive structure thus embodied in the qualified immunity doctrine, it is of no moment that the officers might have reached the same outcome had they read the protection order. The officers' error in arresting Beier without learning the terms of the protection order was, for the reasons already surveyed, not one a reasonably competent officer should make. Assuming that it would have been reasonable for an officer who did read or otherwise learn the terms of the protection order to conclude that it had been violated, which we doubt, no officer faced with that down-the-line decision would be dissuaded from acting in accord with his or her reasonable understanding of the document because officers who did not read the document at all were liable in damages for failing to do so. Conversely, knowing they will be liable if they do not take the trouble to ascertain the terms of a protection order, officers will be encouraged to do so; while some may read such orders erroneously but reasonably, most, presumably, will interpret the terms properly, with the result that citizens' constitutional rights will be protected. To accord qualified immunity here because the officers in this case or other officers might have made a different, reasonable mistake with the same outcome would be to encourage police officers to arrest citizens without ascertaining the applicable legal prohibitions, thereby compromising the protection of the constitutional rights of citizens, with no countervailing benefit in advancing the public good. . . .We conclude that the officers could not have reasonably believed that Beier's arrest complied with the Fourth Amendment.Any reasonably competent officer would have ascertained the terms of the protection order before arresting Beier for failing to comply with it. Accordingly, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Wilkins v. City of Oakland, 350 F.3d 949, 954, 955 (9th Cir. 2003) ("In Saucier, the Supreme Court explained that this rule is applied in the first stage of the qualified immunity analysis by inquiring whether it would be objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that the amount of force employed was required by the situation he confronted. . . That is, the first step in the analysis is an inquiry into the objective reasonableness of the officer's belief in the necessity of his actions, and there is no Fourth Amendment violation if the officer can satisfy this standard. . . The second step of the analysis, which the court reaches only if it determines that the alleged conduct violates a clearly-established constitutional right, is to inquire whether the officer was reasonable in his belief that his conduct did not violate the Constitution. This step, in contrast to the first, is an inquiry into the reasonableness of the officer's belief in the legality of his actions. . . . Even if his actions did violate the Fourth Amendment, a reasonable but mistaken belief that his conduct was lawful would result in the grant of qualified immunity. . . .Scarrott and Koponen could not have been reasonably mistaken as to the legality of their actions had they realized that Wilkins was a police officer. As a result, the officers' entitlement to summary judgment is determined solely by the application of the first stage of the qualified immunity analysis. The objective reasonableness of the officers' conduct in this case turns on their mistake of fact with regard to Officer Wilkins' status and purpose at the scene that night. In turn, whether this mistake of fact was reasonable depends on which version of the facts is accepted by a jury. We emphasize that our decision here does not affirm a reflexive denial of summary judgment whenever a material issue of fact remains to be resolved, a practice which the Supreme Court rejected in Saucier. Even applying the step-by-step qualified immunity analysis outlined in Saucier, there is no question whether the officers' actions in this case violated clearly established law. They did. The only question for resolution is whether their belief in the necessity of their actions was objectively reasonable. That is, was it reasonable for them not to understand that the person they were shooting was another police officer? Because the answer to that question depends on disputed issues of material fact, it is not a legal inquiry, but rather a question of fact best resolved by a jury.").

Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052, 1061, 1062 (9th Cir.2003) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Drummond, we conclude that the officers had 'fair warning' that the force they used was constitutionally excessive even absent a Ninth Circuit case presenting the same set of facts. The officers allegedly crushed Drummond against the ground by pressing their weight on his neck and torso, and continuing to do so despite his repeated cries for air, and despite the fact that his hands were cuffed behind his back and he was offering no resistance. Any reasonable officer should have known that such conduct constituted the use of excessive force. Moreover, not only did local newspaper publicity less than two months before the incident publicize cases of compression asphyxia, . . . and not only did prior federal cases describe the dangers of pressure on a prone, bound, and agitated detainee, . . . but the officers received training from their own police department explaining specifically that 'when one or more[officers] are kneeling on a subject's back or neck to restrain him, compression asphyxia can result [At]hat may be a precipitating factor in causing death."' Anaheim's training materials are relevant not only to whether the force employed in this case was objectively unreasonable, . . .but also to whether reasonable officers would have been on notice that the force employed was objectively unreasonable. The force allegedly employed by the officers was certainly not warranted, and reasonable officers would clearly have known that it was not. We need no federal case directly on point to establish that kneeling on the back and neck of a compliant detainee, and pressing the weight of two officers' bodies on him even after he complained that he was choking and in need of air violates clearly established law, and that reasonable officers would have been aware that such was the case.").

Graves v. City of Coeur D'Alene, 339 F.3d 828, 847, 848 & n.25 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Though we above concluded that Dixon relied too heavily on the context of the hostile and volatile parade, rather than the individualized factors, we had the luxury of making our decision only after thoroughly reviewing the relevant legal authorities, and after applying the law to the facts removed from the intense anxiety to safeguard the public that Dixon and law enforcement officials felt at the Aryan Nations parade. Dixon did not have this same luxury. Police officers rarely, if ever, can objectively remove themselves from the immediate threats that they face, and yet they may have the obligation to risk their own lives to protect the public, while at the same time traversing difficult contours of constitutional law. . . . Given the volatile nature of the parade and the potential for grave injury that Dixon sought to interdict, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Dixon's situation could have believed that those circumstances carried enough weight to create probable cause when there was at least some individualized suspicion. We hold that Dixon is entitled to qualified immunity, because the law did not provide him clear guidance as to how much weight he could give the explosively hostile circumstances of the Nazi parade in making his probable cause assessment. In the extraordinary circumstances of this case, Dixon made a reasonable mistake. . . . It is not inconsistent to hold that no reasonable jury could find probable cause but that Dixon is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. This is so because of the difference in the applicable standards. . . .The qualified immunity defense recognizes that officers make probable cause assessments in the field under pressure and therefore affords the officer leeway, permitting a reasonable mistake without resulting individual liability of the officer, when the law is not clearly established. . . Though both Dixon and the jury were incorrect to find probable cause to search Crowell's backpack, Dixon is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity as the application of the probable cause requirement in context was not clearly established.").

Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 855 n.12 (9th Cir. 2002) ("In Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), the Supreme Court set forth a two-part test for qualified immunity in excessive force cases. First, we examine whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred; second, we look to see whether the officers violated clearly established law. The issue of qualified immunity was not raised in the Rule 50(a) motion in the trial court or in the parties' briefs on appeal. However, at the request of one of our members, the panel requested, sua sponte, that the parties be prepared to discuss the issue at oral argument and they did so. We therefore have the authority to decide that issue. Nevertheless, it is premature to do so at this time, because whether the officers may be said to have made a 'reasonable mistake' of fact or law, Katz, 533 U.S. at 205, may depend on the jury's resolution of disputed facts and the inferences it draws therefrom. Until the jury makes those decisions, we cannot know, for example, how much force was used, and, thus, whether a reasonable officer could have mistakenly believed that the use of that degree of force was lawful. While it does not affect our analysis, we should reiterate that contrary to the analytical structure stated to be applicable at the outset of the dissent, the appeal as presented by the defendants raises only the pure excessive force issue and not a qualified immunity claim.").

Headwaters Forest Defense v. County of Humboldt, 276 F.3d 1125, 1129-31 (9th Cir. 2002) (on remand from Supreme Court after Saucier) ("Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Saucier v. Katz, we had held that 'the inquiry as to whether officers are entitled to qualified immunity for the use of excessive force is the same as the inquiry on the merits of the excessive force claim.' . . In Saucier, the Supreme Court instructs that these inquiries are distinct. . . . . We concluded in our prior opinion that, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the protestors, a rational juror could conclude that the use of pepper spray against the protestors constituted excessive force and that Lewis and Philip were liable for the protestors' unconstitutional injury. . . This analysis is consistent with Saucier's first inquiry: viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the protestors, Lewis and Philip violated the protestors' Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Having answered Saucier's first question in the affirmative, we turn to Saucier's second inquiry, and conclude that it would be clear to a reasonable officer that using pepper spray against the protestors was excessive under the circumstances. . . . Defendants' repeated use of pepper spray was . . .clearly unreasonable. As we recently concluded, the use of pepper spray 'may be reasonable as a general policy to bring an arrestee under control, but in a situation in which an arrestee surrenders and is rendered helpless, any reasonable officer would know that a continued use of the weapon or a refusal without cause to alleviate its harmful effects constitutes excessive force.' LaLonde v. County of Riverside, 204 F.3d 947, 961 (9th Cir.2000) (emphasis supplied). Because the officers had control over the protestors it would have been clear to any reasonable officer that it was unnecessary to use pepper spray to bring them under control, and even less necessary to repeatedly use pepper spray against the protestors when they refused to release from the 'black bears.' . . . . We are not prevented from denying defendants qualified immunity merely because no prior case prohibits the use of the precise force at issue in this case. In the first instance, the circumstances of LaLonde, although not identical to those in this case, are 'not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand' such that their results should be different. . . In addition, regional and state-wide police practice and protocol clearly suggest that using pepper spray against nonviolent protestors is excessive. The law regarding a police officer's use of force against a passive individual was sufficiently clear at the time of the events at issue in this case that the defendants cannot claim qualified immunity on the ground that they made a reasonable mistake of law. . . Moreover, in requiring that the law put a government officer 'on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful' before he could be held liable for violating the Constitution, the Supreme Court emphasized that it was not insisting that 'courts must have agreed upon the precise formulation of the standard.' . . As we recently noted, a law can be violated 'notwithstanding the absence of direct precedent ... [o]therwise, officers would escape responsibility for the most egregious forms of conduct simply because there was no case on all fours prohibiting that particular manifestation of unconstitutional conduct.' [citing Deorle] Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the protestors, we conclude that Philip and Lewis are not entitled to qualified immunity because the use of pepper spray on the protestors' eyes and faces was plainly in excess of the force necessary under the circumstances, and no reasonable officer could have concluded otherwise.")

Robinson v. Solano County, 278 F.3d 1007, 1015, 1016 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc) ("We agree with the Fifth Circuit that '[a] police officer who terrorizes a civilian by brandishing a cocked gun in front of that civilian's face may not cause physical injury, but he has certainly laid the building blocks for a section 1983 claim against him.' [citing Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 905 (5th Cir.1998)] . . . . The development of the law with respect to arrests and detentions now allows us to recognize as a general principle that pointing a gun to the head of an apparently unarmed suspect during an investigation can be a violation of the Fourth Amendment, especially where the individual poses no particular danger. . . The contours of that right were not at all clear in 1995, however. . . . We therefore conclude that while the facts, taken in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, would establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment, the law was not sufficiently established in this circuit in 1995 to override the officers' claim of qualified immunity. Nor was it established in other circuits. We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of the Fourth Amendment claim on qualified immunity grounds.").

Clark v. City of Reno, No. 99-17346, 2001 WL 1507266, at *4 (9th Cir. Nov. 27, 2001) (Reinhardt, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (unpublished) ("Any error of material fact or law the officers may have made with respect to the unlawful arrests was clearly not a reasonable error under Katz. When it came to Katz's second prong, the panel majority simply blinked, perhaps deterred by the byzantine analytical contortions in which the Supreme Court compels lower courts to engage in qualified immunity cases of the type before us. All the majority accomplishes by its failure fully to resolve the qualified immunity issue is to force the parties to undergo a wholly unnecessary trial on the issue–a trial that can lead to only one legally sustainable result. Having held on this appeal that the detentions constituted unlawful arrests, and that the law in that respect was clearly established, it is inconceivable that (barring some circumstances not presented by the record before us) we could uphold a determination that the officers' failure to comply with well-established law was reasonable.").

Jackson v. City of Bremerton, 268 F.3d 646, 651-53 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2001) ("After Saucier, a qualified immunity analysis must begin with this threshold question: based upon the facts taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, did the officer's conduct violate a constitutional right? Id. at 2156. If no constitutional right was violated, the court need not inquire further. Id. If, however, a constitutional violation occurred, the second inquiry is whether the officer could nevertheless have reasonably but mistakenly believed that his or her conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right . . . . In this case, Jackson asserts: 1) she was sprayed with a chemical irritant prior to her arrest; 2) three officers pushed her to the ground to handcuff her and roughly pulled her up to her feet during her arrest; [footnote omitted] and 3) an officer 'rolled up the windows and turned up the engine in the July heat in order to Aadjust her attitude."' Assuming Jackson's version of the facts is correct, the nature and quality of the alleged intrusions were minimal. . . . On balance, applying the Graham analysis, we conclude that the use of force was not excessive in this case. Because no Fourth Amendment violation occurred, the district court properly granted summary judgment in the officers' favor. . . . In light of our holding, we need not reach the second step of Saucier's qualified immunity inquiry. However, were we to conclude that the force used was excessive, Jackson has not shown that the use of chemical irritants in overcoming resistance to a lawful arrest violated a clearly established constitutional right. A reasonable police officer could properly believe that the use of this level of force would not violate a clearly established constitutional right.").

Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272, 1285, 1286 (9th Cir. 2001) (second amended opinion) ("Every police officer should know that it is objectively unreasonable to shoot–even with lead shot wrapped in a cloth case–an unarmed man who: has committed no serious offense, is mentally or emotionally disturbed, has been given no warning of the imminent use of such a significant degree of force, poses no risk of flight, and presents no objectively reasonable threat to the safety of the officer or other individuals. Here, all those factors were present. Deorle had complied with the police officers' instructions, had discarded his potential weapons whenever asked to do so, and had not assaulted anyone; in addition, a team of negotiators essential to resolving such situations was en route. Although there is no prior case prohibiting the use of this specific type of force in precisely the circumstances here involved, that is insufficient to entitle Rutherford to qualified immunity: notwithstanding the absence of direct precedent, the law may be, as it was here, clearly established. . . Otherwise, officers would escape responsibility for the most egregious forms of conduct simply because there was no case on all fours prohibiting that particular manifestation of unconstitutional conduct. . . . No reasonable officer could have believed that Rutherford's action in shooting Deorle with the 'less lethal' lead-filled beanbag round was appropriate or lawful. To the contrary, 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that [Rutherford's] conduct was unlawful.' Katz, 121 S.Ct. at 2158. It does not matter that no case of this court directly addresses the use of such weapons; we have held that '[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.' Mendoza, 27 F.3d at 1362. Given all the circumstances, the error in judgment, such as it was, does not constitute a 'reasonable mistake' of fact or law on Rutherford's part. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, Rutherford was not entitled to qualified immunity for his use of excessive force.").

Marshall v. Columbia Lea Regional Hospital (Marshall II), 474 F.3d 733, 740-46 (10th Cir. 2007) (no qualified immunity for police officers for taking nonconsensual warrantless blood test for misdemeanor offense of driving under the influence in violation of New Mexico law; clearly established that such blood test fell outside exigent circumstances exception to Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement where driver had submitted to two breathalyzer tests, which were negative).

Denver Justice and Peace Committee, Inc. v. City of Golden, 405 F.3d 923, 931, 932 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In sum, we hold that Muehler, Summers, and Ritchie do not support an officer's categorical authority to conduct a pat-down search of any person who seeks to enter an area where a search warrant is being executed. This is not to say such a search would never be permitted. . . . We hold that the law was sufficiently clear at the time Ortiz conducted the pat-down search of Espinosa that Ortiz may not claim qualified immunity. . . . The Supreme Court has articulated narrow grounds that permit police officers to detain individuals who are present during the execution of a search warrant, without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. A detention, however, remains distinct from a search. In addition, based on the allegations of Espinosa's complaint, it would have been clear to the officers executing the search warrant at the DJPC office that the circumstances of that search did not implicate the apprehension of danger or the presence of contraband that may have permitted detention of persons present at the scene, pursuant to Summers. Rather, the circumstances here fall squarely into a factual pattern where a pat-down search of an individual would be prohibited absent reasonable, individualized suspicion. See Ybarra, Sporleder and Ward. Officer Ortiz therefore cannot prevail on his defense of qualified immunity on the basis of the circumstances he has averred.").

Trusdale v. Bell, No. 02-6398, 2003 WL 23033375, at *3 (10th Cir. Dec. 30, 2003) (unpublished) ("Although Officer Bell's perception of the threat turns out, in hindsight, to have been tragically mistaken, the objective reasonableness of his actions must be viewed from the 'on-scene perspective.' . . So viewed, the undisputed evidence in this case supports the objective reasonableness of his actions. In advance of entry into Mr. Trusdale's home, Officer Bell was briefed that Mr. Trusdale 'was a homicide suspect with a violent criminal history,' 'was known to carry a firearm at all times, even from room to room in his residence,' and that he had 'shot a police officer in Kansas.'. . Officer Bell was told that the suspects were heavily armed and were conducting a methamphetamine laboratory. The warrant Officer Bell was executing was a no-knock, high-risk warrant. After entering the premises, Officer Bell proceeded to the doorway of a dimly lit bedroom, where he saw Mr. Trusdale. The officer believed Mr. Trusdale was advancing on him, but this is disputed. Mr. Trusdale lifted his right arm; he was carrying an object that appeared to Officer Bell to be a gun. Officer Bell fired, either twice or thrice. Ultimately, it turned out that Mr. Trusdale was not carrying a gun, but only a Bic cigarette lighter. The legal question, however, is not whether the Officer was mistaken, but whether his actions were objectively reasonable in light of what he perceived at the time. We agree with the district court that the undisputed evidence supports summary judgment in favor of the officer. . . . The district court found that in the split second before Officer Bell fired it would not necessarily be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. Attempting to refute the reasonableness of Officer Bell's actions, Mr. Trusdale points to several disputed factual issues. The question is whether any of those disputed issues is material. Mr. Trusdale states that he was in prison at the time of the homicide and therefore could not be a suspect, that he was not in possession of any firearms except for a wall-mounted shotgun, and that he had never shot a police officer in Kansas. These claims are beside the point, however. Officer Bell may have been misinformed, but he was reasonable to act on the basis of the information provided to him.").

Carr v. Castle, 337 F.3d 1221, 1226, 1227 (10th Cir. 2003) ("Here the Officers do not argue that the law regarding the use of deadly force in violation of an individual's right against unjust seizures was not clearly established at the time of the incident. Rather they contend that 'the use of deadly force against an individual who is running at an officer armed with a piece of concrete is not unconstitutional and certainly was not prohibited by clearly existing law.' But that does violence to the teaching of Saucier and like cases, for it credits the Officers' version of events rather than–as is proper–the factual matrix most favorable to Carr.").

Stuart v. Jackson, Nos. 00-1295, 00-1307, 2001 WL 1600722, at *8 & n.5 (10th Cir. Dec. 17, 2001) (not published) ("In contrast to the Graham constitutional violation analysis, which focuses on the reasonableness of the official's actions, the qualified immunity analysis probes whether the officer's belief in the state of the law was reasonable . . . . In so holding, the Court in Saucier rejected this court's precedents which conflated the Fourth Amendment and qualified immunity inquiries.").

Holland v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1169, 1196, 1197 (10th Cir. 2001) ("As a general proposition, the law that a search or seizure must be objectively 'reasonable' under all the circumstances has been 'clearly established' for a long time . . . . Here, however, the inquiry as to clearly established rights is more specific: 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' [citing Saucier] . . . . How do we evaluate whether a legal mistake is reasonable? A mistake of law may be 'reasonable' where the circumstances 'disclose substantial grounds for the officer to have concluded he had legitimate justification under the law for acting as he did.' . . . We can find no substantial grounds for a reasonable officer to conclude that there was legitimate justification for continuing to hold the young people outside the residence directly at gunpoint after they had completely submitted to the SWAT deputies' initial show of force, or for training a firearm directly upon a four-year-old child at any time during the operation. Davis' supervision of the SWAT deputies during the raid furnishes the affirmative link between this violation and Davis' conduct; it appears uncontroverted that the SWAT deputies continued to point their weapons at the persons found on the Heflin property until Davis directed them to stop doing so at the conclusion of the search. This violation does not reflect a reasonable mistake of law for which Davis should enjoy the benefits of qualified immunity. This was an invasion of a clearly established constitutional right, and the officers' mistake as to what the law requires was unreasonable under all of the circumstances.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Paez v. Mulvey, 915 F.3d 1276, 1287-88 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Paez, Peters, and Diaz face a difficult road in perfecting their § 1983 claims. As the Supreme Court has explained in a similar context, 'the ... standard of objective reasonableness ... defines the qualified immunity accorded an officer whose request for a warrant allegedly caused an unconstitutional arrest. Only where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable will the shield of immunity be lost.'. . Put another way, if the affidavits (including the omitted information) would have demonstrated even arguable probable cause -- that a reasonable officer could have believed an offense was committed -- then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Here, we find that the affidavits would have established not just arguable probable cause, but probable cause itself.")

Black v. Wigington, 811 F.3d 1259, 1267-69 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The applications for the arrest warrants listed the marijuana, drug paraphernalia, and clothing that the officers found in the Blacks' trailer. This evidence suggested that the Blacks had committed the alleged crimes. The Blacks argue that the evidence from their trailer could not provide probable cause because it was obtained during an illegal search, but they wrongly assume that the exclusionary rule applies in this civil case. In a criminal case, a warrant based on evidence discovered during an illegal search might be invalid as 'fruit of the poisonous tree.'. . The fruit-of-the-poisonous-tree doctrine is a component of the exclusionary rule. . . But the exclusionary rule is not a 'personal constitutional right' or a requirement of the Fourth Amendment; it is a 'judicially created remedy' that is meant to prevent violations of the Fourth Amendment 'through its deterrent effect.'. . .The Supreme Court has never held that the benefits of the exclusionary rule outweigh its costs in a civil case. . . And our predecessor court has held that the exclusionary rule did not apply in a civil suit against police officers, . . . although it did not completely foreclose the possibility that the rule could apply in some contexts . . . . Two of our sister circuits, however, have held that the exclusionary rule and the fruit-of-the-poisonous-tree doctrine never apply in a civil suit against police officers. See Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 145 (2d Cir.1999); Wren v. Towe, 130 F.3d 1154, 1158 (5th Cir.1997). We now join our sister circuits and hold that the exclusionary rule does not apply in a civil suit against police officers. The cost of applying the exclusionary rule in this context is significant: officers could be forced to pay damages based on an overly truncated version of the evidence. And the deterrence benefits are miniscule. Police officers are already deterred from violating the Fourth Amendment because the evidence that they find during an illegal search or seizure cannot be used in a criminal prosecution—the primary 'concern and duty' of the police. . . Moreover, plaintiffs can still sue a police officer for the illegal search or seizure, regardless whether the officers can rely on illegally obtained evidence to defend themselves against other types of claims. This threat of civil liability will adequately deter police officers from violating the Fourth Amendment, whether or not the exclusionary rule applies in civil cases. See Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586, 597–98, 126 S.Ct. 2159, 2167–68 (2006). The 'additional marginal deterrence' of applying the exclusionary rule in this context 'would not outweigh the societal cost of excluding relevant evidence and decreasing the possibility of obtaining accurate factual findings.'. . . Accordingly, the officers can rely on the evidence that they found in the Blacks' trailer to prove that the arrest warrants were supported by probable cause. . . . The Blacks' claim of malicious prosecution fails because Deputy Kain, Deputy Stamatellos, and Investigator Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity. The evidence from the Blacks' trailer provided probable cause for the arrest warrants. It does not matter whether that evidence was discovered in compliance with the Fourth Amendment because the exclusionary rule does not apply in a civil suit against police officers.") Skop v. City of Atlanta, 485 F.3d 1130, 1144 (11th Cir. 2007) ("When an officer plainly violates the legal rights of the people he serves, and when a reasonable officer in his position had fair warning that his conduct was unlawful, § 1983 suits exist to provide a vehicle for recourse. In a false arrest case such as this one, qualified immunity protects the police from such suits, but only up to the line defined by the arguable probable cause standard–whether 'reasonable officers in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge as the Defendant[ ] could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest.'. . Where, as here, the resolution of disputed critical facts determines on which side of this line the officer's conduct fell, summary judgment is inappropriate. Accordingly, we are constrained to reverse the district court's entry of final summary judgment for Brown and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

Bashir v. Rockdale County, Georgia, 445 F.3d 1323, 1331 (11th Cir. 2006) ("We conclude that, under the law existing at the time, it was clearly established the deputies' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. A reasonable law enforcement officer faced with these circumstances would have known he could not enter the home and arrest Bashir without a warrant, exigent circumstances, or consent. That doing so would offend the Fourth Amendment was clearly established by the precedent recounted above, including Payton . . . which sets forth the law with 'obvious clarity,' Vinyard, 311 F.3d at 1351. Moreover, Gonzalez, supra, is not 'distinguishable in a fair way' from the facts of this case. . . Gonzalez clearly established a reasonable officer in Deputy Davis's position could not infer consent from Bashir's conduct. Accordingly, Deputy Davis and the unnamed deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court erred in granting summary judgment in their favor on Bashir's unlawful claim."). App'x 438, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he District Court did rule that, even if Deputy Whitfield is entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Olson's separately-pled excessive force claim, his use of force would remain relevant to the amount of damages Ms. Olson might recover on her false arrest claims. This comports with our Circuit precedent. See Bashir v. Rockdale Cty., 445 F.3d 1323, 1332 (11th Cir. 2006) ("[T]he damages recoverable on an unlawful arrest claim include damages suffered because of the use of force in effecting the arrest.") . . .The District Court correctly denied qualified immunity to Deputy Whitfield on Ms. Olson's false arrest claims and correctly ruled that Ms. Olson may recover damages for the force Deputy Whitfield used during her arrest.")]

Crosby v. Monroe County, 394 F.3d 1328, 1333, 1334 (11th Cir. 2004) ("In making an excessive force inquiry, we are not to view the matter as judges from the comfort and safety of our chambers, fearful of nothing more threatening than the occasional paper cut as we read a cold record accounting of what turned out to be the facts. We must see the situation through the eyes of the officer on the scene who is hampered by incomplete information and forced to make a split-second decision between action and inaction in circumstances where inaction could prove fatal. . . From that perspective, a reasonable officer could have believed that the force applied was reasonably necessary in the situation Deputy Terry found himself in that night. The circumstances were fraught with danger for the officers. Multiple shots had been fired, Crosby's neighbor was in fear for his life, and after the officers arrived on the scene a shot was fired from the direction of Crosby's house. As they approached, the officers saw Crosby carrying a shotgun and heard the sound of him ejecting a shell from the weapon. . . . Though Crosby was on the ground at the time Deputy Terry put his foot on Crosby's face, he had not yet been handcuffed. For all the officers knew, Crosby had other weapons concealed on his person–as it turned out, he actually did have another weapon on him–and raising his head to ask why he was being arrested could have been an attempt by Crosby to distract Terry and a prelude to actual resistance. Given the circumstances and the risks inherent in apprehending any suspect, an officer in Terry's position reasonably could have concluded that it was imperative to keep Crosby, who had not been entirely cooperative, completely flat and immobile until he had been successfully handcuffed.").

Kingsland v. City of Miami, 382 F.3d 1220, 1233, 1234 (11th Cir. 2004) ("Viewed in the light most favorable to Kingsland, the facts support a conclusion that the arrest affidavit included recklessly or deliberately false statements that are material to a finding of arguable probable cause. If the defendants fabricated or unreasonably disregarded certain pieces of evidence to establish probable cause or arguable probable cause, as alleged, reasonable officers in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge as the defendants could not have believed that probable cause existed to arrest the plaintiff. Because a jury question exists as to whether the defendants constructed evidence upon which to base Kingsland's arrest, the question whether arguable probable cause for the arrest existed is aptly suited for a jury. Qualified immunity is, as the term implies, qualified. It is not absolute. It contemplates instances in which a public official's actions are not protected. . . The principles behind qualified immunity would be rendered meaningless if such immunity could be invoked to shelter officers who, because of their own interests, allegedly flout the law, abuse their authority, and deliberately imperil those they are employed to serve and protect. In fact, if the plaintiff's version of the facts is true, the defendants' conduct is patently objectively unreasonable and no reasonable public official would contend that such conduct was lawful. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Kingsland, the evidence shows that the arresting officers in this case behaved in an objectively unreasonable fashion and were therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. Given the significance of the disputed issues of fact here, qualified immunity from suit is effectively unavailable, even though after a full trial the officers may yet prevail on the merits. Consequently, her suit against the defendants on the false arrest claim may proceed.").

Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274, 1280, 1281 (11th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiff next argues that the fettering (whether highly dangerous or not) was unnecessary because of Irby's compliance after having been sprayed with OC spray. Plaintiff adds that the force was particularly excessive after Irby's compliance in the light of his extended struggle, head wound, and exposure to OC spray without decontamination. Reviewing the evidence before us, we see no constitutional violation. As we have noted, defendants do not use excessive force if they act in an 'objectively reasonable' manner in the light of the facts and circumstances before them. . . In context, the force used by defendants was within the range of reasonably proportionate responses to the need for force and was not excessive. The district court said that defendants used unconstitutionally excessive force against Irby because they fettered him after he was made compliant by the OC spray. We disagree. In analyzing whether excessive force was used, courts must look at the totality of the circumstances: not just a small slice of the acts that happened at the tail of the story. . . . After considering all of plaintiff's arguments, we conclude that, as a matter of law, defendants did not violate Irby's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Even so, out of an abundance of caution, we also conclude that qualified immunity would apply even if the defendants had violated Irby's rights: no controlling case law had settled the applicable law; and given the circumstances, defendants' acts were not so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that every objectively reasonable officer, facing the circumstances, would have known that the acts violated the pre-existing federal law.").

Storck v. City of Coral Springs, 354 F.3d 1307, 1317 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Based on our review of the record, we have little trouble finding that McHugh had arguable probable cause to arrest Storck for violating ' 843.02. . . . The analysis of arguable probable cause is not concerned with what Storck thought or knew, but rather, what a reasonable officer knowing what Officer McHugh knew could have thought. . . . Moreover, even if Storck had presented sufficient facts to allege a violation of a constitutional right–and on this record Storck has failed to do so–here such a right was not clearly established.").

Carr v. Tatangelo, 338 F.3d 1259, 1270 (11th Cir. 2003) ("In determining whether the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity, we analyze the precise circumstances immediately preceding Carr's being shot and not the earlier surveillance decisions or the events following the shooting. Under the Fourth Amendment objective reasonableness standard applied to the officers' defense of themselves and a fellow officer, Officers Fortson, Tatangelo, and Mercer are entitled to qualified immunity on Carr's Fourth Amendment, seizure argument."[footnotes omitted]").

McCormick v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 333 F.3d 1234, 1245& n.16 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("Officer Welker had probable cause to believe that McCormick had committed a violent felony when he saw the bleeding Capuano and good reason to believe McCormick still posed a threat of violence when he saw McCormick armed with the stick. Even assuming McCormick's version of events, Officer Welker's surprise use of pepper spray to subdue McCormick was proportionate to the potential threat and reasonable under the circumstances. . . . In the alternative, McCormick has not carried the burden of demonstrating that the law was clearly established that the surprise use of pepper spray on a violent felony suspect violated the Constitution. Officer Welker would still have the benefit of qualified immunity at summary judgment.").

Lee v. Ferraro, 284 F.3d 1188, 1198-1200 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Having concluded that Lee has made a sufficient showing of excessive force, the second step in the Saucier analysis requires us to determine whether Ferraro is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that the law had not clearly established at the time of the incident that such force was excessive. There are two ways for a party to show that the law clearly established that a particular amount of force was excessive. The first is to point to a 'materially similar case [that has] already decided that what the police officer was doing was unlawful.' . . . Because identifying factually similar cases may be difficult in the excessive force context, we have recognized a narrow exception also allowing parties to show 'that the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.' . . . Under this test, the law is clearly established, and qualified immunity can be overcome, only if the standards set forth in Graham and our own case law 'inevitably lead every reasonable officer in [the defendant's] position to conclude the force was unlawful.' . . . Simply put, the grossly disproportionate force used in this case was clearly established as a constitutional violation because no reasonable officer could have believed that Ferraro's actions were legal. Even though Ferraro undoubtedly possessed the lawful power to effect a custodial arrest and secure Lee with handcuffs, a reasonable officer could not possibly have believed that he then had the lawful authority to take her to the back of her car and slam her head against the trunk after she was arrested, handcuffed, and completely secured, and after any danger to the arresting officer as well as any risk of flight had passed. Once an arrestee has been fully secured, such force is wholly unnecessary to any legitimate law enforcement purpose. . . . Slamming the head of a handcuffed, subdued arrestee against the trunk of a car is objectively unreasonable and clearly unlawful. This conclusion seems to us to be even more self-evident where, as here, the crime involved nothing more than the improper use of a horn on a busy thoroughfare during rush hour traffic in a large metropolitan community.").

Pace v. Capobianco, 283 F.3d 1275, 1282, 1283 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Qualified immunity protects government officials, in their individual capacities, from suit unless the law preexisting the defendant official's supposedly wrongful act was already established to such a high degree that every objectively reasonable official standing in the defendant's place would be on notice that what the defendant official was doing would be clearly unlawful given the circumstances. . .The notice may come in different ways. . . But the preexisting law must give real notice of practical value to government officials, considering the specific circumstances confronting them, and not just talk of some generalized, abstract intellectual concept. This case is based on the Fourth Amendment that prohibits 'unreasonable searches and seizures.' That 'unreasonable' seizures are prohibited was clearly established before 1998. But, this proposition is too broad and general to give policemen practical guidance. The kind of notice that will take away qualified immunity must be appropriately specific considering the context of the case. [citing Saucier] So, case law must be looked to for the needed notice of what conduct is 'unreasonable' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. In this case, Plaintiff–quite rightly–points to Tennessee v. Garner and Graham v. Conner as important. They are important decisions; and we know that sometimes general rules of law in judicial decisions can give enough warning to government officials, in certain circumstances to which the general rules apply with 'obvious clarity,' that qualified immunity will be lost. But when we look at decisions such as Garner and Graham, we see some tests to guide us in determining the law in many different kinds of circumstances; but we do not see the kind of clear law (clear answers) that would apply with such obvious clarity to the circumstances of this case that only an incompetent officer or one intending to violate the law could possibly fail to know that what the police did here violated federal law. . . . We look at the cases to see if a bright line–before the pertinent day–had been established capable of giving fair warning to all objectively, reasonable officers standing in the defendants' places that shooting the decedent, in these circumstances, must violate federal law. We look for cases in which Fourth Amendment violations have been ascertained; and we look for fair warning, by studying whether the cases involved facts materially similar to those in this case: cases not fairly distinguishable from the case at hand. . . As far as we know, no such preexisting case exists. Plaintiff has identified no case demonstrating a clearly established rule prohibiting police officers from using deadly force in circumstances like those in this case: a case, among other things, where the fleeing suspect appeared to be dangerous by virtue of his hazardous driving during the long, nighttime car chase and where the suspect remained in his automobile with the engine running, even when almost surrounded by officers and where–IF the chase had ended at all–it had ended (at most) a very few seconds before the officers fired and, even then, the suspect's car started driving away again, causing more shots to be fired. . . Because the preexisting law did not warn defendants fairly that shooting the decedent in these circumstances would clearly violate federal law, defendants– if they violated federal law (which we strongly doubt)–are entitled to immunity.").

Willingham v. Loughnan, 261 F.3d 1178, 1186, 1187 (11th Cir. 2001) ("The question for the purposes of qualified immunity is this one: whether Defendant Officers violated clearly established federal law in 1987, by shooting Plaintiff within a "split second" after she attacked two officers–having just tried to kill one of them–while she, at the moment, was not in the physical control of the police and was standing unarmed but near the area from which she had already obtained four objects she had used as weapons, at least one of which was a potentially lethal weapon. The Supreme Court has recently offered guidance on how to address properly the question of qualified immunity in the context of excessive force cases. In Saucier, the Court decided that whether an officer behaved in an objectively reasonable manner in the context of the merits of the excessive force claim is a completely separate and distinct question from whether the officer behaved objectively reasonably under the clearly established preexisting law for qualified immunity purposes. . . . We (with reluctance and doubt) accept that the law would allow a reasonable jury to find–given the Plaintiff's evidence, including evidence of Plaintiff being unarmed when shot, of the nature of the weapons she had used and the manner of their use, of the number of police officers present and their location and so on–that the amount of force applied by the Defendant Officers was not reasonable in this case, notwithstanding that Plaintiff had just finished battering and attempting to kill police officers. . . The crucial inquiry, however, is whether the law was already clearly established at the time of the incident that the use of deadly force was unlawful under the particular circumstances faced by the officers in this situation. An officer is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer, under the circumstances, might have thought that the use of force did not violate the federal law at the time of the incident. See Saucier, 121 S.Ct. at 2158-59. The principles and goals of the doctrine of qualified immunity are particularly important in cases like this one: where police officers are confronting an unpredictable and dangerous situation in which split-second decisions can make the difference between life and death. . . . Whatever the evidence at the civil trial also shows– given the fact of Plaintiff's 1992 criminal convictions–the factual situation confronted by the Officer Defendants in this case must be basically this one: 1) Plaintiff had just assaulted one officer, attempted to kill another officer; 2) she was not subdued; and 3) she was standing in the door to the kitchen where she had, just moments before, obtained weapons with which she had tried to kill one police officer and assaulted another. Unless the federal law in October 1987 was already clearly established that–under these circumstances– shooting Plaintiff, even if she was unarmed at the moment, did constitute excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the Defendant Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. Almost always, to establish the law clearly in the context of the Fourth Amendment, a materially similar case must have already decided that what the police officer was doing was unlawful. . . . Because the federal law was not already clearly established law in 1987 that it constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment to shoot a person under the circumstances presented in this case, we conclude that the Defendant Officers are entitled to qualified immunity."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Willingham v. That Defendants' conduct has been ultimately determined to be unreasonable under the excessive force analysis does not decide whether the law was already clearly established at the time Defendants acted that what they were doing, given the circumstances, necessarily violated federal law."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Willingham v. Hernandez v. City of Miami, 302 F.Supp.2d 1373, 1378-80 (S.D. Fla. 2004) ("Officer Perez argues that he did not need to wait for Mr. Hernandez to point his gun at him and kill him. Although Officer Perez's general statement is correct, the problem with his argument is, again, that is not faithful to how the facts must be viewed at summary judgment. Had Officer Perez fired in the split second that Mr. Hernandez was grabbing his own gun, or even as Mr. Hernandez was dropping the gun in the passenger seat, there would not be a Fourth Amendment violation. No one would (or should) second-guess an officer who fired at the moment he reasonably believed that his life was on the line. . . But this is not what occurred, at least not in the version of events that must be accepted for summary judgment purposes. Instead, Officer Perez shot Mr. Hernandez in the back after he had dropped his weapon and as he was running away unarmed. Moreover, Officer Perez shot Mr. Hernandez when he was about fifteen feet away from the police car, indicating that any threat had dissipated. Finally, Officer Perez did not give any sort of warning prior to firing. There are, of course, Eleventh Circuit decisions in Garner deadly force cases concluding that there was no Fourth Amendment violation. But in each of the cases the suspect was, at the moment of the shooting, threatening an officer or a member of the public, and there was no such threat here. Indeed, Mr. Hernandez had dropped his weapon and was running away unarmed. . . . . Taking Mr. Hernandez's version of events, no objectively reasonable officer in Officer Perez's position could have reasonably believed that he was entitled to use deadly force to apprehend Mr. Hernandez and prevent his escape.").

Hendon v. City of Piedmont, 163 F.Supp.2d 1316, 1328 (N.D. Ala. 2001) ("The plaintiff has not cited nor has the court found a controlling Fifth Circuit case, an Eleventh Circuit case nor a Supreme Court case which, in a concrete and factually defined context, make it obvious to all police officers that Reil's conduct violated the law. There are controlling cases which suggest to the contrary. There has been no bright line staked out identifying Reil's conduct as excessive. Furthermore, this is clearly not a case where Reil should have known that he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on the point. . .This is certainly not a Priester case. The plaintiff was clearly avoiding intervention by the police. This court cannot conclude that only an incompetent officer or a knowing violator would have reacted as did Reil.").

SUPREME COURT

NOTE: While not a qualified immunity decision, the Court's recent decision in Mendez should be noted.

County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1543-49 & n.* (2017) ("If law enforcement officers make a 'seizure' of a person using force that is judged to be reasonable based on a consideration of the circumstances relevant to that determination, may the officers nevertheless be held liable for injuries caused by the seizure on the ground that they committed a separate Fourth Amendment violation that contributed to their need to use force? The Ninth Circuit has adopted a 'provocation rule' that imposes liability in such a situation. We hold that the Fourth Amendment provides no basis for such a rule. A different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure. . . . The Court of Appeals did not disagree with the conclusion that the shooting was reasonable under Graham; instead, like the District Court, the Court of Appeals applied the provocation rule and held the deputies liable for the use of force on the theory that they had intentionally and recklessly brought about the shooting by entering the shack without a warrant in violation of clearly established law. . . The Court of Appeals also adopted an alternative rationale for its judgment. It held that 'basic notions of proximate cause' would support liability even without the provocation rule because it was 'reasonably foreseeable' that the officers would meet an armed homeowner when they 'barged into the shack unannounced.'. . .The provocation rule, which has been 'sharply questioned' outside the Ninth Circuit, City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. ——, ——, n. 4, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1776, n. 4, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015), is incompatible with our excessive force jurisprudence. The rule's fundamental flaw is that it uses another constitutional violation to manufacture an excessive force claim where one would not otherwise exist. . . .When an officer carries out a seizure that is reasonable, taking into account all relevant circumstances, there is no valid excessive force claim. The basic problem with the provocation rule is that it fails to stop there. Instead, the rule provides a novel and unsupported path to liability in cases in which the use of force was reasonable. Specifically, it instructs courts to look back in time to see if there was a different Fourth Amendment violation that is somehow tied to the eventual use of force. That distinct violation, rather than the forceful seizure itself, may then serve as the foundation of the plaintiff's excessive force claim. . . This approach mistakenly conflates distinct Fourth Amendment claims. Contrary to this approach, the objective reasonableness analysis must be conducted separately for each search or seizure that is alleged to be unconstitutional. An excessive force claim is a claim that a law enforcement officer carried out an unreasonable seizure through a use of force that was not justified under the relevant circumstances. It is not a claim that an officer used reasonable force after committing a distinct Fourth Amendment violation such as an unreasonable entry. By conflating excessive force claims with other Fourth Amendment claims, the provocation rule permits excessive force claims that cannot succeed on their own terms. . . . The framework for analyzing excessive force claims is set out in Graham. If there is no excessive force claim under Graham, there is no excessive force claim at all. To the extent that a plaintiff has other Fourth Amendment claims, they should be analyzed separately.[*] . . . Respondents do not attempt to defend the provocation rule. Instead, they argue that the judgment below should be affirmed under Graham itself. Graham commands that an officer's use of force be assessed for reasonableness under the 'totality of the circumstances.'. . On respondents' view, that means taking into account unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use it. . . We did not grant certiorari on that question, and the decision below did not address it. Accordingly, we decline to address it here. . . . All we hold today is that once a use of force is deemed reasonable under Graham, it may not be found unreasonable by reference to some separate constitutional violation. Any argument regarding the District Court's application of Graham in this case should be addressed to the Ninth Circuit on remand. . . .The Ninth Circuit's efforts to cabin the provocation rule only undermine it further. The Ninth Circuit appears to recognize that it would be going entirely too far to suggest that any Fourth Amendment violation that is connected to a reasonable use of force should create a valid excessive force claim. . . Instead, that court has endeavored to limit the rule to only those distinct Fourth Amendment violations that in some sense 'provoked' the need to use force. The concept of provocation, in turn, has been defined using a two-prong test. First, the separate constitutional violation must 'creat[e] a situation which led to' the use of force; second, the separate constitutional violation must be committed recklessly or intentionally. . . Neither of these limitations solves the fundamental problem of the provocation rule: namely, that it is an unwarranted and illogical expansion of Graham. But in addition, each of the limitations creates problems of its own. First, the rule includes a vague causal standard. It applies when a prior constitutional violation 'created a situation which led to' the use of force. The rule does not incorporate the familiar proximate cause standard. Indeed, it is not clear what causal standard is being applied. Second, while the reasonableness of a search or seizure is almost always based on objective factors, . . . the provocation rule looks to the subjective intent of the officers who carried out the seizure. As noted, under the Ninth Circuit's rule, a prior Fourth Amendment violation may be held to have provoked a later, reasonable use of force only if the prior violation was intentional or reckless. . . . [B]oth parties accept the principle that plaintiffs can—subject to qualified immunity—generally recover damages that are proximately caused by any Fourth Amendment violation. . . .Thus, there is no need to dress up every Fourth Amendment claim as an excessive force claim. For example, if the plaintiffs in this case cannot recover on their excessive force claim, that will not foreclose recovery for injuries proximately caused by the warrantless entry. The harm proximately caused by these two torts may overlap, but the two claims should not be confused. . . . The Court of Appeals also held that 'even without relying on [the] provocation theory, the deputies are liable for the shooting under basic notions of proximate cause.'. . In other words, the court apparently concluded that the shooting was proximately caused by the deputies' warrantless entry of the shack. Proper analysis of this proximate cause question required consideration of the 'foreseeability or the scope of the risk created by the predicate conduct,' and required the court to conclude that there was 'some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged.'. . Unfortunately, the Court of Appeals' proximate cause analysis appears to have been tainted by the same errors that cause us to reject the provocation rule. The court reasoned that when officers make a 'startling entry' by 'barg [ing] into' a home 'unannounced,' it is reasonably foreseeable that violence may result. . . But this appears to focus solely on the risks foreseeably associated with the failure to knock and announce, which could not serve as the basis for liability since the Court of Appeals concluded that the officers had qualified immunity on that claim. By contrast, the Court of Appeals did not identify the foreseeable risks associated with the relevant constitutional violation (the warrantless entry); nor did it explain how, on these facts, respondents' injuries were proximately caused by the warrantless entry. In other words, the Court of Appeals' proximate cause analysis, like the provocation rule, conflated distinct Fourth Amendment claims and required only a murky causal link between the warrantless entry and the injuries attributed to it. On remand, the court should revisit the question whether proximate cause permits respondents to recover damages for their shooting injuries based on the deputies' failure to secure a warrant at the outset. . . .For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

On remand, the Ninth Circuit held that "unlawful entry into a residence by two sheriff's deputies, without a warrant, consent, or exigent circumstances, was the proximate cause of the subsequent shooting and injuries to the plaintiffs." Thus, a claim under § 1983 was permitted. Mendez v. County of Los Angeles, 897 F.3d 1067, 1071 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1292 (2019). See also id. at 1078 ("Here, both the entry and the failure to knock and announce were proximate causes of the Mendezes' injuries. Officers cannot properly escape liability when they breach two duties, each breach being necessary for the harm to occur, just because one of the duties was subject to qualified immunity. That would lead to the absurd result that an officer who breaches only one duty is liable, but that an officer who breaches multiple duties is not.").

unreasonable tactics and created the dangerous environment that led to Ragland's death. In her view, the officers 'utter[ly] fail[ed] to deescalate a sensitive mental health crisis.' Indeed, it would be difficult to argue with the district court's observation 'that the officers' tactics escalated the situation.' And that is truly troubling. But even so, we see no viable claim under our precedent. As our cases emphasize, '[o]ur task is not to evaluate what the officers could or should have done in hindsight. The sole inquiry is whether the officers' actions, as taken, were objectively reasonable under all the circumstances.'. . As we just explained, the use of deadly force was justified under our precedent in response to Ragland's display of erratic behavior, her defying of officer commands, and her reaching for a gun. . . We also note that the tactics used here were more measured than the 'dynamic' tactics we upheld under the Fourth Amendment in Garczynski, and that case did not involve conduct that was arguably threatening to others, as this one does. . . .This decision is not, as Robinson contends, premature or better left to a jury. An evaluation of the reasonableness of the force used is appropriate at this stage because 'the question of whether the force used by the officer ... is excessive is a pure question of law, decided by the court.'. . And here, even when we construe the factual allegations and the bodycam footage in the light most favorable to Robinson, we are unable to conclude that Robinson could establish that the use of deadly force against Ragland, though undoubtedly tragic, was objectively unreasonable under our precedent. Because she has not stated a plausible claim that Officers Collum and Henderson violated Ragland's right to be free from excessive force, the district court did not err in granting the motions to dismiss."); Arnold v. City of Olathe, Kansas, 35 F.4th 778, 789-92 (10th Cir. 2022) ("It is worth noting that the Supreme Court has not yet adopted the principle that reasonableness requires considering whether an officer recklessly created the need to use force. [citing Mendez] Some circuits consider an officer's reckless conduct when evaluating the reasonable use of force. [citing cases from 1st and 7th Circuits] Other circuits, however, examine only the facts that existed at the moment of seizure to determine if the officer's use of force was reasonable. [citing cases from 2d and 4th Circuits] But binding Tenth Circuit precedent requires us to consider whether the officers' alleged reckless conduct created the need to use deadly force. Cox v. Wilson, 971 F.3d 1159, 1170 (10th Cir. 2020) (following the Tenth Circuit but noting that it is unclear where the Supreme Court stands on the matter). To determine if the officer unreasonably created the need to use force, we examine conduct that was 'immediately connected' to the use of force. . . . The officers' conduct just after their arrival at Sumners' house is too attenuated to be immediately connected to the shooting. The officers conducted negotiations for two hours and fifty-two minutes before they entered the house. . . . The officers' entry into the house is also too attenuated to be immediately connected to the use of force. . . Unlike in Allen, where officers used force 90 seconds after the initial interaction, here sixteen minutes elapsed between the entry and the use of force. . . . The officers' conduct only became immediately connected to the use of force after Howard's demeanor changed and she slammed the laundry room door shut. Less than a minute before officers shot Howard, she started to become aggressive and slammed the door, stating 'you ain't cops.' Sweany then forced open the door, concerned that it would be impossible for officers to retreat if Howard had a gun. When the officers entered the laundry room, Sweany's fears were confirmed: Howard pointed a gun at the officers. The officers' conduct after Howard's change in demeanor is what we consider immediately connected to the use of force. While the officers' breaking into the laundry room was immediately connected to the use of force, it was not reckless. The officers only entered the laundry room after Howard became aggressive; Officer Sweany determined that he had to take quick action to stop Howard and that retreat was not an option based on the number of officers in the house. He was concerned for officer safety and acted accordingly. This was a reasonable determination. We next evaluate the three Graham factors to determine whether the officers used reasonable force. . . . In short, all three Graham factors weigh in favor of the officers. The officers' use of force was reasonable given the totality of the circumstances and the severe threat to officer safety."); Redd on behalf of Simms v. City of Oklahoma City, No. 20-6145, 2021 WL 3909982, at *13–14 (10th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021) (not published) ("'E]ven when an officer uses deadly force in response to a clear threat of such force being employed against him, the Graham inquiry does not end there.'. . Rather, the court considers 'whether Defendants' own reckless or deliberate conduct during the seizure unreasonably created the need to use such force.'. . Actions taken by officers which are 'immediately connected' to the officers' use of deadly force must therefore be analyzed. . . Thus, in addition to analyzing the three Graham factors with respect to Officer Galyon's use of deadly force against Mr. Simms, we also consider whether Officer Galyon's actions preceding the shooting recklessly or deliberately created the need for that force. . . This court has held that where '[t]he entire incident' from officers' arrival 'to the time of the shooting' was 'only ninety seconds[,] ... [c]learly, the officers' preceding actions were so "immediately connected" to [the decedent's] threat of force that they should be included in the reasonableness inquiry.'. . But '[m]ere negligence or conduct attenuated by time or intervening events is not to be considered.'. . This case is far different from those in which we have held an officer recklessly or deliberately created the need for use of deadly force. In Allen, police arrived and immediately attempted to seize the decedent from his automobile, despite knowing he was armed. . . There was evidence allowing a jury to conclude they did so in a hostile manner. . . Similarly, in Estate of Ceballos a police officer 'shot and killed an emotionally distraught [man] within a minute of arriving on the scene,' an action necessitated after the officer 'approached [the decedent] quickly, screaming at [him] to drop [a baseball] bat and refusing to give ground as [he] approached the officers.'. . And in Bond, an officer advanced toward the decedent, causing him to retreat into a garage; when the three officers then followed, they 'block[ed] the only exit from the garage .... [The decedent], who[m] the officers knew to be intoxicated, then grab[bed] a hammer,' resulting in the officers advancing again and ultimately shooting the decedent. . . Here, Officer Galyon approached Mr. Simms, who viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Murray, was asleep in a car. From five or six feet away, Officer Galyon asked Mr. Simms if he was okay. Although his tone was authoritative, no evidence suggests it was hostile. Officer Galyon then reasonably perceived Mr. Simms was attempting to draw a pistol on him. There is simply no evidence that Officer Galyon recklessly or deliberately caused Mr. Simms to do so. Ms. Murray argues that Officer Galyon was reckless in what he did not do, rather than what he did. She claims that, under the circumstances, Mr. Simms might not have been aware Officer Galyon was a police officer and that Officer Galyon was reckless in failing to identify himself as such. But Officer Galyon approached to five or six feet away from Mr. Simms's vehicle and simply asked if Mr. Simms was alright. Such an innocuous inquiry—one equally appropriate from a concerned civilian—could not have been reasonably anticipated to cause a violent, armed reaction. And, although there is some question as to whether Mr. Simms had an opportunity to observe this fact, Officer Galyon was dressed in a police uniform when he repeatedly ordered Mr. Simms not to go for his gun. There may be cases where an officer's failure to identify as law enforcement is the dividing line between provoking a violent response and not provoking a violent response, such that it would be reckless for the officer to fail to identify himself, but this is not that case. . . Here, Officer Galyon merely approached a parked car and inquired after the occupant's well-being. It was Mr. Simms's reaction that necessitated the use of deadly force. There is no evidence from which the jury could find that Officer Galyon recklessly created the need for such force. . . . In sum, the first and third Graham factors—i.e., the severity of the suspected crime and whether the suspect resisted or evaded arrest—to the extent relevant here, if at all, weigh against Officer Galyon's use of deadly force. But the second factor—the immediacy of the threat to Officer Galyon—weighs strongly in favor of the reasonableness of Officer Galyon's actions. The second factor is the most important Graham factor and here easily outweighs the first and the third. We further conclude Officer Galyon did not recklessly precipitate the need to use force. Accordingly, Officer Galyon did not violate Mr. Simms's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force."); Ferreira v. City of Binghamton, 975F.3d 255, 280 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Far from supporting the City's argument, Mendez clarifies that even where there is no viable constitutional claim of excessive force, an officer's use of force may give rise to damages where it was proximately caused by other tortious conduct. The problem with the provocation rule, then—like the problem with the plaintiff's theory in Salim—was that it impermissibly expanded the relevant time frame for the excessive force inquiry, and thus 'dressed up' a different (permissible) claim as a claim of excessive force. Here, Ferreira's negligent planning claim is separate from his claim of excessive force, and, as Mendez makes clear, is not dependent on a conclusion that Miller engaged in excessive force."); Orn v. Feb. 1, 2022) ("Walker claims that Hankison, Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell violated the knock-and-announce requirement by failing to announce before entering Taylor's apartment, although he concedes that the officers knocked. . . Mattingly and Cosgrove argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they announced and had a valid no-knock warrant, which permitted their entry without knocking and announcing. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell contend that they 'were not present at the scene when the events took place.'. . Walker has plausibly alleged that the officers failed to announce when executing the warrant. . . Despite Taylor asking the individuals knocking to identify themselves, the officers failed to respond or otherwise announce their presence. . . Walker has also plausibly alleged that the officers listed in his complaint, including Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell, were part of the entry team executing the warrant . . . and members of an entry team can be liable for a failure to knock and announce. . . Whether the officers acted reasonably under the totality of the circumstances in anticipating exigent circumstances is a question of fact. . . Neither 'the presence of drugs alone' nor the mere possibility of evidence destruction vitiates the knock-and-announce requirement. Moreover, the issuance of a no-knock warrant does not end the reasonableness inquiry. . . As set forth in Walker's complaint, the officers did not anticipate exigent circumstances when they executed the warrant because they planned to knock and announce, believing that Taylor, who had no criminal history, would be home alone and that her residence was 'a soft target.' . . Because Walker plausibly alleges that there were no exigent circumstances justifying the officers' failure to announce, the defendants' motions to dismiss must be denied as to Count II. . . .Walker claims that the officers, who were in plain clothes, failed to announce when they entered Taylor's apartment and thus created a dangerous situation that led to his single shot at the officers. . . Walker further alleges that Mattingly and Cosgrove returned fire at Taylor and Walker, despite Cosgrove's inability to clearly see them. . . Walker distinguishes the officers' failure to announce upon entry from their failure to announce when they knocked. . . The Sixth Circuit has stated that 'where "the events preceding the shooting occurred in close temporal proximity to the shooting, those events have been considered in analyzing whether excessive force was used."'. . Mattingly and Cosgrove, citing Chappell v. City of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 914 (6th Cir. 2009), argue that their decisions upon entry are 'irrelevant' to the excessive-force analysis, making their return of fire reasonable and entitling them to qualified immunity. . . Yet their reliance on Chappell is misplaced. . . In Chappell, the court did not consider the officers' unlawful entry because the entry did not happen simultaneously with or mere moments before the shooting, as it did here. . . Rather, the excessive-force claim stemmed from the officers' entry into an upstairs bedroom after their entry into the residence from the downstairs front door. . . And notably, Chappell involved a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. . .The Court acknowledges that '[a] different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.' Cty. of Los Angeles v.

Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1544 (2017). But Walker alleges a failure-to-knock-and-announce claim separate from the excessive-force claim, which stems from the officers' failure to announce upon entry. . . Here, the officers' failure to announce upon entry occurred either simultaneously with or mere seconds before the shooting. . . Under the facts alleged, whether Mattingly and Cosgrove acted reasonably and thus are entitled to qualified immunity cannot be resolved at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . .In reaching this conclusion, the Court heeds the Sixth Circuit's admonition against ' "resolv[ing] a Rule 12(b)(6) motion on qualified immunity grounds" because development of the factual record is frequently necessary to decide whether the official's actions violated clearly established law.'. . 'Although an officer's "entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . Notably, Mattingly and Cosgrove have cited no Sixth Circuit case where the court granted a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on an excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity when the defendants were accused of discharging a firearm at the plaintiff. . . . Here, additional factual development is necessary to determine whether Mattingly and Cosgrove are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Walker asserts that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell should be held liable for failing to identify themselves upon entry and for failing to intervene when Mattingly, Hankison, and Cosgrove shot at him. . . Walker does not claim that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell discharged their firearms. . . Therefore, Walker's excessive-force claim against these defendants depends on their failure to intervene when other officers shot at him. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell argue that they 'did not discharge[ ] their weapons' and thus cannot be found liable for the other officers' alleged use of excessive force. . . These defendants, however, fail to address their alleged failure to intervene. . . And contrary to their assertion, they can be held liable for other officers' use of excessive force if they '(1) "observed or had reason to know that excessive force would be or was being used, and (2) ... had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring."'. . . Taking all facts in the complaint as true, as the Court is required to do at this stage, the Court finds that Walker has plausibly alleged that Jaynes, Mattingly, Goodlett, and Nobles obtained a warrant to search Taylor's apartment that was invalid. Huckelberry, Phan, and Burbrink, however, are entitled to qualified immunity for the constitutionally defective warrant. Walker has also plausibly alleged that Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, Campbell, and Hankison . . . failed to announce before entering Taylor's apartment and that Mattingly and Cosgrove used unreasonable and excessive force against him. Because Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell do not address Walker's allegation that they failed to intervene when the other officers allegedly used excessive force, this claim against them also survives."); Flores on behalf of Jackson v. This Court is obligated to assess 'whether the totality of the circumstances justifie[s] a particular sort of search or seizure.'. . Disregarding Officer Henderson's conduct before the shooting, as defendants request, would violate our obligation. I conclude that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged reckless conduct by Officer Henderson that precipitated his use of force against Mr. Jackson. Accepting plaintiff's factual allegations, this is a situation where Officer Henderson forcefully entered an apartment that he knew contained only a single individual undergoing a mental health crisis so severe that the disturbed individual phoned in a 911 emergency that a fellow officer later admitted that he thought was a prank[.] Despite knowing that Mr. Jackson 'did not pose a danger to anyone' because he was alone in that apartment and 'the immediate vicinity to the apartment was clear of all individuals,'. . . Further, the complaint alleges — and I must accept as true — that Officer Henderson knew Mr. Jackson was not holding hostages when he entered the apartment. Officer Henderson's lack of 'clear visual contact' with Mr. Jackson prior to the shooting . . . arguably makes his conduct more egregious, not less. The officers in Allen, Sevier, and Hastings saw that the plaintiff was armed and dangerous. Officer Henderson merely guessed as much. Finally, Tenth Circuit precedent puts no weight on whether a plaintiff is 'obviously suicidal.'. . The officers in Sevier did not believe they were responding to a suicide call. . . Because plaintiff alleges facts showing that Officer Henderson violated Mr. Jackson's clearly established constitutional rights, his qualified immunity defense fails at this stage of litigation."); Hall for the Estate of Young v. Braun, No. 3:17-CV-481-BJB-RSE, 2021 WL 2763177, at *5-7 (W.D. Ky. According to the Estate, the officers' decision to enter the abandoned home, armed but warrantless, and run up a 'fatal funnel' with no 'opportunity for orderly retreat' (as the Estate describes the stairwell) 'was part and parcel of their decision to shoot Mr. Young.'. . To ward off summary judgment, the Estate urges the Court to adopt a more expansive view of the actions that comprised and caused the officers' use of force. However persuasive this account might be as a matter of logic, it fails as a matter of law. Binding law of the Sixth Circuit squarely rejects the Estate's invitation to examine the causal contribution of officer decisions preceding the shooting by several minutes. Courts in this Circuit assessing the constitutionality of force must consider only whether the 'seizure' itself was justified when the officer acted. . . The actions that occur in the 'hours and minutes' leading up to the use of force are 'immaterial.'. . These preceding actions, in order to be redressable in court, would have to independently violate the Fourth Amendment (or some other constitutional provision). The Sixth Circuit, in Livermore, rejected the Ninth Circuit's alternative approach, which would allow excessive-force claims to proceed 'if the defendant police officers acted recklessly in creating the circumstances which required the use of deadly force.'. . The Supreme Court, though reserving judgment on the precise question the Estate raises, recently took a similar tack in Mendez. . . . Earlier constitutional violations 'cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.'. . Here, the Estate did not assert a separate constitutional claim with respect to the officers' preceding actions. Rather, it rolled those actions into its account of why the officers used excessive force in ultimately shooting Young. . . . In the end, the Estate more-or-less acknowledges that the law limits this Court's excessive-force analysis to the circumstances immediately surrounding the officers' use of force. It states that 'this case highlights all the problems with an overly restrictive application' of a narrow excessive-force analysis, and that '[i]f the law does not incentivize the police' to avoid circumstances where they put people at risk of harm, then the law must change.'. . The Estate is correct that this Court is bound by precedent. And those precedents require the Court to examine only the circumstances immediately preceding the officers' use of force in an excessive-force analysis. . . This case offers no basis for the Court to distinguish or depart from that binding precedent."); Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. United States, 506 F.Supp.3d 104, ___ (D. Mass. 2020) ("Defendants argue that St. Hilaire is no longer good law after County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1546-47 (2019), which they contend stands for the proposition that the reasonableness inquiry is focused on an officer's actions at the precise moment deadly force was used. But the Supreme Court's holding in Mendez was limited to rejecting the Ninth Circuit's so-called 'provocation rule' which allowed inquiry into a separate constitutional violation when considering the use of force: 'All we hold today is that once a use of force is deemed reasonable under Graham, . . . it may not be found unreasonable by reference to some separate constitutional violation.'. . As another district court has summarized, the Supreme Court did not decide the propriety of considering 'unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use it.' Arnold v. City of Olathe, Kansas, 413 F. Supp. 3d 1087, 1106 (D. Kan. 2019)."); Smith v. Ford, No. 5:19-CV-00312-TES, 2020 WL 5647484, at *9-*10 & n.9 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 22, 2020) ("The undisputed facts support Defendants' argument that the SWAT Team officers' use of force against Smith was reasonable. An objectively reasonable officer, upon having a shotgun fired at him or her in close quarters, would perceive the shooter to pose an imminent and serious threat to him and his fellow officers at the time of the shooting. While the officers had no specific or particular knowledge of Smith being armed or dangerous before entering Smith's home, that changed when Smith fired his shotgun. At that point, the officers were in a life-threatening situation and a reasonable officer in the Defendants' position would conclude that deadly force was necessary in that situation to preserve his or her own life. Accordingly, the Defendants did not use excessive force in this particular case and thus, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs argue that Defendants' conduct leading up to the moment when they shot Smith caused the danger that made the use of force necessary. . . Specifically, Plaintiffs argue that 'to the extent Defendants claim that someone can be arrested for their response to being unlawfully arrested or assaulted, it is established law [that] Defendants cannot initiate conduct to cause or precipitate the need for an arrest, and then claim immunity from civil liability.'. . Plaintiffs cite to Perkins v. Thrasher, 701 F. App'x 887, 890 (11th Cir. 2017), where officers were denied qualified immunity when they provoked the plaintiff into obstructing arrest necessitating the use of force. . . Plaintiffs argue that this is a similar situation, because 'Rainer Smith was responding to an unlawful entry into his home by heavily armed intruders who did not announce who they were.' Plaintiffs' argument reminds the Court of the old 'provocation rule' that was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1543-44 (2017). The 'provocation rule' provided that '[i]f law enforcement officers make a seizure of a person using force that is judged to be reasonable based on a consideration of the circumstances relevant to that determination, [ ]the officers nevertheless [may] be held liable for injuries caused by the seizure on the ground that they committed a separate Fourth Amendment violation that contributed to their need to use force.'. . The Supreme Court held that 'the Fourth Amendment provides no basis for such a rule.'. . Accordingly, a 'different Fourth Amendment violation,' which here is an unlawful entry into Smith's residence as explained above, 'cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.'. .In sum, applying the objective reasonableness test shows that the use of deadly force on Smith was reasonable at the moment the force was used, and the officers' unlawful entry does not change that.[9] [fn. 9: Plaintiffs' unlawful entry claim survives summary judgment, and Plaintiffs' excessive force claim does not. 'Although § 1983 addresses only constitutional torts, § 1983 defendants are, as in common law tort suits, responsible for the natural and foreseeable consequences of their actions.'. . 'For damages to be proximately caused by a constitutional tort, a plaintiff must show that, except for that constitutional tort, such injuries and damages would not have occurred and further that such injuries and damages were the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the tortious acts or omissions in issue.'. . So, while Defendants are not liable for the 'excessive force' claim, they are liable for any and all reasonably foreseeable damages caused by their unlawful entry violation that may ultimately be proven at trial."); Estate of Hollstein v. City of Zion, No. 17 C 00112, 2019 WL 1619976, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 16, 2019) ("In County of Los Angeles, California v. Mendez, the Supreme Court rejected the Ninth Circuit's 'provocation rule.'. . Mendez held that, so long as an officer's use of force was reasonable at the time of the seizure, the officer's pre-seizure violation of the Fourth Amendment cannot be the basis for liability for the seizure itself. . . But the opinion left open two other inquiries in which an officer's pre-seizure conduct might still be relevant. First, if an earlier violation of the Fourth Amendment was the proximate cause of the harm arising from the use of force applied at the time of the seizure, then the victim could recover (subject to qualified immunity) damages that are proximately caused by the earlier Fourth Amendment violation. . . But here, the Estate has not argued that the officers' allegedly improper initial stop or attempt at the arrest proximately caused Hollstein's death. The argument does not show up in the Plaintiff's summary judgment briefing, nor does the First Amended Complaint describe the officers' initial attempt to arrest Hollstein as a cause of the fatal shooting. . . In any event, the argument would likely have fallen short, because the struggle between Hollstein and the officers—including Hollstein's attempt to reach for Hucker's gun—would almost surely have been deemed an intervening event that broke the chain of proximate cause between the attempted arrest and the firing of the shots. And again, at the very least, qualified immunity would apply in this factual setting. Mendez also leaves open the possibility that an initial Fourth Amendment violation could be considered as part of the totality of the circumstances that might render an officer's use of force excessive. . . In any event, the officer's initial stop—even if there was no basis for it—did not foreseeably create the need to use excessive force. Nothing about the way the officers conducted the flawed stop and arrest would foreseeably lead to Hollstein wrestling with the officers and reaching for Hucker's gun. To illustrate this point, consider a very different example. Imagine that a police officer encounters a man who is crossing a street outside of the marked crosswalk, and jay-walking is a crime. The officer instructs the jay-walker to stop, and the officer draws and points his gun right at the jay-walker. In response, the pedestrian tries to grab the officer's gun, which then prompts the officer to shoot the man. It is arguably foreseeable that the pedestrian, reacting to this life-threatening scenario, would try to grab the officer's gun. On those facts, the officer's abrupt, unnecessary, and life-threatening escalation of the encounter would make it much more likely (that is, foreseeable) that the officer's own conduct before shooting the pedestrian created the need to use deadly force, even though at the moment of the shooting, the pedestrian was grabbing for the officer's gun. Here, the situation is much different: the officers drove up to Hollstein and began questioning him. Nothing they did, even attempting to arrest him on an allegedly mistaken view that Hollstein had to provide identification, would foreseeably create the struggle, Hollstein's attempt to grab the gun, and the ensuing shooting. Qualified immunity must apply here because the officers did not violate clearly established law.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Fenwick v. Pudimott, 778 F.3d 133, 137-40 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Our concurring colleague would have us decide this case at the first step and hold that, pursuant to Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), the deputies' actions plainly complied with the Fourth Amendment. In our view, however, the constitutional question is hardly clear, and Plumhoff—a case in which the fleeing suspect led police on a protracted high-speed chase, . . .—has little to say about the quite different situation the deputies faced here. The officers in Plumhoff resorted to deadly force only after the suspect placed in peril the lives of dozens of innocent civilians during his 100 mile-per-hour flight and only after they sought to end the chase through non-lethal means. . . In this case, by contrast, although the deputies opened fire after Fenwick clipped Officer Pudimott with the car's side-view mirror, Fenwick posed no immediate threat to either officers or bystanders at the time of the shooting. . . Given these significant differences between this case and Plumhoff, we think the constitutional question is 'far from obvious,'. . . and that this case is therefore best resolved at the second step. We thus proceed directly to consider whether the deputies' use of deadly force violated law that was clearly established at the time of the shooting. . . . This case features an 'added wrinkle': a videotape capturing the incident in question. . . . But in contrast to the videotape in Scott, which 'quite clearly' portrayed the events at issue, . . . the surveillance footage here does no such thing. . . .The videotape thus provides no 'ready answers to the factual dispute' and does little to affect our analysis. . . But other important wrinkles—namely, the Heck bar and collateral estoppel—constrain how we view the facts. As the district court explained, the Superior Court Judge, in finding that Fenwick committed felony assault on Pudimott, 'necessarily determined that [Fenwick] created "a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury" to Deputy Pudimott when, "without justifiable [and] excusable cause," he drove the car forward in a manner that put the deputy in danger of being hit.'. . . Although Fenwick urges us to ignore these 'bad facts,'. . . we are bound by Heck v. Humphrey and the Supreme Court's admonishment that 'a federal court must give to a state-court judgment the same preclusive effect as would be given that judgment under the law of the State in which the judgment was rendered.'. . . That said, several facts weigh in Fenwick's favor, including (1) the deputies' concession in this court that Pudimott and Fischer fired on Fenwick only after the vehicle struck Pudimott, when Pudimott was no longer in the car's path, . . . (2) the Superior Court's findings that Fenwick did nothing to endanger Mickle or Fischer during his flight, . . .and (3) the surveillance footage showing no bystanders in the path of Fenwick's car. Thus distilled the record reveals, on the one hand, that the deputies confronted a fleeing motorist who posed no immediate threat to either officers or bystanders when they opened fire, and on the other hand, that the deputies had observed pedestrians and vehicles close by in the minutes leading up to the shooting and, just moments before firing, had seen the fleeing suspect 'create [ ] a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury to [an] officer.'. . With 'the specific context of th[is] case' now in mind, . . . we turn to the officers' claim that their use of deadly force to apprehend Fenwick 'to protect one or more of the deputies or members of the general public from harm,'. . . violated no clearly established law. . . . We agree with the deputies that our inquiry begins and ends with Supreme Court precedent—in particular, Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194 (2004). . . .Reviewing these facts and relevant precedent, the Supreme Court 'express[ed] no view' on the Fourth Amendment question, but determined that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity as her actions 'fell in the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . For us to reach a different conclusion about qualified immunity in this case, Fenwick must show either that the deputies' conduct was 'materially different from the conduct in Brosseau' or that between the incident in Brosseau and January 2007—when Fenwick was shot—there 'emerged either controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority that would alter our analysis.'. . Fenwick has done neither. He has made no attempt to distinguish Brosseau, and we doubt he could do so in a meaningful way. . . . Nor has Fenwick shown that Brosseau's analysis had become obsolete at the time the deputies shot him. . . For these reasons, unlike the district court, we see no genuine issue of material fact that precludes summary judgment for the deputies based on qualified immunity. Whether the deputies shot Fenwick while Pudimott was still in danger from Fenwick's car, or whether they shot him in the seconds after that danger had passed, Brosseau makes clear that the deputies' use of deadly force violated no law that was clearly established at the time of the shooting. In reaching this conclusion, we emphasize that nothing in this opinion should be read to suggest that qualified immunity will shield from liability every law enforcement officer in this circuit who fires on a fleeing motorist out of asserted concern for other officers and bystanders. Outside the context of a 'dangerous high-speed car chase,'. . . deadly force, as the Supreme Court made clear in Garner, . . . ordinarily may not be used to apprehend a fleeing suspect who poses no immediate threat to others—whether or not the suspect is behind the wheel. . . . Because Fenwick operated his car in a way that endangered an officer, in an area recently traversed by pedestrians and other vehicles no less, it was not clearly established that the deputies violated the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force to prevent his flight. Accordingly, we cannot say that Pudimott and Fischer had 'fair notice that [their] conduct was unlawful.'. . The deputies are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Fenwick v. Pudimott, 778 F.3d 133, 140-42 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (Karen LeCraft Henderson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I agree with my colleagues that the deputies are plainly entitled to qualified immunity. . . I further agree that our inquiry starts and ends with United States Supreme Court precedent. . . But in my view, it is the Supreme Court's more recent opinion in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), that controls Fenwick's case. And, in contrast with Brosseau v.

Haugen, 543 U.S. 194 (2004), which speaks only to the second qualified-immunity—inquiry—'whether the deputies' use of deadly force violated law that was clearly established at the time of the shooting,' Maj. Op. 7—Plumhoff establishes that the deputies' actions were 'objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them.'. . Accordingly, their actions did not violate Fenwick's Fourth Amendment rights at all. . . .Although Fenwick's case lacks the drama of the highspeed chase in Plumhoff, the factual differences between Plumhoff and Fenwick's case do not make the former inapposite. Rather, the principle animating Plumhoff is dispositive here. As the district court, in summarizing the relevant portion of the superior court's findings, put it, Fenwick 'created a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury to Deputy Pudimott when, without justifiable or excusable cause, he drove the car forward in a manner that put the deputy in danger of being hit.'. . Based on the 'grave public safety risk' that Fenwick created, Plumhoff establishes that the deputies 'acted reasonably in using deadly force.'. .My colleagues consider 'the constitutional question' in this case to be 'close.'. . But the 'facts [that] weigh in Fenwick's favor' are largely immaterial. . . My colleagues also find significant 'the deputies' concession' that they 'fired on Fenwick only after the vehicle struck Pudimott, when Pudimott was no longer in the car's path.'. . But under Plumhoff, once Fenwick threatened bodily injury to Pudimott, the deputies were not obligated to stop firing 'until the threat ha [d] ended.'. . And nothing in the record demonstrates that a reasonable officer would have concluded, in the few seconds that passed after Fenwick's car struck Pudimott, that Fenwick was no longer dangerous. . . . Here, the deputies had every reason to believe that civilians 'might' be in harm's way if the deputies did not neutralize the threat Fenwick's reckless behavior posed. . . As my colleagues recognize, the deputies 'observed pedestrians and vehicles close by in the minutes leading up to the shooting.'. . . On these facts, the deputies' actions were 'objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them,'. . . and I would hold that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Arrington v. United States, 473 F.3d 329, 339, 340 (D.C. Cir. 2006) ("Appellant makes the claim, supported by sworn testimony, that he was disarmed, thrown to the ground, handcuffed, and severely beaten by appellees for ten minutes. Appellees maintain, also by sworn testimony, that in order to disarm appellant, who they believed had just shot a USPP officer in the face, it was necessary to hold him down and beat him for ten minutes, using their fists, a telescopic baton, and the grip of a handgun, and then instruct a patrol dog to bite his leg. If all of the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to appellant, as required by Rule 56(c), appellees surely are not entitled to judgment as a matter of law. . . . Our dissenting colleague may or may not be right in her characterization of the facts. But fact finding is not the role of the appellate court. That the dissent strains mightily in this misplaced fact finding effort serves only to highlight the existence of a genuine issue of material fact. It is also noteworthy that three criminal juries have deadlocked on counts charging Arrington with attempting to murder a federal officer and discharging a firearm during a crime of violence. . . Obviously, the testimony of the police officers is not as clear cut as the dissent would have it. In any event, the trier of fact in this civil case will have an opportunity to sort this out.").

Barham v. Ramsey, 434 F.3d 565, 572-75, 577 (D.C. Cir. 2006) ("In this case, it is clear that the 'threshold question' for evaluating Newsham's claim to qualified immunity must be answered in the affirmative, because 'the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right,'. . . . The essence of plaintiffs' claim is that a diverse assemblage of people–including many who were engaging in political speech protected by the First Amendment and others who were merely there as observers or passersby–was caught in a mass arrest that was devoid of probable cause. . . . We have no trouble in concluding that plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were clearly established in the circumstances of the mass arrest. No reasonable officer in Newsham's position could have believed that probable cause existed to order the sudden arrest of every individual in Pershing Park. . . . While we have no reason to doubt that unlawful activity might have occurred in the course of the protest–with some individuals engaging in disorderly conduct, for example–the simple, dispositive fact here is that appellants have proffered no facts capable of supporting the proposition that Newsham had reasonable, particularized grounds to believe every one of the 386 people arrested was observed committing a crime. . . . Our case law addressing large-scale demonstration scenarios does not suspend– or even qualify–the normal operation of the Fourth Amendment's probable cause requirements. Rather, this case law merely amplifies one essential premise that has a bearing on the case at hand: when compelling circumstances are present, the police may be justified in detaining an undifferentiated crowd of protestors, but only after providing a lawful order to disperse followed by a reasonable opportunity to comply with that order. . . . Having found that the mass arrest Newsham ordered violated clearly established constitutional rights, we now examine whether Chief Ramsey's involvement with the arrest deprives him of qualified immunity. Ramsey's participation in the arrests is distinct from Newsham's in a critical respect: he denies knowing that the park had not been cleared of law-abiding bystanders. If this claim is validated, Ramsey might be entitled to maintain his qualified immunity. The record assembled for summary judgment, however, does not permit a definitive resolution of this factual question. Thus, under the Supreme Court's holding in Johnson, 515 U.S. at 307, the District Court's decision denying Ramsey's motion for summary judgment is not appealable.").

Louis v. District of Columbia, 59 F.Supp.3d 135, 149-50 (D.D.C. 2014) ("Under the totality of the circumstances, no reasonable jury could find that the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable fashion when breaching the bathroom door. . . Even considering the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, Lieutenant Glover's decision, after hours of failed negotiation, to take advantage of an apparent opportunity to apprehend Louis without incident, was reasonable. . . That the plan failed is ultimately irrelevant to the question of whether the plan, as executed, was objectively reasonable. In the alternative, it is arguable that Officer Riggins would be protected by qualified immunity because he was merely following his superior officer's objectively reasonable order to breach the bathroom door. The Court recognizes that thirty years ago the D.C. Circuit refused to accept a 'just following orders' defense from defendants who had complied with an agency's approved policy. . . However, the D.C. Circuit did not foreclose the possibility of the defense applying in another case. . . Indeed, as other Circuits have held in cases more recent than Hobson, a 'just following orders' defense may establish qualified immunity when 'plausible instructions from a superior or fellow officer ... viewed objectively in light of the surrounding circumstances ... could lead a reasonable officer to conclude that the necessary legal justification for his actions exists.'. . Here, because there is no genuine dispute as to whether a reasonable officer in Officer Riggins's position would have concluded (correctly) that the 'necessary legal justification' existed for breaching the bathroom door, the Court concludes it is at least arguable that Officer Riggins is independently protected by qualified immunity pursuant to the 'just following orders' defense. Accordingly, in light of all of the facts and circumstances, no reasonable jury could find that Officer Riggins's participation in the breach of the bathroom door or ultimate use of deadly force against Louis was so excessive that no reasonable officer could have believed it was lawful. Therefore, Officer Riggins is entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's section 1983 excessive force claim, and the Court will grant his motion for summary judgment as to Count V.")

Fagre v. Parks, 985 F.3d 16, 23-24 (1st Cir. 2021) ("No reasonable jury could conclude that it was unreasonable for Trooper Parks to believe that the driver posed an immediate threat. When Trooper Parks fired into the Durango, the suspect was attempting to ram Trooper Parks and his cruiser at full speed. . . That Trooper Parks climbed a snowbank did not remove the oncoming danger to him from the Durango or from his own cruiser once rammed by the Durango. The Durango passed within a few feet of Trooper Parks before hitting his police cruiser. It was travelling fast enough that, when it did hit his cruiser, the Durango pushed it fifty feet down the road. Had the driver changed course even slightly, he could have rammed into Trooper Parks instead of the police cruiser or rammed the police cruiser into the snowbank where Trooper Parks was. Fagre's argument that Trooper Parks was not in immediate danger because the Durango did not hit him and appeared to turn slightly away from him before hitting the cruiser is not persuasive. It relies on the '20/20 vision of hindsight,' not the 'perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.'. .Trooper Parks also knew that the suspect had a gun. The driver, who had, moments earlier, fired his gun at another police officer and was now accelerating at full speed toward Trooper Parks, could have shot at Trooper Parks from the Durango. The Durango came close enough to Trooper Parks for the armed driver to pose an immediate threat. In the aftermath of the crash, the armed driver would also pose a risk to Trooper Parks or other officers at the scene. No reasonable jury could have concluded that Trooper Parks did not reasonably believe his life was in danger. There was no Fourth Amendment violation and summary judgment on Fagre's § 1983 claim was warranted. Trooper Parks was also entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Trooper Parks did not violate a federal statutory or constitutional right. Further, on these facts, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would have concluded that his life was not in danger. The Supreme Court has 'stressed the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The case law does not clearly establish that it is unreasonable for an officer to conclude his life is in danger and to use potentially deadly force under circumstances like these.")

Conlogue v. Hamilton, 906 F.3d 150, 155-57, 159 (1st Cir. 2018) ("Even if we assume arguendo that Hamilton's action was contrary to a consensus of controlling authority, we are satisfied that an objectively reasonable officer standing in Hamilton's shoes would have thought it appropriate to deploy deadly force against an armed man who, after a nearly three-and-one-half-hour standoff in which he was repeatedly warned to drop his weapon, persisted in pointing a loaded semi-automatic firearm narrowly above the heads of three officers and within easy firing range. . . .We cannot say that an objectively reasonable police officer standing in Hamilton's shoes would have thought it a violation of the law to deploy deadly force in these highly charged circumstances. Under these circumstances, Hamilton reasonably perceived Conlogue to be an imminent threat, with no less drastic means of remediation at hand. . . . As we said at the outset, this is a tragic case. But the facts of record make pellucid that the police were faced with a nightmare scenario—a scenario in which an armed and disturbed individual wholly disregarded serial entreaties to disarm and engaged in a course of conduct that gradually elevated the level of threat. Tension mounted over time, and when the armed individual took actions that placed officers at imminent risk of serious bodily harm, Hamilton—reasonably concluding that no less drastic means of remediation were feasible—fired the fatal shot. Under the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that the district court's entry of summary judgment in Hamilton's favor on the basis of qualified immunity must be Affirmed.")

Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 35-42 (1st Cir. 2016) ("Where an officer creates conditions that are highly likely to cause harm and unnecessarily so, and the risk so created actually, but accidentally, causes harm, the case is not removed from Fourth Amendment scrutiny. . . .The defendants, however, argue that, as a matter of law, the Fourth Amendment does not apply to Duncan's conduct because the shooting itself was unintentional, and thus not 'means intentionally applied,' Brower, 489 U.S. at 597 (emphasis omitted). The heart of their argument is that regardless of Duncan's actions leading up to the moment he pulled the trigger, the inadvertence of the shot shields him from Fourth Amendment scrutiny. We cannot agree. The defendants' proposed rule has the perverse effect of immunizing risky behavior only when the foreseeable harm of that behavior comes to pass. . . .There is widespread agreement among the circuits that have addressed the issue that a claim is stated under the Fourth Amendment for objectively unreasonable conduct during the effectuation of a seizure that results in the unintentional discharge of an officer's firearm. [collecting cases] . . . .We find these cases relied on by the defendants to be distinguishable in light of Brower's clear command. To be sure, both Dodd and Brower recognize that Fourth Amendment liability only attaches to intentional conduct. But to the extent that Dodd, or any of the other cases cited by the defendants, can be read for the proposition that unintended harms arising from intentional and unreasonable police conduct are never within the purview of the Fourth Amendment, they are not good law in light of Brower. . . Our decision today, on the other hand, flows necessarily from Brower. While in Brower 'the very instrumentality set in motion' was the tractor-trailer roadblock, here it was the assault rifle. In both cases, the instrumentality was set in motion in a highly dangerous fashion, and the resulting deaths were accidents. But in neither case does-nor should-the accidental result of the dangerous conduct prevent Fourth Amendment review. . . . We believe that the state of the law was clear such that a reasonable officer in Duncan's position would have understood that pointing his loaded assault rifle at the head of a prone, non-resistant, innocent person who presents no danger, with the safety off and a finger on the trigger, constituted excessive force in violation of that person's Fourth Amendment rights. . . In concluding that this case must go to a jury for determination, we rely on Brower and on our prior circuit precedent, and we confirm our ruling by observing that clearly settled Fourth Amendment law as of the time of Stamps's death fully cohered with commonly accepted precepts on appropriate use of firearms and appropriate police procedures. . . .This case bears a remarkable resemblance to Mlodzinski. Both cases involve officers pointing firearms at the heads of innocent, compliant individuals during the course of SWAT team raids at residences thought to be occupied by other individuals who were dangerous. And neither the sister nor the mother in Mlodzinski, nor Stamps, was thought to be dangerous. Mlodzinski affirms that as of at least August 2, 2006, the date of the raid at issue in that case, the state of the law was clear enough to put police officers on notice that a warrant to conduct a SWAT raid does not grant them license to aim their weapons at the heads of submissive and nonthreatening bystanders. . . As we recognized, this is especially true where, as here, a jury could find that the officer is not forced to act based on a split-second judgment about the appropriate level of force to employ. . . Reviewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, a jury could find that Duncan had adequate time to determine that there was no reasonable threat posed by Stamps and to calibrate his use of force accordingly. . . .In light of Mlodzinski, as well as long-standing precedent from other circuits, a reasonable officer in early 2011 would have understood that Duncan's conduct, as a jury could find it, violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. [collecting cases] We acknowledge that each of these cases presented unique sets of facts that in some respects differ from the facts presented in the case at hand. Nonetheless, their factual differences do not obscure or detract from the straightforward rule that, collectively, they all espouse. When considered alongside Mlodzinski, these cases plainly put police officers in these circumstances on notice that pointing a firearm at a person in a manner that creates a risk of harm incommensurate with any police necessity can amount to a Fourth Amendment violation. On the facts as a jury might find them to be in this case (safety off, finger on the trigger, and gun pointed at the head of a prone person known not to pose any particular risk), it was clear under existing law that Duncan used his gun in a manner that unlawfully created such a risk. In light of what we have just said, we conclude that Duncan, 'in the "situation [he] confronted,"'. . . was on notice that his actions could be found violative of Stamps's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Existing precedent places this conclusion 'beyond debate[.]'")

Mitchell v. Miller, 790 F.3d 73, 77-78(1st Cir. 2015) ("[T]he Supreme Court has urged us to 'think carefully before expending scarce judicial resources to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will have no effect on the outcome of the case.'. . The district court took this approach, and we will likewise move straight to the second prong. . . .As the Supreme Court has since instructed, 'Brosseau makes plain that as of February 21, 1999–the date of the events at issue in that case-it was not clearly established that it was unconstitutional to shoot a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger.' Plumhoff, 134 S.Ct. at 2023.")

McGrath v. Tavares, 757 F.3d 20, 29-31 (1st Cir. 2014) ("In sum, for McGrath to succeed on her Fourth Amendment claim, she must establish that Officer Tavares's shooting at Anthony was not objectively reasonable 'in light of the circumstances and the facts known to [him] at the time.'. . She cannot. As we just mentioned, Officer Tavares's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable because a reasonable officer in the same circumstances could have believed Anthony posed a threat of (at the very least) serious physical harm to his person when he fired shots one and two, and an identical threat to Officer Almeida when he fired shots three and four. . . A reasonable officer could have likewise concluded Anthony 'would once again pose a deadly threat for others' if he had resumed his flight. . .Moreover, Officer Tavares's third and fourth shots are also justified by Anthony's failure to abandon his attempt to flee after the initial two shots were fired, continuing to pose an imminent threat to the public. . . Because the record does not establish a Fourth Amendment violation, McGrath's claim cannot survive summary judgment. . . . In any event, even if a constitutional violation was established, Defendants would still be entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity because they did not violate clearly established law. . . . [T]he Plumhoff Court tells us that to overcome a qualified immunity defense in a case where a police officer fired at 'a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger,' a plaintiff would have to show 'at a minimum' that the officer's conduct is 'materially different from the conduct in Brosseau' or that between February 21, 1999, and the date of the alleged constitutional violation 'there emerged either controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority that would alter our analysis of the qualified immunity question.' . . McGrath cannot show either. The facts in this case are more favorable to the shooting police officer than the facts in Brosseau. First, the police officer in Brosseau fired at the driver when he 'had just begun to flee and ... had not yet driven his car in a dangerous manner.'. . Whereas here, Officer Tavares fired his weapon during a car chase 'that indisputably posed a danger both to the officers involved and to any civilians who happened to be nearby.'. . Second, the suspect driver in Brosseau was not driving towards the police officer when the officer shot him, and thus, did not present as imminent of a threat to the police officer as in this case. . . .All things said, McGrath does not point us to any case since Brosseau that clearly establishes the unconstitutionality of using deadly force to end a car chase that threatened the physical safety of the police officers and others in the area.")

Kenney v. Floyd, 700 F.3d 604, 609, 610 (1st Cir. 2012) ("Officer McKay was not required to give up the chase after Kenney fled [citing Scott v. Harris] and was entitled to employ 'some degree of physical coercion ... to effect [the second stop],' Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, 109 S.Ct. 1865. Faced with an uncooperative motorist, who posed a continued risk of flight, Officer McKay's decisions to push Kenney's vehicle out of the roadway and then, once Kenney's car was stopped, to pepper spray Kenney, were reasonable under these circumstances. Officer McKay nudged Kenney's vehicle away from an active two-lane highway, which enhanced his own safety and reduced the likelihood of continued flight or injury to others on the roadway. Plaintiff did not proffer any evidence that the force Officer McKay exerted on Kenney's car threatened the safety of Kenney or his passenger. . . As to McKay's use of pepper spray, the district court explained that, '[u]nlike in cases where the use of pepper spray was held to constitute excessive force, Kenney was not a peaceful, compliant, and secured suspect who could pose no threat to the officer seeking to detain him.'. . Relying on the Eleventh Circuit's opinion in Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir.2002), which noted that '[c]ourts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is reasonable ... where the plaintiff was either resisting arrest or refusing police requests,' id. at 1348, the district court concluded that Officer McKay's use of pepper spray here was reasonable. There is ample support for the district court's conclusion . . . and we agree.")

Asociacion De Periodistas De Puerto Rico v. Mueller, 680 F.3d 70, 81-84 (1st Cir. 2012) (appeal after remand) ("We need not follow the steps of the qualified immunity analysis sequentially. . . We also needn't follow the same analytical path as the district court. . . We therefore turn directly to whether reasonable officers would have known that their conduct was unlawful. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff reporters, the agents' actions were still reasonable in light of the combustible situation that they faced. . . . Given the perceived noncompliance by the crowd inside the complex, the previous verbal threats, the presence of FBI personnel, civilians and evidence within the vicinity, and the serious concerns about maintaining control of the area, the agents reasonably could have concluded that the level of force that they used was appropriate. . . . The individual claims of plaintiffs Fernández and Lago require additional discussion. . . . To be sure, a jury might find that the agents were mistaken and that Lago had, in fact, not attempted to strike any of the agents. The jury could also find that he fell to the ground in confusion and pain. But it is also true that the defendants could reasonably have perceived Lago as one who resisted leaving the compound. Qualified immunity protects officers from their 'reasonable mistakes,'. . . and given the chaotic situation, we cannot conclude that the agents' actions constituted unreasonable mistakes. Fernández's situation is distinguishable from those of the other plaintiffs because he never intruded inside the gate and was on the street-side of the fence when he was pepper sprayed at very close range. He also claims that the FBI agent who sprayed him targeted him personally. . . .Fernández claims to have been singled out, but the agent says that he was attempting to spray agitated crowd members threatening the officers by the gate. While we take disputed facts in favor of the plaintiffs, Fernández's allegations regarding the subjective beliefs of the agent are pure speculation. . . Given the circumstances, we conclude that a similarly situated reasonable agent could have made the same decisions. . . In sum, we affirm the grant of summary judgment on the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims on the grounds of qualified immunity.")

McInnis v. Maine, 638 F.3d 18, 22 (1st Cir. 2011) ("[L]iability for McInnis's arrest turns entirely on the fact element of the qualified immunity standard, on whether the arresting officer could reasonably have believed that McInnis was violating probation. As to this, the probation officer's representation was surely sufficient in and of itself, though in this case there was more. Randall confirmed the probation status when Deetjen prudently called him after McInnis denied it, and Deetjen had dealt with Randall for thirty years without any indication of shoddiness that might have discounted the reliability of Randall's word. As we explain more fully below, there was no genuine dispute as to these facts, which provided the officers with probable cause to believe McInnis was subject to arrest for violating the terms of a valid probation order, and they thus obviously qualified under the standard recognizing immunity 'so long as the presence of probable cause is at least arguable.'")

Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31, 53, 55 (1st Cir. 2009) ("We. . .conclude that forcing a prisoner to undergo an invasive abdominal surgery for the purpose of determining whether or not he is hiding a cell phone in his rectum is a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Moreover, because the surgery described in the complaint and its attendant circumstances were so outrageous, we comfortably conclude that a reasonable officer would understand that, under the particular facts of this case, the surgery violated plaintiff's clearly established right to be free from an unreasonable search. . . . In summary, a reasonable doctor should have understood that the surgery at issue here, performed at the insistence of the correctional authorities and not for plaintiff's benefit, violated plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures. The invasive surgery described in the complaint–conducted without the force of judicial authorization and for the sole purpose of extracting contraband that had resisted discovery in multiple rectal searches and two forced bowel movements–fell beyond any objective test of reasonableness. On the facts alleged, we do not need to identify the precise level of familiarity with the Fourth Amendment fairly chargeable to a physician acting as a state agent. No detailed knowledge of the law was required to understand that a physician should not perform invasive, non-medically required surgery on a prisoner in circumstances such as those described in the complaint. The conduct described in the complaint violated plaintiff's clearly established rights. A reasonable doctor would have understood as much.").

Morelli v.Webster, 552 F.3d 12, 18, 19, 24, 25 (1st Cir. 2009) ("The doctrinal intersection of qualified immunity principles and summary judgment principles is not well mapped. Plotting that intersection can present thorny analytic problems–problems that are magnified because of the desire to resolve claims of qualified immunity at the earliest practicable stage of litigation. . . The difficulty arises because the summary judgment standard requires absolute deference to the nonmovant's factual assertions (as long as those assertions are put forward on personal knowledge or otherwise documented by materials of evidentiary quality, . . . whereas qualified immunity, when raised on summary judgment, demands deference to the reasonable, if mistaken, actions of the movant . . . . In order to ease this inherent tension, we think it wise for courts to cabin these standards and keep them logically distinct, first identifying the version of events that best comports with the summary judgment standard and then asking whether, given that set of facts, a reasonable officer should have known that his actions were unlawful. . . . Here, the facts, seen through the prism of the plaintiff's account, simply do not justify yanking the arm of an unarmed and non-violent person, suspected only of the theft of $20, and pinning her against a wall for three to four minutes with sufficient force to tear her rotator cuff. That is particularly so in view of the marked disparity in height and weight between the officer and the suspect, the absence of any evidence of either dangerousness or attempted flight, and the presence of a cadre of other officers at the scene. In short, the plaintiff's version of the relevant facts places Webster's actions outside the universe of protected mistakes. . . .Given the importance of reasonableness to the qualified immunity calculus in excessive force cases, the existence of such immunity frequently will hinge on the resolution of disputed facts. . . So it is here. In sum, we conclude that the plaintiff not only has made out a trialworthy issue as to whether Webster's use of a significant degree of force transgressed her Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force but also that she has made a showing adequate to thwart a qualified immunity defense. . . Because a rational jury could find, on this scumbled record, facts establishing that Webster's use of force was so objectively unreasonable and so plainly misguided that he should not be protected by the shield of qualified immunity, the district court erred in resolving this claim in advance of trial.")

Asociacion de Periodistas de Puerto Rico v. Mueller, 529 F.3d 52, 60-62 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The facts on the record, taken most favorably to the plaintiffs, reveal that without provocation, the defendants beat and applied pepper spray into the faces of the non-threatening plaintiffs to force them to exit the gated area. Thus, our proper inquiry is whether prior law makes clear that the use of such force against a group of non-threatening individuals was excessive. . . .Based on the plaintiffs' account of the events, this case falls within that category of obvious violations. . . According to the plaintiffs' account, the agents never gave them an opportunity to exit the area, but simply began hitting them and then, without warning, pepper sprayed them. Indeed, as discussed earlier, some of the individual plaintiffs were sprayed in the face, at close range, even after they had fallen down on the ground. Based on both a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority,'. . . and the general prohibition against excessive force, we conclude that, according to the facts on this present record, the defendants should have been on notice that the actions attributed to them by the plaintiffs were in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The defendants contend that they reasonably believed that the use of force was appropriate in view of the crowd's provocations and the escalating situation outside of the condominium complex. . . . One could imagine that even if a reasonable officer would have believed it appropriate to use pepper spray in response to an unruly mob (and thus be entitled to immunity), applying pepper spray into the face of an unthreatening journalist lying on the ground might well not be protected under the mantle of qualified immunity . The appropriate analysis therefore requires an individualized inquiry of each plaintiff's circumstances. Given this evidentiary gap, the district court's entry of summary judgment for the defendants on qualified immunity grounds was premature. However, this is not to say that qualified immunity should not be considered later, on a more fully developed record. Thus, we vacate the entry of qualified immunity for the defendants on the individual plaintiffs' claims and remand.").

Berube v. Conley, 506 F.3d 79, 85 (1st Cir. 2007) ("The undisputed facts demonstrate that the circumstances in which the officers found themselves were 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. . Conley was confronted by a much larger man charging her with what he has conceded was a dangerous weapon in his hand. We cannot say that any reasonable officer, confronted with the necessity to subdue an apparent attacker, would not have made the same choice. While one might regret Conley's failure to stop shooting as soon as Berube went down, immunity encompasses 'mistaken judgments.'. . Syphers and Vierling also faced a tense and uncertain situation when they rushed from the station to assist a fellow officer calling for help. They had heard firing from unidentified weapons and saw Berube rolling on the ground, refusing to obey their orders and potentially preparing to fire at them. Although Berube points to the Boren affidavit to dispute Syphers and Vierling's testimony that Berube's actions appeared to present a threat, there is no dispute that Berube did not obey the officers' commands to show his hands. Faced with the necessity of making a split-second judgment on a rainy night about how to neutralize the threat they perceived from Berube, the officers' actions cannot be said to have been 'plainly incompetent.'. . We conclude that on the undisputed facts, the conduct of the three officers 'can[not] be deemed egregious enough to submit the matter to a jury .'").

Jennings v. Jones, 499 F.3d 2, 17(1st Cir. 2007) (on rehearing) ("[W]e conclude that Jones' conduct was such an obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment's general prohibition on unreasonable force that a reasonable officer would not have required prior case law on point to be on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Indeed, even in Smith, which was decided six years before the incident at issue here, the court concluded that the law was clearly established against the use of increased force on a suspect no longer offering resistance because 'the unlawfulness of the conduct is readily apparent even without clarifying caselaw.'. . Other circuits have rejected qualified immunity without a prior case exactly on point. . . . When an individual has been forcibly restrained by several officers, has ceased resisting arrest for several seconds, and has advised the officers that the force they are already using is hurting a previously injured ankle, we cannot think of any basis for increasing the force used to such a degree that a broken ankle results. At the time of Jones' action, both existing caselaw and general Fourth Amendment principles had clearly established that this use of force was excessive in violation of the Constitution.").

Jennings v. Jones, 499 F.3d 2, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 2007) (on rehearing) ("The final prong of the qualified immunity analysis is 'whether an objectively reasonable official would have believed that the action taken violated that clearly established constitutional right.' . . . At first glance, this inquiry appears indistinguishable from that in the first prong. Both involve the reasonableness of the officer's conduct. However, the key distinction is that prong one deals with whether the officer's conduct was objectively unreasonable, whereas prong three deals with whether an objectively reasonable officer would have believed the conduct was unreasonable. . . . The third prong analysis seems nonsensical at first blush because, in effect, officers receive protection if they acted reasonably in exercising unreasonable force. In Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 643, 107 S.Ct. 3034, 97 L.Ed.2d 523 (1987), the Supreme Court acknowledged the argument made by the appellant in that case that '[i]t is not possible ... to say that one Areasonably" acted unreasonably.' However, the Court excused this apparent contradiction as merely linguistic . . . . Thus, qualified immunity affords protection to officers who reasonably, yet mistakenly, employ excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We find that an objectively reasonable officer in Jones' circumstances would not have believed that it was lawful to increase the amount of force that he used after Jennings ceased resisting and stated that Jones was hurting him. . . Because the first and third prongs of the qualified immunity analysis are so closely related in these Fourth Amendment excessive force cases, the evidence that supports our conclusion on the first prong, that a reasonable jury could have found that the force Jones used was unreasonable, is likewise relevant here, on the third prong, to demonstrate that an objectively reasonable officer in Jones' position would have believed that the force used was unreasonable.").

See also Jennings v. Jones, 587 F.3d 430, 445, 446 (1st Cir. 2009) (Lipez, J., concurring) ("This case demonstrates the importance of standards of review to the outcome of appeals. In the prior majority decision in this case, I wrote to vacate the district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law for defendant Jones because that ruling, in my view, was incompatible with the district court's obligation to consider whether the jury had 'a legally sufficient evidentiary basis' for its verdict. Fed.R.Civ.P. 50(a). My view on that issue has not changed. When the evidence presented at the first trial was considered in the light most favorable to the verdict–the applicable standard both in the district court and on appeal–the jury's judgment in favor of Jennings had to be upheld. The standards are very different, however, for motions seeking a new trial. In deciding whether to grant such a request, the district court is entitled to make its own judgment about the strength of the evidence, including the credibility of witnesses. . It follows that we, in turn, are obliged to afford wide latitude to the court's discretionary judgment about the strength of the evidence. . . The impact of the differing standards is apparent when we examine the 'critical factual dispute' at the heart of the prior majority decision: 'whether Jones increased the force he applied after Jennings already had ceased resisting for several seconds.'. . We concluded that, given the testimony of Jennings, Piccoli and Monroe, 'the only view of the evidence consistent with the principle that we take the facts in the light most favorable to the jury verdict' was that Jones had in fact increased the force he used to restrain Jennings. . . Based on that view of the evidence, we held that the district court improperly granted judgment for Jones on Jennings' excessive force claim. In this appeal, however, our focus has shifted. In evaluating Jones' motion for a new trial, the district court discussed the evidence that was essential to our previous decision–the testimony of Jennings, Piccoli and Monroe. It found their accounts of the increased use of force implausible in light of the videotapes and the officers' testimony, leading it to conclude that the jury's verdict was against the weight of the credible evidence. In reviewing that ruling, our focus is no longer on whether the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict supports the verdict–it does–but on whether the district court abused its discretion in doubting the truthfulness of that evidence and ordering a new trial to avoid what it perceived as a miscarriage of justice. The change in the question has necessarily led me to a different answer in this second appeal. I agree with my colleagues that the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that a new trial was warranted. Hence, I join them in affirming the district court's judgment.").

Whitfield v. Melendez-Rivera, 431 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Although the Supreme Court has cautioned that in many cases the generalized holdings of Garner and Graham will not provide sufficient notice to police officers, the Court has also acknowledged that, in the obvious case, the standards announced in those decisions alone are sufficient to ' "clearly establish" the answer.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the verdict, the district court correctly concluded that a reasonable officer, similarly situated, would understand that his or her conduct violated the rights clearly established in Garner and Graham. This is especially true given the factual similarity between Garner and the present case. . . .Because the jury rejected the defendants' contention that Whitfield appeared threatening, the district court correctly concluded that Lebron and Mangome were not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Wilson v. City of Boston, 421 F.3d 45, 57-59 (1st Cir. 2005) ("We conclude that pre-1999 case law gave police officers ample warning that arresting and detaining someone incorrectly swept up in a mass arrest sting aimed at individuals with outstanding arrest warrants would violate her Fourth Amendment rights. While the parties have not identified any cases in which this issue has arisen in the context of an entirely innocent person who unwittingly was caught in a planned mass arrest, courts have addressed two closely related situations. First, it has been clearly established for decades that if one officer instructs another officer to make an arrest, the arrest violates the Fourth Amendment if the first officer lacked probable cause, regardless of how reasonable the second officer's reliance was. . . . Second, it was well established in other federal courts and in Massachusetts state court, if not in this circuit, that an arrest made on the basis of a facially valid warrant which turns out to have been cleared before the arrest violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . If it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment proscribes an arrest based on a warrant that was once valid but has since been cleared, then a fortiori it was clearly established that the amendment proscribes an arrest based on a warrant that never existed in the first place. Taken together, the two principles cited above–that an arrest based on a request by another officer is lawful only if the first officer had probable cause, and that an arrest based on a facially valid, but actually recalled, warrant violates the Fourth Amendment–gave unmistakable warning to Massachusetts police that the Fourth Amendment prohibits arresting someone solely on the basis of a nonexistent warrant. We therefore conclude that the second prong has been satisfied. . . . The final prong of the qualified immunity analysis, often the most difficult one for the plaintiff to prevail upon, is 'whether an objectively reasonable official would have believed that the action taken violated that clearly established constitutional right.'. . Section 1983 actions 'frequently turn on the third prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, which channels the analysis from abstract principles to the specific facts of a given case.'. . . After confirming Wilson's identity and her lack of a warrant, Dunford ordered the officers to release her; subsequent delay arose from routine paperwork and time waiting for a 'cuff cutter' to arrive. Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . The delay in effecting Wilson's release, while undoubtedly exasperating to her, was due to simple administrative inefficiency, not plain incompetence or knowing violation of the law. Consequently, we affirm the district court's judgment in favor of Dunford.")

Lambert v. Town of Merrimack, No. 17-CV-404-AJ, 2019 WL 1333309, at *6-8 (D.N.H. Mar. 25, 2019) ("The Estate next argues that it was clearly excessive for the officers to continue firing at Lambert after he was initially shot. This argument, too, is unavailing. The record evidence, including a 911 audio recording in which the shooting can be heard in the background, supports the conclusion that the officers fired shots at Lambert in quick succession. The Estate acknowledged at the hearing that it was unable to identify any case in which a court held that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment by firing multiple shots in quick succession at an individual running at that officer or his colleague with a knife. . . The Estate has therefore failed to meet its burden of demonstrating that the manner in which the officers discharged their weapons in this case violated clearly established law. . . . The Estate cites no authority, binding or persuasive, supporting the proposition that it is clearly unlawful for a police officer to shoot an individual running at him or another officer with a knife simply because that individual happens to be mentally disabled. Absent such authority, the Estate cannot overcome the clearly established prong by generally invoking Lambert's mental disability. . . . Just last month, however, the First Circuit considered for the first time the interplay between the ADA and 'ad hoc police encounters with members of the public during investigations and arrests.' See Gray, 917 F.3d at 16. In its opinion, the court discussed the differing approaches other courts have employed when determining whether the ADA applied to police conduct. . . Emphasizing that 'courts should not rush to decide unsettled legal issues that can easily be avoided,' the panel assumed without finding that the ADA applies to ad hoc police encounters, that a public entity can be held vicariously liable under the ADA for its employee's actions, and that proof of a defendant's deliberate indifference is sufficient to support a claim for damages under the ADA. . . The court nevertheless concluded, in a fact-bound analysis, that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment because the plaintiff had not made out 'a genuine issue of material fact as to [the officer's] deliberate indifference to the risk of an ADA violation.'. . In reaching this conclusion, the First Circuit declined to adopt, at least at present, much of the caselaw the defendants rely on in support of their motion. . . In the wake of Gray, the court cannot determine whether the Town is entitled to summary judgment on the ADA claim based on the current state of the briefing. Before taking a position on unsettled legal issues the First Circuit expressly declined to resolve as recently as last month, the court must be convinced that it has no choice but to do so. Yet without the benefit of the First Circuit's decision in Gray, neither party has addressed whether this case can be resolved on its facts. The court accordingly denies the defendants' motion without prejudice as to the ADA claim. The Town is granted 45 days to file a renewed motion for summary judgment, as may be appropriate, addressing the First Circuit's decision in Gray.")

Rand, on behalf of Lawrence v. Lavoie, No. 14-CV-570-PB, 2017 WL 3891679, at *8–9 (D.N.H. Sept. 5, 2017) ("Reviewing the relevant law, by September 2013, a 'robust consensus of cases' had clearly established that an officer may not use deadly force to defend against a slowly approaching vehicle if it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in the defendant's position that the vehicle did not pose an imminent danger to any member of the public or another officer and the officer had sufficient opportunity to safely step outside its path. . . Accordingly, a reasonable officer in Lavoie's position would have recognized the unlawfulness of using deadly force in those circumstances. . . A number of Courts of Appeals have utilized this clearly established rule. The Ninth Circuit held in Acosta that an officer who used deadly force against a slowly approaching vehicle could be liable for violating the Fourth Amendment where a reasonable officer 'would have recognized that he could avoid being injured ... by simply stepping to the side.'. . The Third Circuit held in the alternative in Abraham that uncertainties as to whether an officer could 'get out of the way' of an oncoming car precluded summary judgment. . . Similarly, the Second Circuit held in the alternative that if an officer 'safely could have gotten out of the way' of an oncoming car, then his use of deadly force would have violated the Fourth Amendment. [citing Cowan] Last, the Seventh Circuit suggested in dicta that a vehicle does not pose a threat of serious bodily harm if an officer can avoid it. [citing Estate of Starks v. Enyart] Lavoie attempts to attack this clearly established law by citing cases where an officer's use of deadly force against an advancing driver was found reasonable. . . But even those Courts of Appeals that have found an officer's use of such force to be reasonable implicitly acknowledge that, at some point, a reasonable officer must step aside instead of firing. For instance, in Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252 (11th Cir. 2005), the Eleventh Circuit emphasized that an officer confronted with an oncoming vehicle had, at most, 2.72 seconds to react to the vehicle. . .He therefore was entitled to qualified immunity because he had to make 'a split-second decision of whether he could escape before he got crushed.'. . see also Thomas v. Durastanti, 607 F.3d 655, 666 (10th Cir. 2010) (noting officer "had mere seconds to react" to an oncoming vehicle). If an officer has ample time to respond to a potential threat, however, the logic of Robinson does not apply. The same can be said for the rationales underlying similar cases decided by the First and Seventh Circuits after 2013. . . Lavoie's argument only reinforces the clearly established rule. Thus, even on the theory that Lawrence's vehicle was moving toward Lavoie when he fired, Lavoie would not be entitled to qualified immunity at this stage, and Rand's claim survives.")

Blanchard v. Swaine, No. 08-40073-FDS, 2010 WL 4922699, at *8, *9 (D. Mass. Nov. 29, 2010) ("Blanchard contends that Swaine intentionally hit him with his cruiser. Among other things, he alleges that Swaine said 'I didn't mean to hit you that hard' after the collision. He points to witness testimony that there were no braking sounds and that Swaine's car was traveling 20 miles per hour when it hit him. A reasonable jury could find that this was a 'seizure.'. . A reasonable jury could also find that this seizure was unreasonable. At the time of the collision, Swaine knew that Blanchard was a suspected shoplifter evading arrest. However, he did not have information that Blanchard was armed in any way or otherwise presented a deadly threat. In those circumstances, a reasonable jury could find that the use of a police cruiser to stop pursuit was unreasonable. . . . Moreover, it would have been unreasonable for an officer to believe that his use of a police cruiser to stop pursuit was acceptable under the circumstances of this case, and a reasonable jury could find that such use violated Blanchard's constitutional rights. Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Blanchard, therefore, the Court finds that qualified immunity is not a bar to the § 1983 and battery claims against Swaine.")

Ray v. Donovan, Civil No. 05-239-P-H, 2006 WL 3741914, at *20 & n.33 (D. Me. Dec. 14, 2006) ("Prior to the issuance of Calvi the question of whether, drawing reasonable inferences in Ray's favor, there was a constitutional violation was a more difficult call. . . In the aftermath of Calvi, with its parenthetical reliance on Jackson v. City of Bremerton, 268 F.3d 646, 653 (9th Cir.2001), I conclude that Ray's claim does not survive summary judgment on the question of whether there was a constitutional violation apropos his handcuffing by Bergquist. . . . My lingering concern vis-a-vis this conclusion pertains only as to the question of whether Ray's assertion that he continued to complain to Bergquist about the handcuffs on his lengthy transport to the jail crosses a dividing line between constitutional handcuffing like that in Calvi and handcuffing that amounts to excessive force. However, the defendants have also asserted that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . . [E]ven if Calvi had not issued during the time that this motion was under consideration, given the state of the law in the First Circuit and the District of Maine concerning handcuffing a defendant during an arrest and for purposes of transport, Bergquist, who was principally responsible for the handcuffing and the transport, would be entitled to qualified immunity on Ray's excessive force claim.").

Triolo v. Nassau County, 24 F.4th 98, 107-08 (2d Cir. 2022) ("Even where actual probable cause does not exist, an officer may be entitled to qualified immunity on a § 1983 false arrest claim if his actions were objectively reasonable or if 'arguable probable cause' existed at the time of the arrest. . . . 'A police officer has arguable probable cause if either (a) it was objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that probable cause existed, or (b) officers of reasonable competence could disagree on whether the probable cause test was met.'. . . Although we have concluded that the jury reasonably found a lack of actual probable cause, we agree with the district court that Lee nonetheless had arguable probable cause to arrest Triolo. . . As explained above, Lee lacked actual probable cause because he ignored exculpatory evidence and information that undermined the veracity of the alleged victims. But that conclusion does not preclude a finding of arguable probable cause. On this record, even construed in the light most favorable to Triolo, it is not clear that no reasonable officer could have believed that probable cause existed. . . The alleged victims signed a domestic incident report, alleging that Triolo choked, punched, grabbed, and injured them. Their accounts were consistent with each other's. And even though the lack of visible injuries arguably undermined their veracity, it is nonetheless possible that no visible injuries resulted from the alleged assault. Finally, although the report stated that no arrest was made on May 17, 2015, because 'no offense [was] committed,' a reasonable officer receiving this report could have concluded this was a mistake because the form also plainly indicated that Triolo had engaged in punching, pushing, strangulation, and choking. Accordingly, although we do not conclude that the evidence in favor of defendants is 'so overwhelming that reasonable and fair minded persons could not arrive at a verdict against' them to justify vacating the jury's finding of lack of actual probable cause, . . . we nonetheless conclude that Lee had arguable probable cause based on the domestic incident report and accompanying statements. Lee's actions, though wrong, were not so wrong that no reasonable officer, 'out of the wide range of reasonable people who enforce the laws in this country, could have determined that the challenged action was lawful.'. . As a result, Lee is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the § 1983 claim.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 237-39 & n.20 (2d Cir. 2014) ("It has become commonplace for defendants in excessive force cases to support their claims to qualified immunity by pointing to the absence of prior case law concerning the precise weapon, method, or technology employed by the police. . . As the Supreme Court has made clear, however, it is not necessary to find a 'case directly on point' in order to show that the law governing a plaintiff's claim is clearly established. . . Some measure of abstraction and common sense is required with respect to police methods and weapons in light of rapid innovation in hardware and tactics. . . .[W]e conclude that no reasonable officer would think that his or her use of a stun grenade in the course of executing a search warrant was beyond the purview of the Fourth Amendment. . . .The question, then, is whether the use of stun grenades was reasonable under the particular circumstances alleged in this case. . . . The factors that other courts have considered in assessing whether a particular use of stun grenades was reasonable are no different from those that apply to other forms of force, lethal or non-lethal. In this case, we think it important to determine whether the officers first confirmed that they were tossing the stun grenade into an empty room or open space. . . . It also is more likely that using a stun grenade will be considered reasonable if the subject of the search or arrest is known to pose a high risk of violent confrontation. . . . By contrast, we do not think a reasonable officer would think that it was constitutional to use these devices in routine searches. Indeed, to the best of our knowledge, every appellate court to address the issue has found questionable the use of stun grenades in routine searches and seizures that do not pose high levels of risk to the officers or third parties. . . .On the facts presented at the summary judgment stage of this case, construed in the light most favorable to Terebesi, all of the stun grenade defendants knew or should have understood that the search warrant was for a personal-use quantity of drugs and that there was no reason to believe that Terebesi posed a risk of violence or resistance. It is true that, at the SWERT briefing, all of the officers were told that Terebesi habitually used crack cocaine, that he had recently been the victim of a shotgun attack, that he owned a handgun that was 'unaccounted for,' and that he held what might have been an unusually strong affection for his pet bird. But none of these facts suggested that Terebesi was ready to engage in violence, that he had any record of or propensity towards violence, that he had immediate access to weapons, or indeed that he was likely to offer any resistance at all. We therefore conclude that the record, as presented at summary judgment, presents material questions as to whether each defendant's decision to deploy stun grenades was reasonable under clearly established law, in light of his personal knowledge of the facts and circumstances surrounding the search. . . We therefore conclude that the district court properly denied the defendants qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.") Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 240, 241 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Whether in this case the officers' actions were reasonable in light of clearly established law is not a question we may answer conclusively at this stage of the proceedings. As the district court recognized, the reasonableness of Sweeney's decision to fire his weapon depends in large part on whether Guizan did in fact attempt to wrest the weapon away from him, whether Sweeney was blinded by debris from the stun grenade explosion, and whether Sweeney reasonably believed he was taking fire once inside the house. The district court noted, moreover, that the credibility of Sweeney's recollection of these events was subject to genuine dispute. . . For the same reasons, we are unable to conclude at this juncture that Sweeney is entitled to qualified immunity for his decision to 'pin' Terebesi with his shield. Because Sweeney's claims to qualified immunity rely on these disputed facts, we have no jurisdiction to entertain them at this time. Weir, for his part, testified that he fired his weapon because he thought that Guizan was firing at Sweeney. The credibility of his recollection and the sufficiency of the asserted basis for his mistaken impression that Guizan was firing at the officers are—like the factual arguments made by Sweeney—matters to be determined by the factfinder. We therefore affirm the decision of the district court insofar as it determined that defendants Sweeney and Weir were not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage in connection with their roles in the raid of Terebesi's home.")

MacLeod v. Town of Brattleboro, 548 F. App'x 6, 2013 WL 6183023, *2 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Viewed objectively, MacLeod's actions immediately prior to being tased do not evince 'passive resistance' merely because MacLeod was not actually in the act of fleeing. . . Officer Emery used a Taser, once, to subdue an actively non-compliant suspect reasonably believed to be engaged in dangerous criminal activity and who posed a real and imminent threat to the safety of the officers and any bystanders. . . . In that situation, it was reasonable for Officer Emery—after repeated, clear commands that MacLeod return to the ground—to decided that using the Taser was required to effect the arrest. This avoided a 'hands-on' situation with an unrestrained, dangerous individual. . . Given the totality of these circumstances, no rational factfinder could conclude that the officer's course of action was unreasonable. Accordingly, Officer Emery's actions did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Zalaski v. City of Hartford, 723 F.3d 382, 389, 390, 393 (2d Cir. 2013) ("In short, if at least some reasonable officers in the defendant's position 'could have believed that [the challenged conduct] was within the bounds of appropriate police responses,' the defendant officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here, we need not, and do not, decide whether there was actual probable cause to arrest Zalaski and Oatis for disorderly conduct under Connecticut law because we conclude, in any event, that there was arguable probable cause to support the arrests. . . .On qualified immunity review, we need not here conclusively decide the scope of obstruction proscribed by Connecticut's disorderly conduct statute. We need only conclude, as we now do, that Connecticut has not so clearly limited obstruction to the condition of fully blocking pedestrian traffic as to foreclose a reasonable officer from making an arguably correct finding of probable obstruction based on plaintiffs' actions in blocking part of the steps at the Red Nose Run. This is not to suggest that an officer would have arguable probable cause to arrest an individual for disorderly conduct under the Connecticut statute based simply upon the person's presence in a location being utilized by others. We conclude only that the facts known to the police in this case—namely, that individuals were holding a large banner, positioned partially in front of a clearly visible point of ingress and egress to be used predominantly by young children—permitted reasonable officers to think that probable cause existed to support arrests for disorderly conduct.")

Swartz v. Insogna, 704 F.3d 105, 110 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Perhaps there is a police officer somewhere who would interpret an automobile passenger's giving him the finger as a signal of distress, creating a suspicion that something occurring in the automobile warranted investigation. And perhaps that interpretation is what prompted Insogna to act, as he claims. But the nearly universal recognition that this gesture is an insult deprives such an interpretation of reasonableness. This ancient gesture of insult is not the basis for a reasonable suspicion of a traffic violation or impending criminal activity. Surely no passenger planning some wrongful conduct toward another occupant of an automobile would call attention to himself by giving the finger to a police officer. And if there might be an automobile passenger somewhere who will give the finger to a police officer as an ill-advised signal for help, it is far more consistent with all citizens' protection against improper police apprehension to leave that highly unlikely signal without a response than to lend judicial approval to the stopping of every vehicle from which a passenger makes that gesture. On the Plaintiffs' version of the facts, the stop was not lawful, and it was error to grant the Defendants summary judgment on the Plaintiffs' claim concerning the stop. . . Nor were the Defendants entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because a reasonable police officer would not have believed he was entitled to initiate the law enforcement process in response to giving the finger.")

Fortunati v. Vermont, 503 F. App'x 78, 2012 WL 5897166, *2 (2d Cir. Nov. 26, 2012) ("Plaintiffs also challenged the grant of qualified immunity to Defendants Protzman and Goodell, who deployed the TSU team. We conclude that the district court was correct; there was no 'clearly established' right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a police SWAT team. Appellees argue that the decision to deploy a police SWAT team can itself never amount to a Fourth Amendment violation. We need not decide that question, which this Circuit has not addressed. See Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 149–50 (3d Cir.2005) ("[A] decision to employ a SWAT-type team can constitute excessive force if it is not objectively reasonable to do so in light of the totality of the circumstances." (internal quotation marks omitted)); Overdorff ex rel. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1190 (10th Cir.2001) ("[T] he decision to deploy a SWAT team to execute a warrant must be 'reasonable.' "). But see Salim v. Proulx, 93 F.3d 86, 92 (2d Cir.1996) ("Officer Proulx's actions leading up to the shooting are irrelevant to the objective reasonableness of his conduct at the moment he decided to employ deadly force."); Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332 (7th Cir.1992) ("[P]re-seizure conduct is not subject to Fourth Amendment scrutiny.").")

Crowell v. Kirkpatrick, 400 F. App'x 592, 594, 595 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In this case, Plaintiffs were arrested for relatively minor crimes of trespass and resisting arrest and were not threatening the safety of any other person with their behavior. However, they were actively resisting their arrest at the time they were tased by the officers in this case, having chained themselves to a several hundred pound barrel drum and having refused to free themselves, even though they admitted they were able to release themselves from the barrel at any time throughout the encounter. Plaintiff Kilmurray admits that prior to the officers' use of their tasers, she had asked an acquaintance at the scene to call other members of their group to return to the property. Moreover, both Plaintiffs admitted that the officers at the scene considered and attempted several alternate means of removing them from the property before resorting to use of their tasers, that the officers expressly warned them that they would be tased and that it would be painful, and that the officers gave them another opportunity to release themselves from the barrel after this warning. Finally, both Plaintiffs were given opportunities again to release themselves from the barrel prior to the subsequent uses of the tasers. While we do not suggest that the use of a taser to effect an arrest is always, or even often, objectively reasonable, under the circumstances here, even construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we conclude that it was. Because they had chained themselves to the drum, Plaintiffs could not have been arrested and removed from the scene by more conventional means, and the apparently imminent arrival of some number of their compatriots added a degree of urgency to the need to remove Plaintiffs quickly, before the presence of other protestors made that more difficult to accomplish. The officers attempted to use other means to effectuate the arrest, none of which proved feasible, and used the taser only as a last resort, after warning Plaintiffs and giving them a last opportunity to unchain themselves from the barrel and leave the premises peacefully. Finally, Defendants set the taser on 'drive stun' mode, which typically causes temporary, if significant, pain and no permanent injury. See Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018, 1027 (9th Cir.2010) ("The use of the Taser in drive-stun mode is painful, certainly, but also temporary and localized, without incapacitating muscle contractions or significant lasting injury."), rehearing en banc granted, __ F.3d __, 2010 WL 3896202 (9th Cir. Sept. 30, 2010). Given the totality of those circumstances, it is difficult to see how a rational factfinder could conclude that the officers' actions were anything other than reasonable.")

Gilles v. Repicky, 511 F.3d 239, 247 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The district court found 'arguable probable cause' based on 'the awareness of a high level of terrorism alert, and the report that the license plate was stolen, together with his observation of fifty-five gallon drums covered with a blanket in an overweight vehicle headed towards New York City.' Gilles, 2006 WL 360171 at *4. The district court noted additionally the fact that Gilles slowed down to the posted speed limit when a marked patrol car approached. . . The problem with the district court's analysis is that these factors supported the initial stop and a brief investigative detention. Repicky himself did not believe that he had probable cause based on the facts known to him at the point Gilles was released from handcuffs and then asked or told to go to the police station. . . . Once the factors giving rise to the stop were investigated, and produced no reason to conclude that Gilles had committed a crime (other than speeding), the most Repicky retained were suspicions. No reasonable officer could conclude that he had probable cause to arrest Gilles at that point, and accordingly Repicky is not immune from suit on this basis.").

Green v. City of New York, 465 F.3d 65, 83, 84 (2d Cir. 2006) ("We hold that it was clearly established at the time of the incident under review that a competent adult could not be seized and transported for treatment unless she presented a danger to herself or others. . . . [T]he jury could conclude that, based on information readily available to Giblin, no reasonable officer would have concluded that Walter was incompetent to make decisions concerning his treatment or a threat to himself or others. . . We conclude that there are factual issues relevant to qualified immunity on Walter's Fourth Amendment seizure claim against Giblin and therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of this claim.").

Jones v. Parmley, 465 F.3d 46, 61-63 (2d Cir. 2006) ("The court below appears to have extrapolated from Atkins the legal proposition that 'unless State Defendants had probable cause for the arrests that they made, any force that they used in making those arrests was excessive.' . . . The Atkins court clearly did not intend to create or substitute a new standard for arrests lacking probable cause, and the reasonableness test established in Graham remains the applicable test for determining when excessive force has been used, including those cases where officers allegedly lack probable cause to arrest. This Court has remanded cases where a district court failed to reach an issue of qualified immunity, . . . but we have also addressed the merits of the issue itself on appeal, especially 'where the record plainly reveals the existence of genuine issues of material fact relating to the qualified immunity defense.'. . Because the extensive factual record reveals that material issues already exist concerning the excessive force claims which the district court did not dismiss, . . . we see no reason to remand this issue here, where as a matter of law, defendants would not be entitled to qualified immunity on the facts as alleged by plaintiffs. . . . In sum, after conducting a de novo review, we hold that the district court's ultimate determination in denying defendants' motion for summary judgment on the excessive force claims was correct despite its understandable reliance on dicta in Atkins.").

Cruz v. Ctiy of New Rochelle, No. 13CV7432 (LMS), 2017 WL 1402122, at *25-26 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 3, 2017) ("Although Plaintiffs contend that the use of lethal force resulted from the officers' erroneous decision to employ Tasers, which they should have known would be ineffective in subduing Cruz, '[the officers'] actions leading up to the shooting are irrelevant to the objective reasonableness of [Officer Geertgen's] conduct at the moment he decided to employ deadly force. The reasonableness inquiry depends only upon the officer's knowledge of circumstances immediately prior to and at the moment that he [or she] made the split-second decision to employ deadly force.' Salim v. Proulx, 93 F.3d 86, 92 (2d Cir. 1996). Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' claim of excessive force based on the use of lethal force. . . . [As in Sheehan], in this case, Defendants' initial attempt to enter Cruz's apartment to render emergency assistance to Cruz was lawful, and their entry after Sgt. Perri saw what he believed to be a knife in Cruz's hand, even after the door was held closed by the chain lock, was likewise lawful. Moreover, Defendants' use of force in this case was reasonable — first, they tried to subdue Cruz with Tasers, and when that did not work, the use of lethal force was justified. Defendants cannot be held liable under the Fourth Amendment based on 'bad tactics' or expert opinion that they failed to follow their training.")

Estate of Devine v. Fusaro, No. 3:14-CV-01019 (JAM), 2016 WL 183472, at *6 (D. Conn. Jan. 14, 2016) ("I conclude that there are three important factual circumstances that bear on the constitutional reasonableness of the defendants' use of force in this case. First, the police used a type of force that is designed to be less-than-lethal, rather than using deadly force. The degree of force is plainly relevant to its reasonableness. Second, the police used less-than-lethal force against a man whom they reasonably believed to be suicidal and to be armed with, and holding, a loaded gun while occupying public property. The presence of a dangerous weapon by an unstable person on public property is plainly of legitimate concern to law enforcement officers. Third, the police used less-than-lethal force after the passage of several hours of a stand-off and negotiations that had yet to succeed in convincing Devine to surrender his gun. The passage of time to allow consideration and resort to non-force alternatives is plainly significant to assessing the reasonableness of a later use of force by the police. Accordingly, for qualified immunity purposes, the appropriate inquiry here is whether an objectively reasonably law enforcement would have known it to violate the Constitution to use less-than-lethal force against a suicidal and armed man on public property and who has refused to surrender his loaded gun after several hours of negotiation with the police. In light of this inquiry, it is clear to me that an objectively reasonable law enforcement officer would not have known that defendants' use of less-than-lethal force amounted to a violation of the constitutional rights of Timothy Devine. . . .The police are hardly to be faulted for devising strategies designed to use less-than-lethal force as an alternative to the more drastic and immediate use of deadly force. This is not to say that the guidance of a state police manual determines ab initio what conduct is constitutionally lawful. . . But the guidance of a departmental manual may be at least relevant to deciding whether any individual police officer within that department should know that what he or she was doing was unlawful."), aff'd by 676 F. App'x. 61 (2d Cir. 2017).

Whitfield ex rel Cobbs v. City of Newburgh, No. 08 CV 8516 (RKE), 2015 WL 9275695, at *19-22 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 17, 2015) ("Despite its holding that the initial deployment of the K-9 was objectively reasonable as a matter of law, the court is mindful of the compounding effect of using the K-9 and the taser at the same time. Because a reasonable juror could conclude that the use of the taser while Cobbs remained engaged with the K-9 was objectively unreasonable, a juror could reach the same conclusion regarding the continued use of the police dog. That is, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a juror could conclude that the K-9 was not removed from Cobbs prior to the deployment of the taser, and it continued to bite Cobbs until the completion of the four taser cycles administered to Cobbs. Accordingly, a reasonable juror could conclude that the continued use of the K-9, compounded with the application of the taser, was excessive and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. In addition to this compounding effect, a reasonable juror could find the duration for which the force was used was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances, particularly if the juror concluded the force continued to be applied to Cobbs after he no longer posed a threat to the Officers, and that Cobbs was not afforded any time to recover between each use of force. . . [T]the question here is whether, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, it was established or clearly foreshadowed by the Supreme Court or federal courts of appeals by July 8, 2007, that, in effectuating a lawful arrest, an officer's use of force is excessive if he or she uses a taser on an individual who no longer poses an immediate threat, is engaged with a police K-9, and is physically struck by an officer. The court finds that it was. . . .[V]iewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the court finds a reasonable juror could conclude the force used by the Officers was objectively unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Although Cobbs initially displayed resistance to arrest and fled into the living room, thereby resulting in the lawful deployment of the K-9, material factual disputes remain following the K-9's deployment, including whether the taser was deployed before the K-9 was removed from Cobbs; the duration for which Cobbs was tasered; whether Cobbs was physically struck by Officer Vasta and, if so, when, and how many times; and whether Cobbs continued to resist arrest, and if so, in what manner. . . As a result, for the same reasons that the Officers are not entitled to summary judgment on the merits of the excessive force claim, they are not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Estate of Jaquez v. City of New York, 104 F.Supp.3d 414, 419, 434-35, 437 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("When the Court sat down to write the opinion, it became clear that one moment of the altercation between Mr. Jaquez and the officers stood apart from the others: the final shot by Sgt. Flores that entered the back of Mr. Jaquez's head. While the Court grants qualified immunity to each defendant for all conduct preceding that final shot—including the forceful use of the shield, Tasers, Sage guns, and the initial use of live ammunition—it does not with regard to Sgt. Flores. Most situations do not require parsing the events of a single altercation to analyze each specific action a particular officer took. More typically, an event is susceptible to general categorization. Here, that is not the case. The circumstances immediately preceding Sgt. Flores's final use of force are sufficiently different from the remainder of the altercation that this Court must find a triable issue of fact as to Sgt. Flores only. . . .The Court renders its decision cognizant of the unusual circumstance of parsing individual moments so finely as to both grant and deny qualified immunity in connection with a single complex event. In sum, reasonable jurors applying their common sense could determine that it was objectively unreasonable to shoot Mr. Jaquez in the back of the head when he had already been shot at least four times, was surrounded by a team of officers suited up in their ballistics gear, and, even if he somehow maintained possession of the knife, was merely pushing up from the ground. Reasonable jurors could determine that as to that moment, the officers could have merely backed off or taken some form of alternative action. . . .The dispositive legal point is that a grant of qualified immunity as to the use of force—even lethal force—in the course of an event does not necessarily extend to all use of such force throughout the incident. While it may have been reasonable for Sgt. Flores to use lethal force earlier in the altercation when Mr. Jaquez threatened the officers with a knife, such authority does not extend indefinitely.") Negron v. City of New York, 976 F.Supp.2d 360, 370, 371 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Fair warning clearly establishing that conduct is unconstitutional may emanate only from 'Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation.'. . As defendants correctly note, . . . there were no Supreme Court or Second Circuit decisions regarding excessive force and involving the use of a taser at the time of the events at issue here. . . Yet 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . In other words, the precise factual pattern at issue in a particular case need not have been ruled upon in a prior decision for it to be clear that an officer's conduct violated a constitutional right. As the Supreme Court has explained, 'We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Applying this standard, the Sixth Circuit found the use of pepper spray to be sufficiently similar to deployment of a taser for pepper spray cases to provide a source of relevant clearly established law. . . . Pigott and Marchesona should have known that using a taser under the particular circumstances at issue here was unreasonable even despite the lack of precedent involving tasers used under similar circumstances. Graham did not merely announce that excessive force claims are properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, or that whether a particular use of force is reasonable depends upon a balancing of the degree of intrusion on the individual's rights against the governmental interests at stake. Graham also identified specific factors to be taken into account when undertaking this balancing, including 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . Morales had not committed a serious or violent crime. He did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others; he did not have a traditional weapon—a gun or a knife—but instead was holding only a long light bulb, and the officers closest to him could have retreated to a position out of reach of the bulb while still blocking Morales from fleeing. In fact, Morales was surrounded and could not flee. While passively resisting arrest by refusing to obey the officers' instructions, Morales was not actively resisting by fighting or struggling with the officers or attempting to escape. Finally, additional officers were on their way to the scene with an air mattress that presumably would have safely broken Morales' fall, and there was no pressing reason not to await their arrival. Any concern that it would be unjust to deny qualified immunity given the scant precedent outlining when taser use constitutes an unreasonable use of force is mitigated by the NYPD policy adopted several months before the events in issue. That policy, at a minimum, should have alerted the defendant officers to the severe dangers of using a taser, without warning, on an individual who could fall from an elevated and precarious position, and informed their consideration of the Graham factors. For all these reasons, and construing the evidence of the relevant facts and circumstances in the light most favorable to plaintiff, I conclude that a reasonable jury could find facts that would, under clearly established law, constitute a violation of Morales' Fourth Amendment rights, and that would render it objectively unreasonable for Pigott and Marchesona to have believed that their conduct was lawful. Defendants' motion for summary judgment with respect to plaintiff's Section 1983 claim is therefore denied.")

Doutel v. City of Norwalk, No. 3:11–CV–01164 (VLB), 2013 WL 3353977, *25 (D. Conn. July 3, 2013) ("Absent authority in this circuit reversing the holdings in Garcha, McGuire, and Vaher, the Defendants in this action are entitled to rely on the holdings of those cases. . . In light of this line of case law, it was objectively reasonable for the defendant Norwalk Police officers to believe that their seizure of the firearms in the Doutel household did not violate Mrs. Doutel's right to keep and bear arms, as the seizure of these arms did not prevent Mrs. Doutel from acquiring other weapons. In other words, it was reasonable for the officers to believe that Mrs. Doutel's interest in her particular weapons did not rise to a Second Amendment violation of her right to bear arms where her general right to keep and bear arms remained intact. In the absence of controlling authority recognizing a Second Amendment violation in similar circumstances for the seizure by law enforcement officials of a particular firearm, and in light of the scarcity of applicable Second Amendment case precedent in this circuit, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to Barbara Doutel's Second Amendment claim.")

Odom v. Matteo, No. 3:08-cv-1569 (VLB), 2011 WL 283946, at *9, *10 (D. Conn. Jan. 24, 2011) ("[E]ven had Maffeo been justified in his initial use of force, a reasonable jury could conclude that his subsequent Taser deployment on a purportedly non-threatening individual who was not attempting to escape and had conveyed to Maffeo that she suffered from a brain injury was unreasonable. . . . This conclusion is further supported by the fact that, based upon Odom's version of events, Maffeo tasered her not once, but three times, each time without warning. . . If the facts asserted by Odom are true, Maffeo's actions also violated Waterford Police Department policy governing the use of Tasers. Under Department policy, a Taser may be deployed only on a subject who is 'actively resisting arrest,' not one is who engaged merely in 'passive resistance' as Odom contends she was doing in this case. . . Further, the policy requires an officer to give warning before deploying a Taser, which Odom claims Maffeo did not do. . . In sum, the use of a Taser is a significant use of force, and a reasonable jury could well find that its repeated deployment on an individual who is suspected of only minor traffic infractions, poses no immediate threat, is not attempting to escape, and has indicated that she suffers from a brain injury constitutes an excessive and unreasonable use of force.")

Crowell v. Kirkpatrick, 667 F.Supp.2d 391, 409-11 (D. Vt. 2009) ("Here it is clear that the Tasers were not necessary to prevent the Plaintiffs from fleeing (quite the opposite, in fact), and were not necessary as a means of self-defense. But the Plaintiffs were plainly resisting arrest, and in doing so took steps beyond mere noncompliance with police orders. Rather, they chained themselves to a 300 lb. object that the police could not move, thus eliminating some less forceful options for the Plaintiffs' removal that otherwise may have worked. . . . In law enforcement parlance, the Defendants attempted to resolve the situation with 'officer presence,' 'verbal communication,' and 'soft hand control,' before resorting to 'hard hand control' by using their Tasers. . . . Here, the Court agrees with the Defendants and these other courts that using a Taser as a last resort to effect the arrests of suspects who are resisting, who have repeatedly been given lawful orders with which they could have easily complied, and who received repeated warnings specifically about the use of pain compliance techniques, is not unreasonable, and does not rise to the level of a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Finally, the Plaintiffs are mistaken to the extent they suggest that there is a per se prohibition against using force–even painful force–against resistors who are not violent or threatening. . . .Police officers 'are not required to use the least intrusive degree of force possible' to effect an arrest. Rather, the constitutional inquiry is whether the force used was reasonable under the circumstances. . . Because it was reasonable to use their Tasers, the Defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the Plaintiffs' excessive force claims.").

Lonegan v. Hasty, 436 F.Supp.2d 419, 432, 433 (E.D.N.Y. 2006) ("In addition to the Wiretap Act itself and the cases discussed above, the federal regulation prohibiting prison officers from monitoring attorney-client meetings except under narrow circumstances not present here would have put a reasonable officer in Hasty's position on further notice that surreptitious recording of plaintiffs' meetings with Detainees was unlawful. . . .The December 18, 2001 memorandum, advising wardens that audio-taping attorney meetings with Detainees was prohibited, would have provided a reasonable warden with additional notice that recording plaintiffs' communications with Detainees was beyond the legitimate scope of his or her duties. In sum, on the face of the complaint, no reasonable officer in Hasty's position could have believed that recording plaintiffs' communications with Detainees without prior judicial authorization was permitted by the Wiretap Act. Accordingly, Hasty is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' Wiretap Act claims.")

Lonegan v. Hasty, 436 F.Supp.2d 419, 439 (E.D.N.Y. 2006) ("In sum, at the time of the events at issue in this case, it was clearly established in this Circuit that plaintiffs had a constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy in their communications with Detainees. A reasonable warden in Hasty's position would have been aware of the policies and regulations of his or her own agency prohibiting prison officers from recording attorney-client communications except under narrow circumstances not present here. A reasonable warden would also have been aware of the Wiretap Act's prohibition on the interception of oral communications, created, in part, to comply with the requirements of the Fourth Amendment, and the case law discussed above confirming that the Wiretap Act applies within the prison setting. And he or she would have been aware not only of the decisions in Berger, Katz, Keith, and Mitchell, but also of the decisions in State Police Litigation, which serve to eliminate any possible doubt that the act of recording conversations that took place in the Visiting Area between plaintiffs and Detainees violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, on the facts alleged in the complaint, Hasty is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims.")

Cipes v. Graham, 386 F.Supp.2d 34, 41, 42 (D. Conn. 2005) ("Having found the defendant's conduct as alleged to be unconstitutional, the next inquiry is whether the law was 'clearly established,' which must be determined in the specific context of the case, not as a broad, general proposition. . . .The defendant points to the absence of any controlling case in which it has been held unreasonable to serve a misdemeanor warrant on a suspect at night, while plaintiff argues that the qualified immunity test is not limited to whether a case specifically addresses the facts of the case at bar, otherwise 'public officers [could] commit statutory violations so outlandish that they never have been the subject of a published appellate decision.' . . In some rare cases where the constitutional violation is patently obvious, plaintiff argues, it is unnecessary to identify judicial precedent to defeat qualified immunity. Plaintiff contends that midnight warrant executions are 'so rare' that this is such a case. The Court disagrees. . . . The violation alleged here clearly is not as obviously unconstitutional as the use of the hitching post in Hope. While police 'rousting' Cipes out of bed may have been frightening and degrading, it comes nowhere near the egregious conduct of the guards in Hope, which subjected the inmate to physical pain and extreme loss of dignity for hours. Moreover, the law applicable to this case is far from 'clearly established.' No Supreme Court or Second Circuit case exists which presents a circumstance similar or analogous to a nighttime execution of a misdemeanor arrest warrant with no exigent circumstances and no statutory or regulatory restrictions. Nor can it be concluded that reasonable police officers in defendant's position would have clearly understood from the existing law that their conduct was unlawful. In the absence of any controlling caselaw bearing on similar circumstances so as to have framed this issue with sufficient precision to put reasonable law enforcement officials on notice of the constitutional infirmity of such a nighttime misdemeanor warrant execution, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Eberhardinger v. City of York, 782 F. App'x 180, ___ (3d Cir. 2019) ("Here, Officer Smith argues on appeal that, contrary to the District Court's reasoning, this is not an 'obvious case,' and, as primary support for that argument, posits that the evidence does not support the District Court's account of the facts. That argument suffers from two critical flaws: (A) because this is an interlocutory appeal from a summary judgment order denying qualified immunity, whether the District Court's construction of the facts finds adequate support in the record is beyond our jurisdiction, see Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 313 (1995), and (B) accepting the District Court's rendition of the facts, even assuming that this is not an 'obvious case,' our prior decision in Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (3d Cir. 1999), where we confronted very similar factual circumstances, clearly established that Officer Smith's conduct, as alleged by Eberhardinger, violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Here, the video evidence falls short of showing that the District Court's determination that material facts are subject to 'reasonable dispute [was] blatantly and demonstrably false.'. . In particular, and of primary importance to this appeal, the footage does not unequivocally corroborate Officer Smith's assertion that he 'was in front of the vehicle and not safely out of the way at the time he began discharging his firearm.'. . In the moments before the sounds of gunfire, Officer Smith can be seen in the path of Foster's vehicle, then moving to the side and out of the vehicle's path, and ultimately standing to the left of Foster's car as it passes him closely. Because we cannot discern with certainty from the video where Officer Smith was positioned vis-à-vis the oncoming car when he opened fire—and thus whether a reasonable officer in his position would believe himself in danger—we cannot say the video evidence 'blatantly and demonstrably' disproves that there are disputed issues of material fact. . . Thus, our inquiry into whether Officer Smith's conduct violated clearly established law must assume, as the District Court construed the facts at summary judgment, that Officer 'Smith—standing to the left of the slow-moving vehicle and apparently out of harm's way—fired four shots at the driver as the vehicle was passing him or had completely passed him.' . . . With the high-speed pursuit at its terminus and the absence of any danger to bystanders, the only plausible justification for deadly force then would be the threat to the safety of the officers. In that regard, while Officer Smith tries to draw distinctions between that account and the circumstances in Abraham, none is availing. At bottom, each purported distinction is not a difference between Abraham and the District Court's construction of the facts, but rather, a disagreement with the construction itself based on the record. As explained above, such arguments extend beyond our jurisdiction. Accordingly, we will not disturb the District Court's determination that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Eberhardinger, a reasonable jury could find that Smith's use of deadly force violated clearly established law, and that summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity was therefore properly denied.")

Martin for Estate of Webb v. City of Newark, 762 F. App'x 78, ___ (3d Cir. 2018) ("[A]t a minimum, Wilson is entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established, in October 2011, that an officer uses excessive force when he shoots at a driver who starts a car despite having been warned not to and does so while the officer is positioned between the car and its open driver's side door. The plaintiff does not point to any controlling authority or 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that place the answer to this question beyond debate. . . Instead, he points to Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), and Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (3d Cir. 1999), neither of which accomplishes that aim. Garner did not concern the clearly defined right at issue; it only established the general principle that deadly force 'may not be used unless it is necessary to prevent [a suspect's] escape and the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . The Supreme Court has explained that Garner does not itself 'create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . We do not believe this to be such an 'obvious case,' and, as explained above, the circumstances here reveal that a reasonable officer could have believed that Webb's conduct posed a significant threat. Raso is likewise of little help. First, it merely reiterated Garner's general principle. . . Second, in Raso, we did not render a holding concerning qualified immunity or, for that matter, objective reasonableness — instead, we reversed a grant of summary judgment in favor of an officer who shot at a moving vehicle containing a fleeing shoplifter after finding a dispute of fact regarding whether the officer was in any danger at all at the time of the shooting. . . On the other hand, guidance from the Supreme Court reveals that officers who shoot suspects 'set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight,' do not violate clearly established law.")

Bland v. City of Newark, 900 F.3d 77, 82-87 & n.8 (3d Cir. 2018) ("After oral argument, the District Court concluded that it was 'not in a position to grant or deny qualified immunity.'. . Instead, it held that a jury must first decide two issues of material fact: (1) whether the Audi's engine was revving (and thus whether the car was capable of moving) after it crashed into the scaffolding; and (2) whether the officers could see Bland's movements inside the vehicle. The District Court opined that the Supreme Court's decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012 (2014), issued three years after the car chase, may decide the 'central' question of 'whether or not Corey Bland was an active threat to the officers at the terminus so as to justify their actions in using deadly force to end that risk.'. . Accordingly, it denied Defendants' motion, including with respect to the three officers who were neither present nor discharged their weapons at the terminus of the chase. Defendants moved for a stay of trial, which the District Court denied. We entered an order staying the district court proceedings pending the resolution of this timely interlocutory appeal. . . The Supreme Court has consistently held that officers either did not violate the Fourth Amendment or were entitled to qualified immunity when they used deadly force during car chases similar to the one at issue here. . . .Like the cases just mentioned, Bland's behavior threatened the safety of the officers, as well as the public at large. . . . Given the troopers' reasonable belief that Bland was armed, and the mortal threat that his conduct posed to those around him, the troopers who discharged their weapons at Lincoln Park did not violate Bland's clearly established constitutional rights. And because Thompson, Murphy, and Oliveira fired their weapons only at this location, they are plainly entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The events at the terminus of the car chase present a more complicated picture, but we reach the same conclusion because Bland identifies no caselaw indicating that the officers violated clearly established law extant in 2011. . . He instead states in conclusory fashion that 'every ... reasonable member of law enforcement should be aware that [the officers'] conduct would constitute excessive force.'. . In support, Bland argues that the officers were not in a position to see whether he made threatening movements inside the vehicle, and that the Audi's impact with the scaffolding rendered it inoperable, bringing the car chase to an end. . . As a result, Bland contends that Brosseau and Scott no longer control, and we should instead look to Tennessee v. Garner for guidance. . . .The officers here confronted a scenario quite different from the one presented in Garner, where the officer pursued and shot a nondangerous suspect in the back of the head, even though the officer was 'reasonably sure' the suspect was unarmed. . .This becomes especially clear once we consider the officers' actions 'in light of the specific context of the case,' as we are required to do. . . The state troopers and Officer Del Mauro—all of whom were present at Lincoln Park—continued to pursue a fugitive who once again disobeyed traffic lights, drove at excessive speeds, and put pedestrians and motorists at great risk. Under Bland's version of events, at least one innocent civilian suffered harm by his flight when a state police car struck an occupied vehicle during the final leg of the pursuit. . . After the crash, Bland threatened to kill the officers, and the record provides no evidence that he attempted to surrender at any time. Though the Audi remained pinned against the scaffolding, the officers had previously seen Bland successfully free the car and continue to flee after the crash at Lincoln Park. And although the officers did not see a weapon, the police reports of an armed carjacking gave them reason to believe Bland was armed. . . This was the situation the officers confronted at the terminus of the chase when they discharged their weapons. Bland identifies no cases with similar facts that, in 2011, would have 'put every reasonable offic[er] on notice' that using deadly force in such a situation violated clearly established constitutional rights. . . Therefore, accepting (as we must) the truth of Bland's assertions regarding the Audi's immobility and the officers' ability to see Bland's hands, our conclusion remains the same: the actions taken by the State Troopers and Officer Del Mauro are protected by qualified immunity. But what about Newark Officers Torres and Martinez, who, according to Bland, 'arrived on the scene[and] joined in the shooting without knowing whether Mr. Bland was firing at them, and without ever first observing Mr. Bland to be in possession of any firearm'? . . . The Newark officers contend that video footage refutes this allegation, but we need not resolve that dispute. . . Here again, Bland has presented no caselaw demonstrating that the officers, who reasonably believed that Bland was armed, violated a clearly established right by joining in the chaotic scene and discharging their weapons. A recent Supreme Court decision demonstrates that Torres's and Martinez's actions did not violate clearly established rights. [discussing Pauly] So too here. In the absence of any controlling law to the contrary, Newark Officers Martinez and Torres likewise are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, we need not reach the underlying Fourth Amendment questions. . . Nothing in this opinion should be read to suggest that law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment where, as here, they employ lethal force to neutralize a carjacking suspect reasonably perceived to be armed, dangerous, and unwilling to peacefully surrender.")

Fields v. City of Pittsburgh, 714 F. App'x 137, 143 (3d Cir. 2017) ("The Supreme Court in Mendez left open the possibility that, under the Graham test, a court should consider 'unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use it.'. . Fields, however, does not actually contend that a foreseeable consequence of Labella's slap was that the officers would at some later point need to Tase Fields to effectuate his lawful arrest and, in any event, his threatening behavior towards them — which provided the officers probable cause to arrest — was a superseding cause that broke the chain of proximate causation between the slap and the Tasing. . . Fields has not established that his constitutional rights were violated, . . . so his § 1983 claim fails and we need not consider the issue of qualified immunity.")

Blair v. City of Pittsburgh, 711 F. App'x 98, __ (3d Cir. 2017) ("Blair likens his case to Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (3d Cir. 1999), where we did not grant an officer qualified immunity (or even discuss the issue). There, an off-duty police officer pursued Abraham into a mall parking lot as Abraham fled from Macy's, where he had stolen some clothing. . . Abraham hit another car as he was backing out of his parking space; as he began driving forward, the officer shot and killed him. . . That case is unlike Blair's. To start, Abraham preceded Mullenix, Brosseau, and Plumhoff, in which the Supreme Court developed the contours of qualified immunity for excessive force claims against officers shooting fleeing suspects. Moreover, Abraham did not even discuss the issue of qualified immunity. Further, Abraham involved an off-duty officer's pursuit of a shoplifting suspect who had no gun: it was not at all clear that Abraham posed any threat to anyone at all. Here, while investigating shots fired, the Officers saw a vehicle approaching them down an alleyway, and saw Blair firing a gun at them. Clearly, the level of threat to public safety in Blair's case is not analogous to the threat presented in Abraham. . . Thus, the District Court properly granted the Officers qualified immunity.")

Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 280-82 (3d Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1263 (2018) ("Although we need not address these prongs in any particular order, . . . we exercise our discretion to address both '[b]ecause we believe this case will clarify and elaborate upon our prior jurisprudence in important and necessary ways.'. . . We first consider whether Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy's alleged conduct violated the rights secured to Davenport by the Fourth Amendment. Based on Davenport's version of facts, the District Court concluded that a reasonable jury could find that the officers intentionally shot at Davenport and that the pursuit posed no serious threat of immediate harm to others. This was error, as these assertions are 'blatantly contradicted by the record.'. . First, video evidence indisputably shows a heavy pedestrian presence during the course of the pursuit. And second, throughout the pursuit Burris continuously swerved between inbound and outbound lanes, which ultimately led to his colliding with three other vehicles. Considering the serious threat of immediate harm to others, no reasonable jury could conclude that the officers fired at the vehicle for any reason other than to eliminate that threat. Schweitzer shot at the vehicle with the knowledge that Burris refused to yield to officers' continued pursuit and swerved between lanes in an area with high pedestrian traffic. Matakovich and Kennedy shot at the vehicle with the additional knowledge that Burris continued the dangerous vehicular pursuit despite sustaining police fire. Given the serious threat of immediate harm to East Carson Street's many pedestrians, even if the officers knew that a passenger was in the vehicle, their conduct was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. . . As such, Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy are entitled to summary judgment because they did not violate Davenport's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .There is an additional and distinct basis on which we must reverse the District Court's denial of qualified immunity to Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy—their alleged conduct did not violate clearly established law. . . .The specific question presented by this case is whether, on January 13, 2013, the law clearly established that an officer who, in an attempt to eliminate the serious threat of immediate harm to others created by a vehicle's flight shoots the vehicle's passenger, violates that passenger's rights under the Fourth Amendment. We hold that it did not. The District Court concluded that Tennessee v. Garner clearly established that the officers' alleged conduct was unlawful. . . .The Supreme Court, however, has applied Garner's 'general' test for excessive force in only the 'obvious' case. . . And courts have found 'obvious' cases only in the absence of a serious threat of immediate harm to others. . . .In concluding that this was such an 'obvious' case, the District Court improperly ignored the serious threat of immediate harm to others posed by Burris's flight. The District Court justified limiting its analysis to the threat of harm posed by Davenport's conduct by citing Plumhoff v. Rickard for the proposition that 'Fourth Amendment rights are personal rights that may not be vicariously asserted.'. . But acknowledging the threat of harm posed by Burris's flight neither enhances nor diminishes Davenport's Fourth Amendment rights. Rather, as discussed above, see Part IV–A, supra, it is a necessary factor of our 'objective reasonableness' analysis. Given the serious threat of immediate harm to others that Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy sought to eliminate, Garner does not clearly establish their alleged conduct violated Davenport's constitutional rights. The Supreme Court has never addressed the rights of a passenger involved in a dangerous vehicular pursuit. And while, in the absence of applicable Supreme Court precedent, we may consider 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,'. . . Davenport cites no precedent from this Circuit, or any other, that is on point. Given this near absence of cases, we cannot conclude that Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy acted in a plainly incompetent manner when they attempted to address the serious threat of immediate harm to others posed by Burris's flight. . . For the reasons stated, the judgment of the District Court will be reversed in part and the case remanded with instructions to enter summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity in favor of Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy.")

Johnson v. City of Philadelphia, 837 F.3d 343, 349-53 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Scott abrogates our use of special standards in deadly-force cases and reinstates 'reasonableness' as the ultimate—and only—inquiry. . . . This is not to say that the considerations enumerated in Garner are irrelevant to the reasonableness analysis; to the contrary, in many cases, including this one, a proper assessment of the threat of injury or the risk of flight is crucial to identifying the magnitude of the governmental interests at stake. But such considerations are simply the means by which we approach the ultimate inquiry, not constitutional requirements in their own right. . . .A proper Fourth Amendment analysis requires us to assess not only the reasonableness of Dempsey's actions at the precise moment of the shooting, but the 'totality of circumstances' leading up to the shooting. . . Building out from this principle, Plaintiff argues that even if Dempsey was justified in using deadly force after he was attacked, the seizure as a whole was unreasonable because Dempsey should never have confronted Newsuan in the first place. In support of this argument, Plaintiff cites a Philadelphia Police Department directive that instructs officers who encounter severely mentally disabled persons (including persons experiencing drug-induced psychosis) to wait for back-up, to attempt to de-escalate the situation through conversation, and to retreat rather than resort to force. . . Plaintiff points out that Dempsey knew or should have known that Newsuan was obviously disturbed;. . . that Dempsey knew Newsuan was naked and unarmed; and that

Dempsey also knew that he had responded to two prior calls to the same area without receiving any indication that the subject was endangering or threatening people. Plaintiff asserts that, under these circumstances, it was unreasonable for Dempsey to flout departmental policy by initiating a one-on-one encounter with Newsuan. We do not automatically discount Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment argument or the two presumptions on which it rests: that official police department policies may be considered among other things in the reasonableness inquiry. . . and that a 'totality of the circumstances' analysis should account for whether the officer's own reckless or deliberate conduct unreasonably created the need to use deadly force. . . But there is no need for us to take up such constitutional considerations here, because Plaintiff's claim founders on a more fundamental tort requirement: proximate causation. Whether or not Dempsey acted unreasonably at the outset of his encounter with Newsuan, Plaintiff must still prove that Dempsey's allegedly unconstitutional actions proximately caused Newsuan's death. . . Under ordinary tort principles, a superseding cause breaks the chain of proximate causation. . . . While there is no precise test for determining when a civilian's intervening acts will constitute a superseding cause of his own injury, relevant considerations include whether the harm actually suffered differs in kind from the harm that would ordinarily have resulted from the officer's initial actions; whether the civilian's intervening acts are a reasonably foreseeable response to the officer's initial actions; whether the civilian's intervening acts are themselves inherently wrongful or illegal; and the culpability of the civilian's intervening acts . . .Although proximate causation is generally a question of fact, . . . it 'becomes an issue of law when there is no evidence from which a jury could reasonably find the required proximate, causal nexus between the careless act and the resulting injuries.'. . Here, we conclude as a matter of law that Newsuan's violent, precipitate, and illegal attack on Officer Dempsey severed any causal connection between Dempsey's initial actions and his subsequent use of deadly force during the struggle in the street. Whatever harms we may expect to ordinarily flow from an officer's failure to await backup when confronted with a mentally disturbed individual, they do not include the inevitability that the officer will be rushed, choked, slammed into vehicles, and forcibly dispossessed of his service weapon. We therefore have little trouble concluding that Newsuan's life-threatening assault, coupled with his attempt to gain control of Dempsey's gun, was the direct cause of his death. Before continuing on, however, we sound a note of caution. The question of proximate causation in this case is made straightforward by the exceptional circumstances presented—namely, a sudden, unexpected attack that instantly forced the officer into a defensive fight for his life. As discussed above, that rupture in the chain of events, coupled with the extraordinary violence of Newsuan's assault, makes the Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis similarly straightforward. Given the extreme facts of this case, our opinion should not be misread to broadly immunize police officers from Fourth Amendment liability whenever a mentally disturbed person threatens an officer's physical safety. Depending on the severity and immediacy of the threat and any potential risk to public safety posed by an officer's delayed action, it may be appropriate for an officer to retreat or await backup when encountering a mentally disturbed individual. It may also be appropriate for the officer to attempt to de-escalate an encounter to eliminate the need for force or to reduce the amount of force necessary to control an individual. . . Nor should it be assumed that mentally disturbed persons are so inherently unpredictable that their reactions will always sever the chain of causation between an officer's initial actions and a subsequent use of force. If a plaintiff produces competent evidence that persons who have certain illnesses or who are under the influence of certain substances are likely to respond to particular police actions in a particular way, that may be sufficient to create a jury issue on causation. And of course, nothing we say today should discourage police departments and municipalities from devising and rigorously enforcing policies to make tragic events like this one less likely. . . The facts of this case, however, are extraordinary. Whatever the Fourth Amendment requires of officers encountering emotionally or mentally disturbed individuals, it does not oblige an officer to passively endure a life-threatening physical assault, regardless of the assailant's mental state.")

Johnson v. City of Philadelphia, 837 F.3d 343, 354-56 (3d Cir. 2016) (Roth, J., dissenting) ("While the members of the majority may be satisfied that Newsuan's attack on Officer Dempsey was sufficient to sever any causal chain, I believe that Newsuan's reaction was, unfortunately, all too foreseeable. Directive 136—the police regulation that Officer Dempsey supposedly violated—states that its main objective 'is to aid and protect the interests of the [mentally disturbed person], innocent bystanders, and family members in the immediate area, without compromising the safety of all parties concerned, including the police officers. This is best accomplished by DEESCALATING THE INCIDENT' (emphasis in original). . . The purpose of regulations like Directive 136 is clear—to reduce the risk of a deadly confrontation with an extremely vulnerable population. That such a regulation is necessary to reduce the risk of a deadly confrontation demonstrates that deadly confrontations are a foreseeable result of ignoring the regulation. . . . By knowingly violating a police department regulation designed to keep mentally disturbed individuals safe, Dempsey set into motion the confrontation that ultimately led to Newsuan's death – a confrontation whose foreseeability was the impetus for the establishment of Directive 136. . . .I am also not persuaded that Newsuan's attack was an unforeseeable result of his being tased by Officer Dempsey. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, Dempsey was aware that Newsuan was on PCP at the time of their encounter. The Philadelphia Police Department teaches its officers that a taser strike may fail to subdue a suspect on PCP due to the drug's effects on pain tolerance. . . It was therefore foreseeable to Officer Dempsey that his taser would be ineffective against Newsuan. The most favorable account of the facts prior to Newsuan's being tased is that Newsuan was 'approaching' Officer Dempsey—presumably in response to Dempsey's request that Newsuan 'come here.' A jury could reasonably conclude that Officer Dempsey, by firing his taser, took an 'immediate aggressive action' in violation of police department regulations and in doing so escalated the situation and created a risk of harm to both himself and to Newsuan. The death of individuals with mental health problems at the hands of the police continues to occur across the country. . . The first line of defense against these incidents is the establishment of police regulations designed to prevent interactions between police officers and mentally disabled people from escalating into deadly confrontations. Declaring that an officer who disregards such a regulation has not proximately caused a violent confrontation that the regulation is in place to prevent renders the regulation toothless. Given the available factual accounts of the events leading up to Newsuan's eventual death, including the possible disregard of a regulation that was designed to guard against violent confrontations, I cannot say that 'there is no evidence from which a jury could reasonably find the required proximate, causal nexus between the careless act and the resulting injuries.'. . For the above reasons, I respectfully dissent. I would reverse the judgment of the District Court and remand this case for further proceedings.")

Zion v. Nassan, 556 F. App'x 103, 107-09 (3d Cir. 2014) ("Abraham requires us to conclude that the pleadings contain facts demonstrating a Fourth Amendment violation. The facts we must accept state that the officers followed Haniotakis's car for a short time and were directed by dispatch or a superior officer to discontinue the pursuit. After Haniotakis collided with a parked car, he continued down the street 'at or below the posted speed limits,' which did not exceed twenty-five miles per hour. . .The shots were fired when Haniotakis was moving his vehicle forward, and the angle of the shots indicates that Nassan was not directly behind Haniotakis's car when the shots were fired. . .Continuing to drive at a relatively slow speed away from the police after a minor collision with a parked car does not create a level of danger to justify the use of deadly force. While the plaintiffs' allegations may not ultimately be proven, the facts as pled would clearly subject the officers to liability under Abraham because Haniotakis's behavior was no more dangerous than Abraham's and the level of force used was identical. The defendants argue that even if there was a Fourth Amendment violation, they are entitled to qualified immunity because two Supreme Court cases decided after Abraham altered the law and perhaps overruled Abraham. . . . The defendants maintain that Brosseau and Scott contradict Abraham to such a degree that it is no longer good law, and that consequently there was no clearly-established rule to guide the officers here. . . We disagree. First, we have continued to cite Abraham as good law. . . Second, as noted by the District Court, the shooting in Brosseau occurred before Abraham was decided (and occurred within a different judicial circuit); since the Court in Brosseau did not opine on the constitutional question but relied only on qualified immunity, its conclusion that the law was unclear at that time is of little consequence to our decision. Finally, unlike Abraham, neither Brosseau nor Scott contained facts comparable to those found in Zion's pleadings. Both Brosseau and Scott came to the Supreme Court after summary judgment motions, and the facts developed demonstrated a higher level of danger (to officers and the public) than the situation described in Zion's pleadings. And even with the higher level of danger in Scott, the Supreme Court specifically noted the fact that the officer's decision to bump the suspect's car was not as dangerous as deciding to shoot the suspect. . .In short, contrary to the defendants' arguments, Scott and Abraham are in fact in harmony: it may be reasonable for an officer to bump a car off the road to stop a reckless driver who is placing others in peril, while simultaneously unreasonable to shoot directly at a driver who is coming toward an officer when the officer has the opportunity to move out of the way. While it is entirely possible that discovery will show that Haniotakis's actions put the officers or the public in significant danger, the facts contained in the pleadings do not demonstrate danger that would justify the use of deadly force. Thus, it would be premature to grant the defendants qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.")

Lamont ex rel. Estate of Quick v. New Jersey, 637 F.3d 177, 184, 185 (3d Cir. 2011) ("The plaintiff argues that there is a triable issue on whether the troopers' continued use of force, even if initially justified, became excessive as the events unfolded. We agree. Even where an officer is initially justified in using force, he may not continue to use such force after it has become evident that the threat justifying the force has vanished. [citing cases] Here, the troopers opened fire as Quick yanked his right hand out of his waistband. At that point, the troopers reasonably believed that Quick was pulling a gun on them. But after Quick made this sudden movement, his right hand was visible to the troopers, who were standing between five and eight feet away and had their flashlights trained on him. . . . In our view, a jury could find that the troopers should have realized that Quick did not have a weapon some time thereafter and ceased fire. . . .Having determined that a jury could find that the troopers' use of force reached excessive proportions, we now move to the second qualified immunity question: whether the right at issue was clearly established. . . We conclude that it was. . . . It has long been the law that an officer may not use deadly force against a suspect unless the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses a threat of serious bodily injury to the officer or others. . . In short, the dispute in this case is about the facts, not the law. The doctrine of qualified immunity is therefore inapposite.")

Giles v. Kearney, 571 F.3d 318, 327 (3rd Cir. 2009) ("No reasonable officer could agree that striking and kicking a subdued, nonresisting inmate in the side, with force enough to cause a broken rib and collapsed lung, was reasonable or necessary under established law.")

Hill v. Nigro, No. 07-3871, 2008 WL 510474, at *2 (3d Cir. Feb. 27, 2008) ("Even assuming arguendo that a genuine issue of material fact exists with respect to whether Hill attempted to run over Officer Nigro, the record is clear that a reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that Hill posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to others. During his guilty plea, Hill conceded that the police asked him to pull over, but that he refused and drove away at a speed high enough to cause the death or serious injury of anyone he hit. Indeed, while attempting to elude arrest, Hill crashed into another car and its driver had to be taken to the hospital for injuries he sustained. Under these circumstances, we conclude that summary judgment was properly entered in favor of Officer Nigro.").

Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 206, 207 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Taking account of the entire episode and the information Davis possessed at the time, we hold Davis is entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that Gilles did not engage in disorderly conduct. . .While the Court of Common Pleas held Gilles' speech was insufficient to constitute disorderly conduct, it does not necessarily follow that the arresting officers are civilly liable for the arrest. Qualified immunity encompasses mistaken judgments that are not plainly incompetent. . . Under qualified immunity, police officers are entitled to a certain amount of deference for decisions they make in the field. They must make 'split-second judgments–in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'").

Harvey v. Plains Township Police Department, 421 F.3d 185, 193, 194 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Our dissenting colleague argues that our conclusion runs afoul of Anderson v. Creighton . . . because Dombroski 'could have believed that his conduct was lawful in light of the information in his possession.' We certainly agree, as we must, that Creighton requires a particularized inquiry, involving consideration of both the law as clearly established at the time of the conduct in question and the information within the officer's possession at that time. However, we part ways when considering whether the information in Dombroski's possession could reasonably have supported the belief that his actions were constitutional. As an initial note, there is no need to 'particularize' the Fourth Amendment right implicated here beyond 'the basic rule, well established by [Supreme Court] cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.' . . . As in Groh, there was no exigency here, and the Groh Court rejected, over a dissent, the notion that 'ample room' must be made for mistaken judgments of law or fact in cases in which no exigency exists. . . Thus, the simple question we are faced with is whether it was reasonable for Dombroski to infer consent from the knowledge in his possession. Our dissenting colleague notes that 'there is a presumption that a properly mailed item is received by the addressee.' However, we do not see how Dombroski could reasonably infer from the presumption of mailing that Harvey consented to anybody entering her apartment.'. . Our colleague seems to question what Dombroski should have done 'at what he understood to be a long prearranged appointment.' He should have done exactly what he was dispatched to do-keep the peace-and not affirmatively aid in the removal of property from Harvey's apartment. We stress that, at this stage, we must take for a fact that the officer ordered the landlord to open the door. This, and only this, is the action we find to be unreasonable, and clearly so.").

Bennett v. Murphy, 120 F. App'x 914, 2005 WL 78581, at 3- 6 (3d Cir. Jan. 14, 2005) ("At the outset we recognize that there is a degree of 'duplication inherent in [Saucier's] two-part scheme' as applied to excessive force cases. . . That is, the question whether the amount of force an officer used was unreasonable and violated the Fourth Amendment may be viewed as blending somewhat into the question whether the officer reasonably believed that the amount of force he used was lawful. But Saucier makes clear that the two inquiries are distinct: Even where an officer's actions are unreasonable under Graham's constitutional standard (as Bennett II held was true of Murphy's conduct), that officer is still entitled to immunity if he or she has a reasonable 'mistaken understanding as to whether a particular amount of force is legal' in a given factual situation . . . Murphy thus asserts that even assuming his actions were constitutionally unreasonable, he made a reasonable mistake as to the legality of those actions. To support that assertion he puts forth two related arguments. First, he contends that Garner's 'immediate threat' standard, while clearly established, offered no guidance in the particular situation he faced. In that respect we are of course mindful of the principle, which the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed in Brosseau v. Haugen . . . that the inquiry whether an injured party's constitutional right was clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' Applying that principle, Brosseau . . . stated that Graham and Garner 'are cast at a high level of generality' and provided little guidance as applied to the situation confronting the officer in that case: 'whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight.' We agree of course that Graham and Garner set out a standard that is general in nature in the context addressed in Brosseau. And we also agree with the District Court that there are circumstances, such as those in Brosseau, in which the 'immediate threat' standard may be 'subject to differing interpretations in practice' . . . . But we cannot say that the Graham and Garner 'immediate threat' standard is lacking in adequate substantive content as applied to the very different situation that Murphy addressed in Bennett's factual scenario: whether to shoot an armed distraught man who, although refusing to drop his weapon over the course of an hour-long standoff, had never pointed his single-shot shotgun at anyone but himself and who was not in flight at the time he was shot . . . As United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 271 (1997) teaches, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to public servants that their conduct is unlawful. And because (as we held in Bennett II) the facts alleged by Bennett disclose no basis from which to conclude that David posed an immediate threat to anyone but himself, we conclude that this case is one in which the 'general constitutional rule already identified in decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' . . . Murphy's second and related argument is that in light of what he terms 'similar' cases involving deadly force, his mistaken application of the 'immediate threat' standard was reasonable. Murphy cites two of those cases, Montoute and Leong, in support of the proposition that he reasonably believed David could lawfully be shot because he had a weapon and refused to put it down. But in reality neither of those cases calls into question the rule, recognized as clearly established prior to this incident by the Ninth Circuit in Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189, 1204 (9th Cir.1997), that under Graham and Garner '[l]aw enforcement officers may not kill suspects who do not pose an immediate threat to their safety or to the safety of others simply because they are armed.' . . . Murphy cites a number of other cases in his brief in attempted support of his contention that he could not reasonably understand what the law required in the circumstances he faced. To the contrary, the contrast between the situations confronting the officers in those cases . . . and the scenario in this case actually point in the opposite direction. On the facts as we must credit them, Murphy acted precipitately at a time and under circumstances totally lacking in the urgency posed by all of those cases: More than an hour had passed during the standoff with David, a period throughout which he had threatened to harm no one but himself; and when Murphy chose that instant to shoot to kill, David was at a standstill 20 to 25 yards from the nearest officer and fully 80 yards from Murphy himself. Surely Murphy cannot rely on such cases, all of them involving suspects who unquestionably posed an immediate threat of physical harm to police, in support of the contention that he reasonably believed it was lawful to shoot David, who posed no such threat. To be sure, those other cases may illustrate that the concept of excessive force 'is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case' [citing Brosseau] But as we have already explained, the facts alleged by Bennett, which we take as true for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry, are such that any reasonable officer would understand, without reference to any other case law, that Graham and Garner prohibited shooting David. For that reason we conclude that Murphy is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Daniels v. City of Pittsburgh, No. CV 18-1019, 2022 WL 952855, at *3 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2022) ("The Supreme Court's recognition that deadly force is not justified where a fleeing suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer, or others, is inapplicable. Irrespective of whether Decedent still had a weapon at the time of the final confrontation, Officer Macioce believed him to have fired shots on officers minutes before. Contrary to Plaintiff counsel's suggestion, the law did not require the Officer to 'see the gun' one more time, before he could return force in kind. . . . In light of the aforementioned legal authority. . . . it is unsurprising that Officer Macioce also enjoys qualified immunity. As already seen, Defendants have shown that there was no violation of a constitutional right. Plaintiff also cannot show a violation of clearly established law. As long has been the case, '[w]here [an] officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force.'. . The Court rejects Plaintiff's counter-formulation of the right(s) in question. Counsel posits that the specific right violated was 'Decedent's right to be free from the use of deadly force while running away from a police officer, when he did not pose any articulable threat, was not visibly armed, and there was no probable cause to believe he was involved in an earlier shooting.'. . Obviously, Plaintiff's formulation bears little resemblance to the facts and determinations above. Most of the arguments 'baked in' already have been rejected, either directly or by implication. A point warranting further comment, however, is Plaintiff's suggestion that 'probable cause' is relevant. Along the same lines, counsel flirts with the notion that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to pursue and intercept the presumably unknown subject exiting Betts Market. . .As to the first point, it is important to note that the Supreme Court in Garner stated:

'[I]f the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape.'. . Officer Macioce already has been determined to have had an objectively reasonable belief that Decedent fired on him; and his belief has been corroborated by crime-scene and other evidence. Of course, firing on police officers is grounds for probable cause, but framing the issue as such is distracting and unnecessary. As to reasonable suspicion, Plaintiff's counsel understandably tread carefully in this area, given their insinuation that the officers, at all times, had 'the wrong man.' To claim that the person exiting Betts Market was not Decedent – and that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to pursue any individual who did − raises the specter not only of standing, but concerns against talking out of both sides of one's mouth. In the end, such ruminations are neither helpful nor necessary. The unrefuted evidence establishes that the officers pursued an individual, and that an individual fired a weapon at them shortly thereafter. There is no competent evidence refuting Officer Macioce's belief, later corroborated, that the individual who shot at him was Decedent. By the time of the fire-fight, any causal link between the officers' surveillance near Betts Market and the final, unfortunate incident had long been severed.")

Martin v. City of Reading, 118 F.Supp.3d 751, 765-66 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("Unlike the majority of cases charging law enforcement officers with using Tasers unreasonably, the question here is not whether a reasonable officer would know whether the pain inflicted by the electric shock of a Taser crosses the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . The focus here is not on the qualitative characteristics of the particular type of weapon Defendant Errington chose to employ, but whether a reasonable officer would understand that attempting to effect Plaintiff's arrest by using force that carried with it a risk of serious injury or death violated Plaintiff's rights. . . .Thus, it matters not that no judge of this district or panel of the Third Circuit appears to have passed on the legality of using a Taser on an individual at risk of injury from a fall. Based on the Reading Police Department's policy that forbids the use of Tasers when 'the subject is in a position where a fall may cause substantial injury or death' and the fact that '[i]t is widely known among law enforcement ... that tasers should not be employed against suspects on elevated surfaces because of the risk of serious injury from a resulting fall,'. . . this Court cannot say that 'reasonable officials in [Defendant Errington's] position at the relevant time could have believed,' under Plaintiff's version of the events, that Defendant's Errington's choice to deploy his Taser was lawful[.]. . . Thus, affording Defendant Errington qualified immunity at this time is inappropriate in light of the genuine dispute between the parties of the facts bearing on his entitlement to immunity. This conclusion is consistent with the views of at least two Courts of Appeals and a number of district courts that have confronted excessive force claims arising out of the use of Tasers on suspects who were at a risk of falling. [collecting cases] Accordingly, Defendant Errington's Motion for Summary Judgment based on the doctrine of qualified immunity is denied.") Stauffer v. Simpkins, No. CIV.A. 13-1094, 2015 WL 667012, at *3-5 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 13, 2015) ("Stauffer suggests in his complaint that he did not pose a dangerous risk to the police officers when they 'unloaded their firearms' into his car. He alleges that he only put his car in drive, he did not attempt to drive into the police officers, and none of the police officers were injured. . . Although Stauffer's excessive force claim may have merit under the reasoning of Garner if these facts and inferences are accepted, they directly contradict Stauffer's criminal convictions, which establish that he recklessly placed the officers in danger of death or serious bodily injury and caused bodily injury to one of the officers with a deadly weapon, i.e., his car. . . Furthermore, once these established facts are considered within the context of Stauffer's complaint, a jury could not find, under the reasoning of Scott and Plumhoff, that the police officers' use of force in response to Stauffer's action was objectively unreasonable. As Stauffer concedes, the police officers fired their guns only after they had surrounded Stauffer's car and Stauffer put the car in drive, i.e., when Stauffer placed them at risk of death or serious bodily injury. . . Even if Stauffer did not know that the men approaching him were police officers, his conduct posed a serious risk of danger to the officers, requiring them to act quickly to protect themselves. . . Similarly, although none of the police officers were seriously injured, the officers could not have known that they would be so fortunate at the time of the incident. . . Thus, because Stauffer cannot prevail on his excessive force claim when the legal elements established by his criminal convictions are considered, his claim must be dismissed pursuant to Heck. Stauffer claims Garrison v. Porch, 376 Fed. App'x 274, 277–78 (3d Cir.2010), precludes dismissal under Heck. The Garrison court reasoned that 'the fact that Garrison's threatened or attempted use of force was unlawful does not automatically mean that there is no use of force that [the police officer] could have used in response which could have risen to the level unreasonable and excessive.'. . In Garrison, the plaintiff was convicted of only simple assault and resisting arrest for raising his arms in an attempt to strike a police officer who was trying to handcuff him for public urination. In contrast, Stauffer was convicted of aggravated assault, and three counts of simple assault and reckless endangerment because he placed the police officers in danger of death or serious bodily injury by driving his car, i.e., a deadly weapon, toward them and hitting one officer with the car. The cases are factually distinguishable and require different results under the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness test. Stauffer's reliance on Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (3d Cir.1999), which overruled a grant of summary judgment in favor of the police, also is misplaced. Abraham was killed while driving his car toward police and was never charged or convicted of a crime. . . The Court held only that disputed material facts existed on the excessive force claim brought by his estate. . . It had no occasion to apply Heck, which controls here. Even if Stauffer's criminal convictions could co-exist with his excessive force claim, the police officers would be entitled to immunity on that claim. . . Stauffer fails to identify any clearly established law that shows the police officers' conduct was unconstitutional. Instead, he argues that I must accept all of his allegations and deny immunity if he is entitled to relief under any set of facts consistent with those allegations. . . Although I agree that I must view all facts and inferences in the light most favorable to Stauffer, I cannot do so where they are inconsistent with matters of public record or items of judicial notice. . . Thus, I must reject Stauffer's claims that none of the officers were in danger or injured in the incident because these allegations contradict the elements established by Stauffer's criminal convictions, as shown by the state court docket and the Pennsylvania criminal statutes. . . Furthermore, when the elements established by Stauffer's convictions are considered with the other facts alleged in Stauffer's complaint, the police officers' conduct did not violate a clearly established law. . .Stauffer's excessive force claim is dismissed because it cannot be reconciled with his criminal convictions and because the police officers are entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged use of force.")

Brown v. Burghart, No. 10–3374, 2013 WL 1334183, *2, *3 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 3, 2013) ("Neither Trooper Burghart nor Trooper LeMaire had ever deployed their tasers in the field before encountering Mr. Brown. In fact, they had each received taser training only a handful of months prior to the encounter—Trooper Burghart received training in March 2008, and Trooper LeMaire received training in June 2008. One topic discussed at the training was the potential of tasers igniting flammable materials. For instance, the officers were trained that a taser could ignite certain types of alcohol-based pepper spray, chemicals present in methamphetamine labs, gasoline, gasoline vapors, and drinking alcohol. Both officers testified that they were aware, prior to August 24, 2008, that a taser could ignite flammable materials such as gasoline or gasoline fumes and that gas leaks and/or spills are possible at the scene of a motor vehicle accident. Neither officer gave a thought to the possibility of gasoline or gas vapors at the scene of Mr. Brown's arrest, however. The officers were also trained that the application of the taser was subject to the same statutory and case law requirements as any other law enforcement tool and that reasonableness in the use of force depended on the totality of the circumstances. . . .This Court has already held, and reaffirmed in ruling on Trooper Burghart's motion for reconsideration, that there are genuine issues of material fact as to whether Trooper Burghart violated Mr. Brown's constitutional rights when he deployed his taser in the presence of leaking gasoline, and that Trooper Burghart is not entitled to qualified immunity because 'an officer familiar with legal precedent regarding the amount of force appropriate in the case of (1) an unarmed, but resisting suspect (2) who was not attempting to harm officers and, (3) aside from resisting arrest, had only committed traffic violations surely would not conclude that conduct risking lighting that suspect on fire was an appropriate amount of force.'. . Trooper LeMaire had the same opportunities to assess the situation as Trooper Burghart, so despite his attempts to reargue whether the use of a taser under these circumstances violated Mr. Brown's rights and whether the law was or was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . the only real issue remaining here is whether there are material factual disputes as to whether Trooper LeMaire had an opportunity to intervene. Here, Trooper LeMaire had slightly over four minutes between the last time he tasered Mr. Brown and Trooper Burghart's first taser deployment, and he had eight seconds between the first and second time Trooper Burghart used his taser during which Trooper LeMaire could have advised Trooper Burghart to refrain from tasering Mr. Brown. Trooper LeMaire argues, without citing to any case law, that Mr. Brown must show 'unequivocally' that Trooper LeMaire knew that there was spilled gasoline in order to hold him responsible for failing to intervene here. However, as previously discussed by this Court, the standard is not whether he subjectively knew about the gasoline, but what an objectively reasonable officer would have done under the same circumstances. Those circumstances included an overturned motor scooter, the knowledge that vehicle accidents may result in gasoline spills, and the knowledge that using a taser in the presence of flammable material causes a fire risk. . . Here, Trooper LeMaire arguably had two windows of opportunity to prevent his companion from using his taser under the dangerous circumstances facing the officers and Mr. Brown—the four minutes between his last taser use and Trooper Burghart's first, and the eight seconds between Trooper Burghart's first and second taser uses. There is no evidence that he did so or attempted to do so. Whether or not these two windows of time were enough to give Trooper LeMaire a reasonable opportunity to intervene is a question for the factfinder. Thus, the Court will not grant summary judgment in favor of Trooper LeMaire.")

Morais v. City of Philadelphia, No. 06-582, 2007 WL 853811, at *7, *8 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 19, 2007) ("Plaintiff's primary contention, however, is that Defendants' actions in breaching the apartment unreasonably created the need for the use of deadly force. Although, Defendant [sic] has potentially stated a Fourth Amendment violation for the shooting, the court will decline to decide whether such a claim can be successful, because such a right was not clearly established. . . . Assuming Plaintiff could establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment under the theory that the officers' actions unreasonablely created the need for deadly force, such a theory was not clearly established law. In arguing that Defendants' reckless actions and violations of police policy created the need for deadly force, Plaintiff attempts to blend his Fourth Amendment excessive force analysis with a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment state-created danger doctrine. The Third Circuit has deferred deciding 'for another day' whether a police officer's actions that create the need for deadly force may establish a Fourth Amendment violation. . . The Circuits that have addressed this issue have reached different conclusions. . . . Thus, as the Third Circuit has not yet adopted this approach, and other circuits have disagreed about its application, it cannot be said the officers violated a clearly established constitutional right.")

Estate of Jones by Jones v. City of Martinsburg, W. Virginia, 961 F.3d 661, 667-73 (4th Cir. 2020) ("For the first time, we consider whether the five officers who shot and killed Jones as he lay on the ground are protected by qualified immunity. We review the district court's grant of summary judgment de novo. . . Awarding the officers summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is only appropriate if they demonstrate 'that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and [that they are] entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . We view the evidence in the light most favorable to the Estate and draw any reasonable inferences in its favor. . . . Because this appeal arises from a summary judgment, and because we previously held that a jury could find that the officers violated Jones's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force, Estate of Jones, 726 F. App'x at 179, this appeal turns on whether Jones's right was clearly established. . . . In the context of an ongoing police encounter such as this one, we 'focus on the moment that the force is employed.'. . Here, there are two distinct facts that separately define Jones's right to be free from excessive force at an appropriate level of specificity: (1) Jones, although armed, had been secured by the officers immediately before he was released and shot; and (2) Jones, although armed, was incapacitated at the time he was shot. Because it was clearly established that officers may not shoot a secured or incapacitated person, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Concededly, as deemed admitted and unlike the suspects in Meyers and Kane, Jones was armed with a knife, which was tucked into his sleeve, and yet which he somehow used to stab an officer. Although problematic for the Estate, these admitted facts do not preclude a jury from finding that he was secured. It was already established that armed suspects can be secured even before an officer disarms them. . . Given the relatively inaccessible location of the knife, and the physical inability to wield it given his position on the ground, the number of officers on Jones, and Jones's physical state by this time, it would be particularly reasonable to find that Jones was secured while still armed. The obvious retort is that a suspect who stabs an officer is not secured. But even given that admission, there remains a genuine question of fact as to whether Jones was secured at any point after Staub felt the knife, and before the officers simultaneously backed away. Staub called out multiple times that Jones had a knife, and another officer yelled to get back, all before the officers retreated. . .To be sure, the incident moved quickly. But during all of this, Jones was still on the ground, with five officers on him. A jury could reasonably find that Jones was secured before the officers backed away, and that the officers could have disarmed Jones and handcuffed him, rather than simultaneously release him. If Jones was secured, then police officers could not constitutionally release him, back away, and shoot him. To do so violated Jones's constitutional right to be free from deadly force under clearly established law. . . .Second, and even were it to find that Jones was not secured, a jury could still reasonably find that he was incapacitated by the time of the shooting. Jones had been tased four times, hit in the brachial plexus, kicked, and placed in a choke hold, at which point gurgling can be heard in the video. A jury could reasonably infer that Jones was struggling to breathe. He lay on his side and stomach on the concrete with five officers on him. And when the officers got up and backed away, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Estate, the officers saw his left arm fall limply to his body. Unsurprisingly, it was clearly established in 2013 that officers may not use force against an incapacitated suspect. . . . [I]t was also clearly established at the time of Jones's death that simply being armed is insufficient to justify deadly force. . . And, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Estate, Jones was not even wielding the knife when the officers shot him; it was pinned under the right side of his body, which was on the ground, and tucked into his sleeve. . . . By shooting an incapacitated, injured person who was not moving, and who was laying on his knife, the police officers crossed a 'bright line' and can be held liable. . . .Wayne Jones was killed just over one year before the Ferguson, Missouri shooting of Michael Brown would once again draw national scrutiny to police shootings of black people in the United States. Seven years later, we are asked to decide whether it was clearly established that five officers could not shoot a man 22 times as he lay motionless on the ground. Although we recognize that our police officers are often asked to make split-second decisions, we expect them to do so with respect for the dignity and worth of black lives. Before the ink dried on this opinion, the FBI opened an investigation into yet another death of a black man at the hands of police, this time George Floyd in Minneapolis. This has to stop. To award qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage in this case would signal absolute immunity for fear-based use of deadly force, which we cannot accept. The district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is reversed, and the dismissal of that claim is hereby vacated.") Cansler v. Hanks, 777 F. App'x 627, ___ (4th Cir. 2019) ("At the close of the evidence, the district court conducted a charge conference and considered the contents of the jury charge. Pertinent to this appeal, the court addressed Cansler's seventh proposed instruction, entitled '§ 1983 — Use of a Taser – Degree of Force' (hereinafter 'Instruction No. 7'). . . That instruction provided in full:

Deploying a [t]aser is a serious use of force that is designed to inflict a painful blow. It may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the [t]aser. . . .We have never required a trial court to instruct a jury that a police officer must confront a dangerous situation in order to reasonably use a taser. And such a decree would conflict with the applicable multi-factor analysis for resolving claims of excessive force. The pertinent decisions undercut Cansler's contention and support the rejection of Instruction No. 7. . . . Although neither Graham nor Scott addressed a taser usage, those decisions control our analysis of excessive force claims, such as the one being pursued by Cansler. That is, we assess an excessive force claim under Graham's multi-factor balancing assessment, and we do not apply 'magical on/off switch[es]' or 'rigid preconditions' in evaluating the reasonableness of a use of force. . . .Cansler maintains that Armstrong and Yates required the district court to instruct the jury in accordance therewith. According to Cansler, Instruction No. 7 is the only correct statement of the applicable law for claims of excessive force with a taser. This contention fails for several reasons. . . First, in both Armstrong and Yates, we applied the Graham balancing analysis to the factual predicates presented, just as the district court instructed the jury to do here. . . Unlike the factual predicate in this case, the Armstrong and Yates panels were obliged to accept the facts in favor of those plaintiffs. The jury charge in this case contained the legal standard utilized in both Armstrong and Yates — that is, the objective reasonableness standard required by the Supreme Court in Graham — and the factual findings were left for the jury to determine. . .Second, neither Armstrong nor Yates requires a trial court to instruct on the legal conclusions reached in those decisions. In fact, neither of those decisions addressed an issue concerning jury instructions. They addressed the propriety of qualified immunity awards in summary judgment proceedings. And appellate opinions do not necessarily translate into mandated jury instructions. . . . Put succinctly, neither Armstrong nor Yates established a rule for taser usage that is applicable to every situation. Although Instruction No. 7 could be a correct legal statement in limited circumstances, Armstrong and Yates do not usurp a trial judge's obligation to give a jury charge that complies with Graham.")

Williams v. Strickland, 917 F.3d 763, 768-70 (4th Cir. 2019) ("We may review the portion of the district court's order denying Strickland and Heroux's motions for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. But our review may reach only one question: would the officers be entitled to qualified immunity if a jury concluded that they had fired on Williams when they were no longer in the trajectory of Williams's car? We turn to that question now. . . .Qualified immunity 'protects government officials from liability for violations of constitutional rights that were not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . Given this standard, we must determine two things. First, if Strickland and Heroux fired on Williams after they were no longer in the path of Williams's car, did they violate Williams's Fourth Amendment right to freedom from excessive force? Second, as of June 29, 2012, was it clearly established that using deadly force against Williams after the officers were no longer in the car's trajectory would violate Williams's right to freedom from excessive force?[4] The answer to both questions is yes. . . . Following Waterman, we have no difficulty concluding that if Strickland and Heroux started or continued to fire on Williams after they were no longer in the trajectory of Williams's car, they violated Williams's Fourth Amendment right to freedom from excessive force. . . .[A]lthough we must avoid ambushing government officials with liability for good-faith mistakes made at the unsettled peripheries of the law, we need not—and should not—assume that government officials are incapable of drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense. In some cases, government officials can be expected to know that if X is illegal, then Y is also illegal, despite factual differences between the two. That said, the instant case requires no subtle line-drawing: The right that the officers allegedly violated falls well within the ambit of clearly established law. When we decided Waterman, in 2005, we clearly established that (1) law enforcement officers may—under certain conditions—be justified in using deadly force against the driver of a car when they are in the car's trajectory and have reason to believe that the driver will imminently and intentionally run over them, but (2) the same officers violate the Fourth Amendment if they employ deadly force against the driver once they are no longer in the car's trajectory. . . Waterman obviously and manifestly encompasses the facts of this case. In light of Waterman, there can be no question that the right Williams seeks to vindicate was clearly established on the day he was shot. To summarize: A reasonable jury could conclude that Strickland and Heroux acted in a way that, as a matter of law, violated Williams's clearly established federal rights—specifically, his Fourth Amendment right to freedom from excessive force. Therefore, the officers are not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and the district court correctly denied their motions.")

Hensley on behalf of N. Carolina v. Price, 876 F.3d 573, 582-86 (4th Cir. 2017) ("If a jury credited the plaintiffs' evidence, it could conclude that the Deputies shot Hensley only because he was holding a gun, although he never raised the gun to threaten the Deputies. Indeed, he never pointed the gun at anyone. Moreover, the Deputies had ample time, under the plaintiffs' evidence, to warn Hensley to drop his gun or stop before shooting him, but they concede they never gave any such warning. Because the use of force in such circumstances would be objectively unreasonable, we must affirm the district court's summary judgment order denying the Deputies qualified immunity on the § 1983 claim. . . .The Deputies responded to a domestic disturbance at Hensley's home, but had no specific information about the situation. When they arrived shortly after dawn, Hensley and his daughters stepped out of the home and onto the porch. Hensley had a handgun, but never raised it toward the Deputies. According to the plaintiffs' evidence, if believed by a jury, Hensley made no threatening statements or actions toward anyone in the moments immediately preceding the shooting. Instead, Hensley stepped off the porch and into the yard, keeping the handgun pointed toward the ground at all times. Nevertheless, almost immediately after he stepped into the yard, the Deputies opened fire on Hensley and killed him without warning. If a jury credited the plaintiffs' version of the facts, it could reasonably conclude that because Hensley never raised the gun to the officers, and because he never otherwise threatened them, the Deputies shot Hensley simply because he had possession of a firearm. As we held in Cooper, such conduct violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because a jury crediting the plaintiffs' version of the facts could conclude that the Deputies were not in any immediate danger when they fired their weapons, the failure to warn Hensley also weighs against them. In the moments leading up to the fatal shooting, the Deputies watched Hensley descend the steps from the porch into the yard. They watched him pause and look back to the house. And they briefly watched as Hensley walked toward them. While this scene played out in front of them, the Deputies concede they never ordered Hensley to drop the gun or warned that they would shoot. While we have no doubt the circumstances confronting the Deputies were tense and fast moving, that fact alone does not obviate Garner's warning admonition. . . .In sum, we conclude that the district court correctly denied the requested grant of qualified immunity. If a jury were to credit the plaintiffs' evidence, it could conclude that Hensley never raised the gun, never threatened the Deputies, and never received a warning command. In that circumstance, the Deputies were not in any immediate danger and were not entitled to shoot Hensley. Under those circumstances, the Deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Hensley on behalf of N. Carolina v. Price, 876 F.3d 573, 592-96 (4th Cir. 2017) (Shedd, J., dissenting) ("Less than fifteen seconds elapsed from the time the officers pulled into the driveway until the time the shots were fired. During that time, both officers took defensive positions and postures—like Deputy Beasley throwing himself down on his front seat—that were consistent with their belief that they were seriously under threat and afraid for their lives. A reasonable officer would have believed that Deputy Beasley was under imminent threat of serious physical harm: Hensley began a continuous pattern of aggressive and threatening behavior from the moment the officers arrived and was within 30 feet of Deputy Beasley and armed with a gun—with no suggestion that he was slowing down or attempting to communicate with the Deputies—at the time the Deputies fired. . . .Viewed without 20/20 hindsight, this case falls within the heartland of cases in which we have consistently granted summary judgment to police officers using deadly force. . . .After erroneously concluding that the Deputies violated Hensley's right to be free from excessive force, the majority avoids ruling upon whether they are entitled to qualified immunity, instead finding that the Deputies waived the issue. . . .[E]ven if the Deputies did waive the argument that the law was not clearly established, I would still reach the issue. The majority speaks of waiver in absolute terms but, because waiver is judicially created, 'we possess the discretion under appropriate circumstances to disregard the parties' inattention.'. . .To be clear, the majority is sua sponte concluding that the Deputies waived this argument. The Plaintiffs did not raise waiver in their brief. To the contrary, their brief at several points discusses whether Hensley's right was clearly established. . . .Before today, when confronted by an armed person who had just committed a violent crime and was advancing towards them, an officer was entitled to believe that they were under imminent threat. Now, however, under the majority's rule, unless and until the officer has either issued a warning or waited for the armed individual to aim his weapon, further compounding the risk of officer harm, the officers must pause before taking action or face § 1983 liability. Because neither caselaw from our Court nor the Supreme Court supports § 1983 liability in such circumstances, I dissent.")

Jones v. Gross, 675 F. App'x 266, 269-70 (4th Cir. 2017) ("Here, all factors weigh in Gross's favor. Gross witnessed three masked men robbing a store, one of whom was holding a gun to a hostage's head. It was reasonable for Gross to believe that Jones--fleeing down a public road with a backpack at night and in the rain--was also armed and dangerous. . . The time between the robbers exiting the store and the shooting was undeniably brief, as Jones had not run the length of the store before he fell from the shot. Police officers must make swift decisions with limited information. Gross had probable cause to believe that Jones posed a threat to the safety of others while attempting to elude law enforcement. We therefore hold that, on the undisputed facts, Gross's use of lethal force was objectively reasonable and, therefore, Gross is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Jones contends that summary judgment is not warranted because the parties dispute whether Gross fired his weapon in response to a shot from one of the robbers. However, this fact is immaterial because it does not 'affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law.'. .Jones and Gross both agree that, after robbing the store, Jones and the two other men exited while holding an employee hostage. Gross then claims that the gunman pushed the employee to the ground and Gross 'saw the muzzle flash' as the robber 'took a shot' at him, at which point Gross returned fire. According to Jones, however, the weapon used in the robbery was an inoperable BB gun, which, even if it was operational, would not have emitted a muzzle flash. But Gross's actions were objectively reasonable regardless of whether he was returning fire. Gross, confronted in the dark and the rain with three masked robbers--one of whom had been holding a gun to a person's head--did not know whether that gun was real or functional. Given the robbers' evident willingness to put others at risk, Gross reasonably presumed that the robbers posed a threat to himself and others.")

Connor v. Thompson, 647 F.3d 231, 237-39 (4th Cir. 2016) ("As to the first factor, Carter had committed no crime known to Thompson. His uncle called 911 because Carter was suicidal and needed help. . . As to the third factor, nothing in the district court's view of the facts supports a conclusion that Carter intended to flee, nor was he actively resisting arrest. Viewed in the light most favorable to Appellee, the evidence would show that Carter slowly staggered down the steps in the general direction of the Deputy after his uncle said to follow him because Carter's ride to Holly Hill had arrived. Such behavior imparts no indication that would create a governmental interest in inflicting deadly force. . . Here, the parties' arguments center on whether the second factor nonetheless favored the use of force, namely, whether Carter's actions are reasonably believed to have constituted an immediate threat to Thompson or another person. Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Appellee, Carter possessed a paring knife, refused to comply with repeated commands to drop the weapon, and continued down the stairs (and thus closer to Thompson) rather than stopping. As for the knife, we have held 'the mere possession of a [deadly weapon] by a suspect is not enough to permit the use of deadly force.... Instead, deadly force may only be used by a police officer when, based on a reasonable assessment, the officer or another person is threatened with the weapon.'. . And while Carter stubbornly maintained possession of his knife, the assumed circumstances Thompson confronted do not establish that Carter threatened anyone with it. For the present inquiry, the district court appropriately assumed that Carter never raised his knife, changed hands, or acted aggressively with it. We have held that holding a weapon in a non-threatening position while 'ma[king] no sudden moves[ ] ... fail[s] to support the proposition that a reasonable officer would have had probable cause to feel threatened.'. . Thompson, moreover, had been informed that Carter was suicidal, which could have explained the reason for holding the knife. . . .Viewing the district court's assumed facts in totality, we fail to see how they would give a reasonable officer 'probable cause to believe that [Carter] pose[d] a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Those assumed facts depict a non-aggressive, partially incapacitated, non-criminal holding a knife in his own residence while providing no indication that the knife was about to be used to harm someone else. . . Using deadly force against such an individual is unconstitutional, and the district court, therefore, did not err by denying Appellants' motion for summary judgment on the question whether Thompson's actions violated Carter's constitutional rights. . .We turn, then, to the second inquiry in our qualified immunity analysis: Was this constitutional violation clearly established when it occurred? . . . In this case, Thompson confronted a suicidal and obviously impaired but non-aggressive man who refused to drop a knife held in a non-threatening manner while 'slowly stagger[ing]' down stairs. . . The front door remained open behind Thompson at all times. We think the unconstitutionality of using deadly force in that specific context was apparent. Three decades ago, the Supreme Court set forth the requirement that police officers limit deadly force to situations where 'probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others' exists. . . And we have since held that officers who commit a violation 'manifestly included within' the 'core constitutional principle' announced in Garner are not entitled to qualified immunity. . .Thompson's violation fits within that principle. No reasonable officer could think that a suicidal, non-criminal individual holding a small paring knife and otherwise acting in a nonthreatening manner who had difficulty standing and walking presents justification to deviate from Garner's bright-line proscription. Garner, therefore, constitutes sufficient notice to bar qualified immunity in this case. . . There is also existing Fourth Circuit precedent concerning the use of force against an armed, but nonthreatening individual. Most specifically, we held that officers who acted in 2007 were not entitled to qualified immunity after deploying deadly force against an individual who 'stood at the threshold of his home, holding [a] shotgun in one hand,' but otherwise doing nothing 'to support the proposition that a reasonable officer would have had probable cause to feel threatened.'. . Accepting Appellee's version of events, Thompson, acting in 2012, had no less notice that deadly force was clearly unlawful when he fired as Carter descended two steps inside his home, refused to drop a paring knife, but otherwise did nothing to support the conclusion that he posed an immediate threat to anyone's safety.")

Krein v. Price, 596 F. App'x 184, 190 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Like the officers in Waterman, Price was in danger when he fired the first shot because he was directly in front of the vehicle. But just seconds later, he was on the passenger side of the vehicle and thus was no longer in danger of being hit. The other officer, Snyder, was similarly not threatened when Price fired the second time. As our decision in Waterman demonstrates, these types of fine distinctions must be made to give proper effect to the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force. Indeed, the overall circumstances in this case were less dangerous than in Waterman. There, the officers fired at Waterman in the context of a high-speed chase. Here, however, Krein's vehicle was effectively trapped by the troopers' vehicle and Krein was not driving at a high speed. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Krein, Price and Snyder were not at serious risk of being struck by Krein's vehicle when Price fired the second shot. As such, Price's second shot violated the clearly established law this Circuit set out in Waterman.")

Krein v. Price, 596 F. App'x 184, 190-94 (4th Cir. 2014) (Hamilton, J., dissenting) ("In conducting its own de novo review of the record, the majority holds that Trooper Price acted unreasonably when he fired the second shot that injured Krein. . . With all due respect to the majority, in my view, Trooper Price reasonably believed that Krein posed a serious threat of physical injury to both himself and Trooper Snyder at the time he fired the second shot. Accordingly, I dissent from the majority's denial of qualified immunity to Trooper Price. . . .While the majority's analytical framework may address the question of whether Trooper Price, Trooper Snyder, and the others on the scene were, as a matter of fact, out of danger at the time the second shot was fired, it does not address the outcome determinative question of whether Trooper Price reasonably believed a serious threat of physical injury was present. For obvious reasons, the majority consciously avoids the proper analytical inquiry. The majority does not want to address whether Trooper Price was reasonable in believing that he, Trooper Snyder, and/or the others on the scene were in danger when he fired the second shot. After all, it is hard to criticize a police officer for shooting at a driver who tries to run him over and then fires a second shot when the driver accelerates toward a fellow officer. Moreover, the majority's analytical tack allows it to avoid explaining exactly what allowances it is making for Trooper Price, who was confronted with rapidly developing circumstances in which both he and his partner were in peril. Finally, the majority's chosen analytical path allows it to avoid addressing how Trooper Price knowingly 'violate[d] the law' or was 'plainly incompetent' under the circumstances. . . A careful review of the record under the correct legal standard demonstrates that Trooper Price was reasonable in his belief that there was a threat of serious physical injury at the time he fired the second shot. . . .In this case, Trooper

Price had just seconds to weigh everything before him. Krein was acting irrationally. He struck a police cruiser with his truck. He struck diesel fuel pumps in a lot with private citizens, including children, present. He ignored numerous commands from two state troopers pointing their guns at him by driving his truck at them, just like he previously had dangerously done to other police officers. . . . [U]like Waterman, the facts of this case simply do not support the conclusion that Trooper Price actually could have perceived the passing of the threat posed by Krein, especially since Krein was accelerating toward Trooper Snyder and, at the same time, Trooper Price was trying to move out of the way of the truck when he fired the second shot. The majority's use of Waterman highlights once again its flawed analysis. It says Waterman is analogous to this case because Trooper Price 'was no longer in danger of being hit' when he fired the second shot and because Trooper Snyder 'was similarly not threatened when Price fired the second time.'. . But, as noted above, the outcome determinative question is not whether the troopers were, in fact, out of danger at the time Trooper Price fired the second shot, but whether Trooper Price was reasonable in his belief that a serious threat of physical injury was present at the time he so fired. . . . In the final analysis, the majority applies a standard that requires perfection on the part of Trooper Price. He had to know and be 100% correct in his knowledge that he, Trooper Snyder, and/or the others at the scene were in danger of being seriously injured when he fired the second shot to avoid being liable under § 1983. Such a standard is incompatible with Supreme Court, as well as this court's, precedent. . . . The upshot of all of this is that the majority is penalizing a police officer who attempted to do the right thing under the tense, uncertain, and rapidly-evolving dangerous circumstances with which he was confronted. Qualified immunity is designed to protect all but the plainly incompetent. Trooper Price is a far cry from this, and it is my hope that the ensuing trial will be resolved in his favor. It follows that I would vacate and remand with instructions to grant Trooper Price qualified immunity.") Streater v. Wilson, 565 F. App'x 208, 211-12 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Taking the facts and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Streater, we conclude that no reasonable officer would have believed J.G. presented a threat of immediate, serious injury justifying the application of deadly force. Significantly, we may separately consider non-continuous uses of force during a single incident to determine if all were constitutionally reasonable. See Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 481 (4th Cir.2005). Even if we were to conclude, therefore, that Officer Wilson could have reasonably perceived J.G. to be a threat prior to firing his first two shots, we cannot find that his third and fourth shots were justifiable as a matter of law. Officer Wilson himself admits that he had time to pause after the first two shots for a brief period to reassess the situation and decide whether further force was necessary under the totality of the circumstances. Contrary to his contention on appeal, therefore, we are not confronted here with the 'split-second judgments of a police officer to use deadly force in a context of rapidly evolving circumstances, when inaction could threaten the safety of the officers or others.'. . Nor do we risk judging an officer's conduct 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . At the point when Officer Wilson chose to fire a third and then a fourth shot, he knew or should have known that J.G. was over 30 feet away, standing still, unarmed, complying with his orders, and making no attempt to escape. His mistaken belief that J.G. posed an immediate threat of serious physical injury to himself or to Officer Helms and civilians, who were even further away, was objectively unreasonable. We hold therefore that Officer Wilson's resort to deadly force violated J.G.'s Fourth Amendment rights. We must now determine whether J.G.'s right to be free from excessive force under these facts was clearly established at the time of the shooting. . . . [B]y the time Officer Wilson reassessed the objective facts on the evening of October 16, 2010, and decided to take what he called a 'kill shot,' J.G. had disarmed, was neither approaching nor threatening the officers or civilians, and based on the police broadcast and Streater's protests, was not a suspect in the domestic assault. Moreover, even accepting Officer Wilson's argument that these facts are not directly analogous to Garner, J.G.'s right to be free from the use of lethal force to effectuate a seizure under the totality of the circumstances was 'manifestly included within more general applications of the core [Fourth Amendment] principle[s].' Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 314 (4th Cir.1992). We hold therefore that Officer Wilson violated J.G.'s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights.")

Cooper v. Sheehan, 735 F.3d 153, 159, 160 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The Officers rely on several decisions concluding that a police officer was entitled to qualified immunity after shooting an individual whom the officer mistakenly believed to be armed. In Anderson v. Russell, for example, the officers ordered a detainee to his hands and knees, and then shot him when he reached for a bulge in his waistband that turned out to be a radio. . .In an earlier decision, McLenagan v. Karnes, a bystander was shot as he ran toward a police officer moments after the officer learned that an armed arrestee was on the loose in the area. . . And in Slattery v. Rizzo, an officer shot a suspect who ignored commands to show his hands before turning quickly toward the officer with what turned out to be only a beer bottle in a clinched fist. . . If deadly force was justified in such circumstances, the Officers contend, it is even more appropriate in this setting, where Cooper wielded a shotgun in plain view. Instead of supporting the Officers' contentions, however, those decisions emphasize why the use of deadly force against Cooper was not constitutionally permissible: in each of the above scenarios, the objective basis for the threat was real, but the gun was not. Here, the shotgun was real, but—taking the facts as the district court viewed them—the threat was not. When the Officers fired on Cooper, he stood at the threshold of his home, holding the shotgun in one hand, with its muzzle pointed at the ground. He made no sudden moves. He made no threats. He ignored no commands. The Officers had no other information suggesting that Cooper might harm them. Thus, the facts fail to support the proposition that a reasonable officer would have had probable cause to feel threatened by Cooper's actions. Importantly, the Officers never identified themselves—even when asked by Cooper. If the Officers had done so, they might have been safe in the assumption that a man who greets law enforcement with a firearm is likely to pose a deadly threat. . . Instead, we are constrained to agree with the district court that 'no reasonable officer could have believed that [Cooper] was aware that two sheriff deputies were outside,' as he stepped onto his back porch. . . As in Pena v. Porter, on which the court relied, Cooper's 'perfectly reasonable' rationale for bearing a firearm while investigating a nocturnal disturbance on his own property 'should have been apparent to [the Officers] at the time of the shooting. . . .With respect to the second part of the Saucier analysis, the precedent discussed herein amply demonstrates that the contours of the constitutional right at issue—that is, the right to be free from deadly force when posing no threat—were clearly established at the time the Officers shot Cooper. Accordingly, the district court properly denied, at the summary judgment stage, the Officers' invocation of qualified immunity from Cooper's § 1983 excessive force claims.")

Meyers v. Baltimore County, Md., 713 F.3d 723, 733-35 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that Officer Mee's first three deployments of his taser did not amount to an unreasonable or excessive use of force. During the period that Officer Mee administered the first three taser shocks, Ryan was acting erratically, was holding a baseball bat that he did not relinquish until after he received the second shock, and was advancing toward the officers until the third shock caused him to fall to the ground. Under these circumstances, Ryan posed an immediate threat to the officers' safety, and was actively resisting arrest. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that Officer Mee's first three uses of the taser were objectively reasonable and did not violate Ryan's Fourth Amendment rights. . .We next address the plaintiffs' argument that Officer Mee is not entitled to qualified immunity because his further use of the taser, administering the seven additional taser shocks, was not objectively reasonable and violated Ryan's clearly established constitutional rights. We emphasize that our analysis is based on the plaintiffs' version of the facts as drawn primarily from the depositions of Ryan's family members, including Billy who stated that he was inside the residence and directly observed Officer Mee's conduct. Although a jury ultimately may find that the officers' version of the events is more credible, we are not permitted to make such credibility determinations when considering whether a police officer properly was held immune from suit under the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . Our conclusion that Officer Mee's first three uses of the taser were objectively reasonable does not resolve our inquiry into the reasonableness of the seven additional taser shocks that he administered, because 'force justified at the beginning of an encounter is not justified even seconds later if the justification for the initial force has been eliminated.' Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 481 (4th Cir.2005). Here, the evidence showed that the justification for Officer Mee's first three uses of his taser had been eliminated after Ryan relinquished the baseball bat and fell to the floor. At that point, several officers sat on Ryan's back, and Ryan only was able to move his legs. Moreover, according to Officer Gaedke, Ryan was silent and 'stiffened' his body, keeping it rigid while he was on the ground. Therefore, the above testimony from Billy and Officer Gaedke indicated that, after Ryan fell to the floor, he no longer was actively resisting arrest, and did not pose a continuing threat to the officers' safety. . . Nevertheless, Officer Mee continued to use his taser until he had rendered Ryan unconscious. The district court recognized that Officer Mee's actions implementing the seven additional taser shocks were inappropriate, concluding that 'the Court cannot say as a matter of law that Officer Mee's actions were objectively reasonable.'. . We agree but state the conclusion affirmatively: It is an excessive and unreasonable use of force for a police officer repeatedly to administer electrical shocks with a taser on an individual who no longer is armed, has been brought to the ground, has been restrained physically by several other officers, and no longer is actively resisting arrest. Because the plaintiffs' evidence supports the inference that such conduct occurred here, the plaintiffs have satisfied their initial burden at the summary judgment stage of demonstrating that Ryan's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. . . The second step of the qualified immunity analysis requires us to consider whether Officer Mee's objectively unreasonable conduct violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. . . The district court held that Officer Mee's actions did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. The court concluded that there was an absence of precedent 'offering guidance as to the point at which continued tasings become excessive when the suspect is actively resisting.'. . We disagree with the district court's conclusion, which was based on a false premise. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the evidence did not show that Ryan was actively resisting arrest at the time the seven additional taser shocks were administered. Instead, as stated above, the evidence showed that after Officer Mee's third use of the taser, Ryan fell to the floor and did not continue to resist arrest actively at that time. We repeatedly have held that it is not required that a right violated already have been recognized by a court in a specific context before such right may be held 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. . . Thus, the absence of a judicial decision holding that it is unlawful to use a taser repeatedly and unnecessarily under similar circumstances does not prevent a court from denying a qualified immunity defense. . . As the Supreme Court has emphasized, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . We also have stated in forthright terms that 'officers using unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force to seize a secured, unarmed citizen, do not act in an objectively reasonable manner and, thus, are not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . The fact that the force used in the present case emanated from a taser, rather than from a more traditional device, is not dispositive. The use of any 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force,' whether arising from a gun, a baton, a taser, or other weapon, precludes an officer from receiving qualified immunity if the subject is unarmed and secured. . . Here, Ryan was unarmed and effectively was secured with several officers sitting on his back. In such circumstances, the seven additional taser shocks administered by Officer Mee were clearly 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate.'. . Thus, based on the present record, because Ryan did not pose a threat to the officers' safety and was not actively resisting arrest, a reasonable officer in Officer Mee's position would have understood that his delivery of some, if not all, of the seven additional taser shocks violated Ryan's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive and unreasonable force. Accordingly, we hold that the district court erred in concluding that Officer Mee met his burden of proving that he was entitled to qualified immunity.") Henry v. Purnell, 652 F.3d 524, 532-35 (4th Cir. 2011) (en banc) ("The objective circumstances of this case are that Purnell shot a fleeing suspected misdemeanant whom he had no reason to believe was a threat. Henry had an eleven-day old warrant issued for a misdemeanor–failure to pay child support. . . . The parties have stipulated, however, that the shooting here was based on a mistake of fact insofar as Purnell believed he was firing his Taser rather than his Glock. Based on this stipulation, Purnell attempts to defend the constitutionality of his actions by maintaining that he simply made an 'honest mistake.'. . But it is not the honesty of Purnell's intentions that determines the constitutionality of his conduct; rather it is the objective reasonableness of his actions. . . .For all of the reasons set out above, when the record is viewed in the light most favorable to Henry, Henry can show Purnell's actions were not objectively reasonable. . . Thus, the evidence forecasted in the record by Henry is sufficient to show that Purnell violated Henry's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Here, Henry can show under prong one of the qualified immunity analysis that a reasonable officer would have realized he was holding a firearm when shooting.

Under prong two, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that shooting a fleeing, nonthreatening misdemeanant with a firearm was unlawful. This basic legal principle had been established by the Supreme Court years earlier in Garner. Purnell nevertheless argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the shooting that it would be unconstitutional for an officer to fire his weapon at the suspect under these facts when he believed he was holding his Taser. But Purnell fails to understand that his subjective beliefs or intentions have no place in our constitutional analysis, which concerns the objective reasonableness of the officer's conduct in light of the relevant facts and circumstances. . . .In the end, this may be a case where an officer committed a constitutionally unreasonable seizure as the result of an unreasonable factual mistake. If he did, he is no more protected from civil liability than are the well-meaning officers who make unreasonable legal mistakes regarding the constitutionality of their conduct. . . Although officers are only human and even well-intentioned officers may make unreasonable mistakes on occasion, the doctrine of qualified immunity does not serve to protect them on those occasions.")

Noel v. Artson, 641 F.3d 580, 595 (4th Cir. 2011) (Wynn, J., concurring in the judgment) ("As noted in my colleagues' opinion, the events at issue in this case took place in a sequence–even if that sequence occurred over a short span of time. Officer Artson entered the Noels' bedroom and found Cheryl Noel holding a revolver. At that point, Officer Artson immediately fired two shots. Only after at least some amount of time had passed and Cheryl Noel had dropped her weapon did Officer Artson fire the third and fatal shot. While the parties dispute whether Cheryl Noel had moved her hand back toward her gun before the third shot was fired, the shots nevertheless occurred in a sequence. Under these circumstances, the district court could–and perhaps should–have instructed the jury that force justified at the beginning of an encounter is not justified later if the justification for the initial force has been eliminated. Waterman, 393 F.3d at 481. The district court's decision not to do so, however, and the accurate, if more general, instructions that the court did give did not constitute an abuse of discretion. . . At the end of the day, this issue turns on neither the skill of the Noels' attorney nor the number of people who put effort into trying the Noels' case. Instead, the only relevant inquiry is whether the jury instructions pass muster. Here, they do. And while the district court was free to–and perhaps should have–given the jury a charge based on Waterman v. Batton to the effect that force used at the beginning of an encounter may not be justified later if the justification for the use of force has been eliminated, it was not an abuse of discretion for the district court to decline to do so.") Brockington v. Boykins, 637 F.3d 503, 507, 508 (4th Cir. 2011) ("Drawing all inferences in favor of Brockington from the allegations in the SAC, there was a clear break in the sequence of events. Brockington's injuries may have been evident to Boykins after Brockington fell off the porch onto the concrete backyard below. Further, it is alleged that Boykins stood above Brockington execution style while fully discharging his clip so that gun powder residue got on Brockington's hands while Brockington waved away Boykins, further evincing the excessive nature of the force used. Whether or not Boykins thought his life was still in jeopardy is a fact that will be educed through discovery since it is unclear from the record before us. Again drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Brockington, he was unarmed. Rather than shoot Brockington as he lay helpless on the ground, a reasonable police officer would have asked him to surrender, called for backup or an ambulance, or retreated, depending on the facts that emerge through discovery. . . . Importantly, it is not required that the exact conduct has been found unconstitutional in a previous case. . . Indeed, it is just common sense that continuing to shoot someone who is already incapacitated is not justified under these circumstances. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court did decide in Tennessee v. Garner that deadly force was not generally justified against a suspect who did not pose an immediate threat as Brockington did not if all facts are construed in his favor. In Waterman, the Court solidified this position. Waterman thus remains and was at the time these events took place controlling precedent in this Circuit.")

Bellotte v. Edwards, 629 F.3d 415, 424 (4th Cir. 2011) ("Qualified immunity is meant to protect against liability for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'. . This was not a bad guess. Not a single one of the officers' proffered rationales provides a reasonable, particularized basis to justify their conduct. . . . The officers contended at oral argument that a no-knock entry under these circumstances is 'so infrequent, so uncommon that it's a gray area.' To the contrary, we face here an unfortunate exception to the truism that '[t]he easiest cases don't even arise.'. . The absence of 'a prior case directly on all fours' here speaks not to the unsettledness of the law, but to the brashness of the conduct. . . Because 'a man of reasonable intelligence would not have believed that exigent circumstances existed in this situation,'. . . we affirm the district court's holding that this no-knock entry violated the Bellottes' clearly established constitutional rights and does not warrant an award of qualified immunity.")

Witt v. West Virginia State Police, 633 F.3d 272, 276, 277 (4th Cir. 2011) ("Scott does not hold that courts should reject a plaintiff's account on summary judgment whenever documentary evidence, such as a video, offers some support for a governmental officer's version of events. Rather, Scott merely holds that when documentary evidence 'blatantly contradict[s]' a plaintiff's account 'so that no reasonable jury could believe it,' a court should not credit the plaintiff's version on summary judgment. . . . In sum, the documentary evidence in this case–the dashboard video–does not 'blatantly contradict[ ]' Witt's account of the facts; therefore, it 'does not establish that the officers are entitled to summary judgment.'")

Melgar ex rel. Melgar v. Greene, 593 F.3d 348, 353, 356, 357, 360, 361 (4th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, we address a narrow and specialized Fourth Amendment problem. We are not dealing with the use of a canine to track someone who is guilty of a serious criminal offense. Likewise, this was not a hunt for someone who could pose a threat to the community, nor was the person being sought an adult. Rather, we are dealing with a juvenile, and one, moreover, who was on foot and not in a car. Although underage drinking was involved, the facts of the case mark it as more of a search for a missing person than for any criminal at large. . . . By any objective measure, . . . Greene was in a difficult position. However, we do not think he is entitled to summary judgment on the merits of the issue of Fourth Amendment reasonableness. We recognize that police were searching primarily for a missing person and that canines have a role to play in such searches because of their keen sense of smell. Nevertheless, there are several significant factual questions in this case that make merits resolution of the excessive force claim inappropriate for summary judgment. . . . Having declined to rule as a matter of law in the first stage of the Pearson/Saucier analysis, our next question is whether Officer Greene's conduct violated clearly established federal law. . . . Our resolution of this case on grounds of qualified immunity is not a mere matter of semantics. Rather, it allows plaintiff to continue to pursue his state law claim under Article 26 of the Maryland Declaration of Rights, while a ruling on the merits would foreclose that possibility. Article 26 is interpreted in pari materia with the Fourth Amendment, see Mazuz v. Maryland, 442 F.3d 217, 231 (4th Cir.2006) (abrogation on other grounds recognized by Cole v. Buchanan County School Bd., 328 F. App'x 204, 207 (4th Cir.2009)); Richardson v. McGriff, 762 A.2d 48, 56 (Md.2000), but Maryland's law of qualified immunity does not similarly track federal law. As the Maryland Court of Appeals has explained, "[p]roof that the official acted in objectively reasonable reliance on existing law, which would exempt an official from liability under § 1983, may be relevant to whether the official committed a violation [of Maryland law], but it does not provide an immunity should a violation be found." DiPino v. Davis, 729 A.2d 354, 371 (Md.1999).. . . . Why would the dissent deny the individual officer qualified immunity when the plaintiff's state claim may proceed against both the public entity and the officer in state court? . . . We do, of course, recognize that objective reasonableness is the appropriate standard here, and indeed it is the one we have applied. The dissent is surely right that 'an officer's good intentions' do not make objectively unreasonable acts constitutional. . . By the same token, however, undisputed good intentions should not be used to make an officer a more inviting target for monetary damages. As to this officer, let it be said that he acted, not perfectly perhaps, in the lens of leisured hindsight, but that he did the best he could with what he had. For each of us, that's not so bad an epitaph.").

Melgar ex rel. Melgar v. Greene, 593 F.3d 348, 361, 362, 364 (4th Cir. 2010) (Michael, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's decision that Officer Johnathan Greene is entitled to qualified immunity. An objectively reasonable police officer would not use a find-and-bite dog to conduct a hasty and limited search for a missing thirteen-year-old boy who is highly intoxicated, harmless, and not wanted for a serious crime. . . . Oscar Melgar was seriously and permanently injured from the bite, re-bite, and grip of Officer Greene's dog. Melgar had a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from this method of seizure brought about by Officer Greene. . . . We should not inch toward clearly established law bite by disabling bite. Bolder action is called for today, and the basis for that action is the widely known danger that find-and-bite dogs present. It is already clearly established that the improper deployment of a find-and-bite dog that mauls its target constitutes excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Kopf, 942 F.2d at 268. A police officer's deliberate use of such a dog to search for a missing and harmless boy like Melgar violates this clearly established right.").

Valladares v. Cordero, 552 F.3d 384, 390 (4th Cir. 2009) ("Officer Cordero argues that when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to James, a reasonable officer would not have known that he was violating a clearly established right because a reasonable officer would not have known that James had surrendered. Yet, in both James' affidavit and his deposition, James claims that Officer Cordero broke his jaw after slamming him into the car and after he either went 'limp' or 'loose.' Even if this Court disregarded James' testimony about going 'limp' or 'loose' because he later testifies that he was kicking while on the ground, James and Officer Cordero both testify that, after that point, the officer picked James up off the ground and neither party testifies that James resisted being lifted up. This signifies a point of surrender. Of course, Officer Cordero claims that he then placed James against his mother's car and handcuffed him. Nonetheless, James testifies that after Officer Cordero had him under full control he then forcefully shoved his face into his mother's car and broke his jaw. Again, this Court must accept James' version of the facts. In Officer Cordero's brief and during oral argument, counsel for the officer seemed to indicate that James should have verbally communicated his intent to surrender to the officer. This Court knows of no case, and Appellant does not cite a case, that requires a person to verbally communicate his or her wish to surrender before a reasonable officer is put on notice that further force is unnecessary. Such a requirement would create an unduly steep burden. A trial court must have the freedom to distinguish between the circumstances surrounding a person who says he is surrendering while continuing to fight and those surrounding a person who does not articulate that he is surrendering but clearly has ceased fighting. In this case, the district court properly determined that James surrendered before Officer Cordero broke his jaw. Moreover, the district court correctly determined that a reasonable officer would not have exerted the level of force that Officer Cordero used in the situation with which Officer Cordero was confronted.")

Orem v. Rephann, 523 F.3d 442, 447, 448 (4th Cir. 2008) ("While we recognize that 'not every push or shove, even if it may later seem unnecessary' is serious enough to entail a deprivation of a constitutional right, . . . the facts, here, when viewed in a light most favorable to Orem, evidence that Deputy Rephann's use of the taser gun was wanton, sadistic, and not a good faith effort to restore discipline. Orem's behavior without question was reprehensible, but Deputy Rephann's use of the taser was an 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.'. . . Nevertheless, Deputy Rephann argues that summary judgment is proper because Orem only suffered de minimus injury. Although de minimus injury can foreclose a Fourteenth Amendment claim, the district court properly recognized that Orem's injury consisted of far more than the resulting sunburn-like scar. . . . While Deputy Rephann makes much of the fact that the taser was only applied for 1.5 seconds, Orem did experience electric shock, pain, and developed a scar. . . . Because the facts, taken in a light most favorable to Orem, show that Deputy Rephann inflicted unnecessary and wanton pain and suffering, Orem has alleged a violation of her Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . Notwithstanding the qualified immunity standard's ample room for mistaken judgments, there is evidence bearing heavily against Deputy Rephann that, in these circumstances, the taser gun was not used for a legitimate purpose; such as protecting the officers, protecting Orem, or preventing Orem's escape. . . . Rather, Deputy Rephann used the taser to punish or intimidate Orem–a use that is not objectively reasonable, is contrary to clearly established law, and not protected by qualified immunity.").

Ingle v. Yelton, 2008 WL 398327, at *4, *5 (4th Cir. Feb. 14, 2008) ("The record reveals the following undisputed facts. The defendants knew that: (1) Christopher was suspected in a domestic shooting; (2) Christopher had fled arrest and engaged in a high speed chase; (3) moments earlier, Christopher had pointed his shotgun at an officer and refused to surrender; (4) finally, and crucially, all available evidence indicates that Christopher was lowering or pointing his shotgun at the officers when they began firing; none of Ingle's evidence suggests otherwise. A reasonable officer at the scene would have had probable cause to believe that Christopher posed a threat of serious physical harm. Even if the car window was closed and did interfere with his aim, '[t]he car window was no guarantee of safety when the pointed gun and the officers at whom it was aimed were in such close proximity.' Elliott v. Leavitt, 99 F.3d 640, 642 (4th Cir.1996). Because no constitutional violation occurred, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment.")

Estate of Rodgers v. Smith, No. 05-1382, 2006 WL 1843435, at *7 (4th Cir. June 26, 2006) (not published) ("Even if the second volley of shots were unconstitutional, that unconstitutionality was by no means clearly established as of April 15, 2002. Waterman required us to decide whether it was clearly established in November 2000 that an officer may not use deadly force in the seconds after a serious threat had abated. . . We concluded that although other circuits had reached this conclusion prior to the relevant time, the Fourth Circuit had not. . . In light of the uncertainty of the law existing at the time of the incident, we held that the unconstitutionality of the use of force in the seconds after a threat has abated was not clearly established. . . Because the law on this point did not become clear until 2004, when Waterman was decided, we conclude that even if Officer Waters had violated the Constitution, he would be entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that the unconstitutionality of his actions was not clearly established at the time of the incident.").

McKinney v. Richland County Sheriff's Dep't., 431 F.3d 415, 418 n.2, 419 (4th Cir. 2005) ("The district court erroneously concluded that '[t]he assessment of whether the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right requires the court to determine whether an objective law officer could reasonably have believed probable cause to exist, not whether probable cause for the warrant did in fact exist.' . . The question at stage one of the qualified immunity analysis is not whether the officer was reasonable, but whether a constitutional right was violated. If the warrant was supported by probable cause, then McKinney's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated, regardless of whether Livingston's belief that there was probable cause was reasonable. . . . Even if we were to conclude that the warrant was not supported by probable cause, Livingston would nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity because the absence of probable cause would not have been evident to an objectively reasonable officer in these circumstances. . . Both a prosecutor and a neutral and detached magistrate independently reviewed the evidence and concluded that there was probable cause. A reasonable officer would not second-guess these determinations unless probable cause was plainly lacking, which it was not.").

Turmon v. Jordan, 405 F.3d 202, 208 (4th Cir. 2005) ("We conclude that on March 10, 2001, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that he could not point his gun at an individual's face, jerk him from his room, and handcuff him when there was no reasonable suspicion that any crime had been committed, no indication that the individual posed a threat to the officer, and no indication that the individual was attempting to resist or evade detention. The contours of the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force during a seizure were set forth sixteen years ago by the Supreme Court in Graham, 490 U.S. at 396-97, 109 S.Ct. 1865. In addition, over the years this court has addressed the propriety of the use of force comparable to that used by Deputy Jordan, and we have consistently found such force to be proper only in situations in which there was at least reasonable suspicion to believe criminal activity was afoot. . . Because the facts alleged show that Jordan violated Turmon's Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizures carried out by excessive force and because that right was clearly established at the time, Jordan is not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 480-83 (4th Cir. 2005) ("In sum, the officers here were faced with a suspect well positioned to seriously injure or kill one or more of them with his vehicle–possibly within a fraction of a second–if they did not employ deadly force. According to the best information available, the suspect had used his vehicle as a weapon against another officer just minutes before. Based on this information and the other factors discussed, we hold as a matter of law that a reasonable officer could have believed at the instant of acceleration that Waterman presented a threat of serious physical harm. Appellants thus were entitled to qualified immunity regarding the initial group of shots. . . The Estate maintains that even if the initial shots were justifiable, the same was not true of the shots fired after Waterman's vehicle passed the officers and the officers were out of danger (the subsequent shots). . . . We . . . hold that force justified at the beginning of an encounter is not justified even seconds later if the justification for the initial force has been eliminated. . . .Applying this principle here, we conclude that the record, viewed in the light most favorable to the Estate, shows that once Waterman's vehicle passed the officers, the threat to their safety was eliminated and thus could not justify the subsequent shots. A factfinder could reasonably conclude that as the officers pursued Waterman's vehicle, they knew or should have known that Waterman had passed them without veering in their direction. Under these circumstances, a reasonable factfinder could determine that any belief that the officers continued at that point to face an imminent threat of serious physical harm would be unreasonable. . . Having determined that the record, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Estate, shows that the subsequent shots were unconstitutional, we now consider whether that unconstitutionality was clearly established on November 28, 2000, when the shooting occurred. We conclude that it was not and thus that Appellants were entitled to qualified immunity for the subsequent shots as well. . . . There is no relevant distinction between the facts in Pittman and those here. In both cases, the officers employing deadly force had information that the suspect had recently assaulted an officer with his vehicle. Also, both cases presented tense, rapidly changing situations, where the threat justifying the use of deadly force ended only seconds before the shots in question were fired. In light of our holding that Nelms' use of deadly force was not excessive under law that was clearly established in May 1992, the same must be true of the subsequent shots here. . . . The question thus becomes whether the excessiveness of the force employed here, although unclear in May 1992, was nonetheless clarified prior to November 28, 2000. We conclude that it was not. We have already noted that other circuits decided during this period that a passing risk to an officer does not authorize him to employ deadly force moments after he should have recognized the passing of the risk. [citing cases] However, this circuit did not. Indeed, as we have discussed, we issued a decision, Rowland, that was susceptible to the reading that an application of force that extends for but a few seconds cannot be parsed into temporal segments for the purpose of reviewing each act in light of the information the officer had at that moment. . . Considering the uncertainty created by Pittman and Rowland regarding whether an officer may legally employ deadly force in response to a threat of serious harm moments after he should have known that the threat had been eliminated, we hold that the unconstitutionality of the subsequent shots was not clearly established in Maryland in November 2000.").

Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 483, 484 (4th Cir. 2005) (Motz, J., dissenting) ("The hazards of police work simply do not authorize officers to engage in the unbridled use of force. No matter how exasperated an officer becomes, the Constitution does not permit him to shoot a motorist for speeding–unless a reasonable officer in the same position would have had probable cause to believe it necessary to protect himself or others from 'a threat of serious physical harm.'") . . . In this case, Officers Michael Batton, Kenneth Keel, and Christopher Heisey fired nine rounds of ammunition at a car driven by Josh Waterman, who sustained five gunshot wounds and died rapidly from those injuries. Ten minutes before the shooting, Josh Waterman had driven 51 m.p.h. in a 25 m.p.h. zone and failed to stop when signaled to do so by officers in squad cars, which may well have exasperated them. However, by the time of the shooting, Josh Waterman was neither speeding nor driving erratically–rather, he was passing through a toll plaza at 11 to 15 m.p.h.; and several eyewitnesses have sworn that none of the law enforcement officers at the toll plaza were in danger of being hit by Josh Waterman's car. The video of the shooting could well be interpreted as supporting or, at the very least, not definitively negating these accounts. A jury could, nonetheless, conclude that a reasonable police officer, confronted with the situation facing Officers Batton, Keel, and Heisey, would have acted as they did or would not have realized that shooting Josh Waterman violated the Constitution. [citing Saucier] But so finding would require resolution of several genuine disputes of material fact, which we can no more resolve on interlocutory appeal than the district court could when ruling on the officers' motion for summary judgment.").

Crockett v. Blackwood, No. 1:18-CV-809, 2020 WL 1144710, at *5-8 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 9, 2020) ("Here, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Crockett stepped out into the frame of his front door holding a gun down to his side to investigate what he perceived to be a night prowler and was shot without warning by an officer who suspected him of having committed a violent crime. Crediting Plaintiff's version of events and making all reasonable inferences in her favor, Crockett never raised his gun and Ashley never identified himself or warned Crockett, though he had time to do so. . . Thus, the question for the Court is whether a reasonable officer facing these circumstances would believe that Crockett posed an immediate threat to the safety of Ashley or others. In answering this question, the Court finds three opinions particularly instructive. [Discussing Cooper v. Sheehan, Hensley v. Price, and Betton v. Belue] . . . . In applying these cases to the facts of this litigation as presented by Plaintiff, it is apparent that Ashley lacked a reasonable basis for concluding that Crockett was threatening him with a weapon. Just as in Cooper, Crockett held his gun down, ignored no commands, and made no sudden moves or threats. Even if the Court concluded that Crockett took a step or more onto the porch—which would be inappropriate at this juncture as both Plaintiff and Chelenza have testified that Crockett was shot while essentially standing in his doorway—this minor movement into the officers' view would not constitute a 'sudden move' to justify use of deadly force. In Cooper, George Cooper also suddenly came into view of the officers who shot him after taking several steps onto his unlit porch. . . Likewise, just as in Cooper, the officers in this case never identified themselves to Crockett, despite the fact that they had the opportunity to do so while waiting on the porch and even had his phone number and so could have called him from out of harm's way. Instead, the officers took the time to develop and execute what the State Bureau of Investigation's agent responsible for investigating the shooting later characterized as a 'bad plan.'. . They crept up to Crockett's house under the cover of night, accentuated the dark by unplugging his exterior light, rapped on his window, and then shot him when he walked outside. This 'bad plan' matters because binding circuit precedent holds that it is more reasonable for officers to shoot individuals who knowingly confront law enforcement officers with weapons than it is for them to shoot men like Crockett who answer the door of their home armed to confront unknown threats. . . Furthermore, just as in Hensley, Ashley had time to issue a warning or a command before he used deadly force yet, by his own admission, he did not do so. . . . In conclusion, the Court finds (1) that the crime at issue in this case was serious, (2) that Crockett was not attempting to escape or resist arrest, and (3) that Ashley's assessment that Crockett posed an immediate threat to him was unreasonable. The Court therefore finds that Ashley violated Crockett's right to be free from excessive force. Though officers tasked with policing situations where arms are likely present must occasionally make split-second decisions with their lives on the line, the Fourth Amendment does not permit officers to shoot suspects who, with their guns down, step onto their porches to investigate threatening noises and, in doing so, make no sudden moves or threats, ignore no commands, and receive no warnings. The Court will therefore turn to the second step of the Saucier analysis and consider whether this law was clearly established on the night Crockett died. . . . In determining whether Officer Ashley's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right, the Court can only consider decisions like Cooper, a 2013 case, that were issued before the events of February 18, 2017—it cannot consider Hensley or Betton, which came out following the shooting in question. . . The Court must also be careful 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . The Court will therefore determine whether it was clearly established in February of 2017 that shooting an individual was unconstitutional after the officer (1) entered the suspect's property and (2) turned off the light illuminating the suspect's house, (3) rapped on the suspect's door and window without identifying himself, (4) observed the suspect open his door and take a step forward with a gun pointed down, all while (5) failing to give any commands or warnings despite having time to do so. Though the facts of Cooper are not on all fours—chiefly because there is no analogue in Cooper to the officers' decision to turn off Crockett's light and because Crockett was suspected of a serious violent crime—the core of Cooper, the 'right to be free from deadly force when posing no threat,' is present here. . . Here, as in Cooper, the officer stole onto the suspect's property, failed to identify himself, and then shot the suspect when he emerged from his home with a gun pointed down to investigate the police-caused disturbance, despite the fact that the suspect made no sudden moves, ignored no commands or warning, and did not otherwise threaten the officer. As a result, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Ashley violated Crockett's clearly established right to be free from excessive force and is therefore not protected by qualified immunity. The Court therefore concludes that Ashley is not entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on Plaintiff's excessive force claim.")

Day v. Young, No. 1:15CV1477 (JCC/MSN), 2016 WL 5869794, at *3-7 (E.D. Va. Oct. 6, 2016) ("Plaintiff does not dispute . . . that he was fleeing, and thus resisting a lawful seizure, when Defendant deployed his Taser. Defendant is therefore entitled to qualified immunity with respect to his initial deployment of his Taser pursuant to Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Village of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892, 907 (4th Cir. 2016), cert. denied, __ S. Ct. __, 2016 WL 2839881 (U.S. Oct. 3, 2016). . . .Earlier cases had held that police officers may not use a Taser on an individual not actively resisting arrest, but the law was 'not so settled...that "every reasonable official would have understood"' what was constitutionally required when an individual offered nonviolent resistance. . . The Court extrapolates from this that any right not to be tased while offering mobile, as opposed to stationary, non-violent resistance to a lawful seizure was not clearly established at the time of the events giving rise to this suit. As in Armstrong, Defendant deployed his Taser while Plaintiff was actively resisting detention and after issuing several verbal warnings. . . These are precisely the characteristics of the situation in Armstrong that left the applicable law 'not...settled.'. .While viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendant may have been 'treading close to the constitutional line,'. . . the Court must conclude that the line was not clearly drawn before Armstrong. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to his decision to deploy his Taser to prevent Plaintiff from fleeing after repeated warnings. . . .The Court must therefore determine whether Defendant's use of his Taser remained justified throughout the 42 seconds he maintained the Taser's electrical current. The Court finds that genuine issues of material fact preclude summary judgment on this issue. Specifically, the record fails to conclusively establish what effect the Taser had on Plaintiff and whether, when, and to what extent Plaintiff resisted detention during the 42 seconds Defendant maintained the Taser's electrical current. Moreover, these disputed issues of fact bear heavily on Defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity. Accordingly, Defendant's Motion must be denied with respect to his continuous use of a Taser on Plaintiff for 42 seconds. . . .Of particular importance to the Court's holding is a video of the incident shot by a bystander and admitted into evidence. . . In it, Plaintiff collapses as soon as he is struck by the Taser's probes. He proceeds to cry out, and at one point pleads with Defendant to stop. Given this evidence, Defendant's claim that the Taser caused Plaintiff no more than 'a tingling sensation' strains credulity. The video is sufficient that 'a reasonable jury' viewing it could find that the Taser subdued Plaintiff almost immediately. . . .Deploying a Taser at all constitutes a 'serious use of force.'. . To use a Taser on an individual continuously for 42 seconds, assuming the Taser to be at least partially effective, is a use of force that may fairly be characterized as extreme. . . . Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment must therefore be denied as to his continuous use of a Taser on Plaintiff for 42 seconds. The Court will 'submit [the] factual questions to the jury and reserve for itself the legal question of whether...[D]efendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the facts found by the jury.' Yates v. Terry, 817 F.3d 877, 882 n.2 (4th Cir. 2016) (quoting Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 560 (4th Cir. 2005)). The Court notes that the denial of qualified immunity on this basis is not immediately appealable . . . and so the parties should prepare for trial.")

Simpson v. Virginia, No. 1:16CV162 (JCC/TCB), 2016 WL 5390403, at *2–3 (E.D. Va. Sept. 27, 2016) ("As in Armstrong, the officers here were initially acting pursuant to a mental health custody order and, as a result, they were aware of Decedent's mental health issues. But that is where the similarities with Armstrong end. Going beyond merely resisting, Mr. Simpson barricaded himself inside his house, passed police a receipt indicating he had committed a crime by obtaining a shotgun illegally, and cut off communication with officers after they attempted to subdue him with a Taser. . . When officers deployed flashbangs, the Decedent responded by firing shots outside. . . Later, officers made the decision to deploy tear gas. . . Throughout the ensuing standoff, the Decedent remained barricaded inside his house, continued to intermittently fire shots outside, and refused to communicate with police. . . He later exited the house, firing shots as he did so. . . In contrast to Armstrong, Mr. Simpson committed a crime. This crime then made it possible for him to be armed and dangerous. Indeed, Armstrong does not establish that the Plaintiff's mental illness must always weigh against the use of force. Just like any other factor, there are circumstances, like those here, where mental illness will weigh in favor of the force deployed. The Fourth Circuit recognized this point in Armstrong itself, noting that '[m]ental illness, of course, describes a broad spectrum of conditions and does not dictate the same police response in all situations.'. . To illustrate how mental illness may render the use of force less reasonable in some contexts and more reasonable in others, consider the sign post in Armstrong. Because the decedent was seated, anchoring himself to the sign post at the time that force was applied, and because that force led to his death, the Fourth Circuit held that 'the justification for the seizure [preventing a mentally ill man from harming himself] does not vindicate any degree of force [a Taser] that risks substantial harm to the subject.'. . If, on the other hand, the decedent had uprooted the sign post from the ground and began swinging it wildly at officers and passersby, the sign post's presence may have made the use of force more reasonable. Just as it would be patently absurd to say that the involvement of a sign post always cuts against the reasonability of the use of force, regardless of context, so it would be a distortion of the Fourth Circuit's reasoning in Armstrong to say that the decedent's mental illness always cuts against the use of force, regardless of context. The Court read and seriously considered Armstrong prior to granting Defendant's Motion to Dismiss. It determined then, and reaffirms now, that when one considers the totality of the circumstances in both cases, they are profoundly different and readily distinguishable.")

Jones v. Allen, No. CV PX-15-1173, 2016 WL 4890835, at *8-10 (D. Md. Sept. 15, 2016) ("If the testimony of Plaintiff and other eye witnesses are credited over the officers, a reasonable jury could find that Allen was never struck by the Honda; that when the initial shots were fired Allen was standing near the trunk of his police car; and that the Honda drifted out of the driveway and away from the officers at all times. . . . [T]aking the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that Defendant Officers lacked probable cause to believe that Barksdale and Plaintiff posed any threat as they drove away from the officers. Undoubtedly, the Court is loathe to second guess police officers' split second decisions made in the line of duty. . . Nonetheless, it is constrained to deny summary judgment where the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff demonstrate the officers' use of excessive force to detain Plaintiff. . . .Here, the law is clearly established that, at a minimum, after the vehicle passed the officers and no one was in danger, any further shots constituted excessive force in violation of Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. In Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471 (4th Cir. 2005), decided over a decade ago, the Fourth Circuit resolved unquestionably that any officer may not legally employ deadly force in response to a threat of serious harm moments after he should have known that the threat had been eliminated. Specifically, the Fourth Circuit held that continued firing of shots at a fleeing vehicle while it was moving away from the officers and no longer posed a threat constitutes excessive force. . . . .With regard to the initial shots fired, and when viewed most favorably to the Plaintiff, a reasonable fact finder could determine at trial that the Officers' initial shots constituted excessive force. If Plaintiff, Barksdale and Battle are believed, the Officers were never near the Honda, Barksdale never drove the Honda in Defendants' direction, and Allen was not hit by the vehicle or was placed at any risk of danger. . . Further under Garner, the Supreme Court held that an officer's use of deadly force is warranted only where fleeing suspects pose a risk of death or serious bodily injury to them or others. Thus, the use of such force here, where Barksdale and Battle's testimony is credited over the Defendants, renders the defense of qualified immunity unavailable to Allen and Powell.")

Simpson v. Virginia, No. 1:16CV162 (JCC/TCB), 2016 WL 3923887, at *13–14 (E.D. Va. July 21, 2016) ("Decedent's mental illness did not require Defendants to leave Decedent, a mentally ill, armed individual, to his own devices for several hours as he willfully violated court orders and resisted entering custody. Defendants were rightly hesitant to trust the judgment of a man who wanted to see if God would levitate his model of a local restaurant back into his house from the sidewalk in a sign of his righteous claim to ownership. Because the facts alleged cannot sustain a claim that Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights were violated by the unreasonable application of excessive force, the Court dismisses Plaintiff's § 1983 claims against the Doe Defendants. Even if the Doe Defendants' alleged actions were unreasonable in light of the circumstances, they certainly did not violate any clearly established law. Plaintiff does not point to, and this Court cannot find, any case law clearly establishing that any of the Doe Defendants' actions were unreasonable in light of the situation. As discussed above, the weight of Fourth Circuit and Supreme Court case law addressing situations similar to the one presented by this case strongly suggests that the Doe Defendant's actions were reasonable. . . The cases dealing with standoffs between police officers and armed, mentally ill individuals 'by no means clearly establish that [the Doe Defendants] conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . There is therefore no way a reasonable jury could possibly find that the Doe Defendants' conduct as alleged violated a 'clearly established' right.")

Rockwell v. Rawlins, No. CIV.A. RDB-13-3049, 2014 WL 5426716, at *3, *4 & n.12 (D. Md. Oct. 23, 2014) ("In Plaintiffs' account, Detective Rawlins tased an unarmed suspect, who was precariously perched on a second floor ledge and who had terminated his flight and was attempting to comply with police directions. . . .Under Detective Rawlins' version of the facts, however, Detective Rawlins made a split-second decision in order to neutralize the threat posed by an uncooperative and unpredictable individual who appeared to be reaching for something in his waistband. . . .Notably, the legal authorities quoted by the parties are in little-if any-conflict. While tasers may not constitute deadly force in some scenarios, . . . deadly force was clearly used in this case. Rockwell was standing on a narrow second-story ledge/roof, and there is no evidence to suggest that a reasonable police officer would not have expected Rockwell to fall if he was tased. As such, the main issue is whether a reasonable police officer would have believed that Rockwell posed such a substantial threat as to justify the use of deadly force. As noted above, the parties present two different accounts of the facts leading up to the tasing. It is not this Court's role to determine which story to credit at this stage of this proceeding; of course, that decision is for the jury. . . Accordingly, summary judgment will be denied with respect to Detective Rawlins' excessive force claims. . . .These factual questions also foreclose a determination of Detective Rawlins' qualified immunity at this stage. While Detective Rawlins has offered some legal support for his contention that a police officer may tase a fleeing suspect, this Court finds that it is clearly established that an officer may not tase a cooperating suspect where the tasing presents a very real risk of serious bodily harm.")

Meyers v. Baltimore County, Md., 814 F.Supp.2d 552, 559-62 & n.10 (D. Md. 2011) ("Even assuming the truth of Billy Meyers's version of events, no reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Mee used excessive force in delivering the first three Taser cycles to disarm and incapacitate Ryan. . . As an initial matter, it is important to note that while death tragically resulted in this instance, use of a Taser is not generally considered deadly force. . . . In the majority of police departments, the use of a Taser is considered roughly equivalent to the use of oleoresin capsicum gas, also known as pepper spray. . . .After Ryan fell to the ground in the small area between the dining room table and the wall, Officers Callahan, Zellers, and Romeo ordered Ryan to stop resisting and attempted to handcuff him in a struggle that lasted approximately two and a half minutes. There is significant dispute between the parties as to Ryan's level of resistance during this time. . . . Here, the Court cannot say as a matter of law that Officer Mee's actions were objectively reasonable. Some additional use of the taser, as a pain compliance tool deployed against an uncooperative subject, was almost certainly acceptable. There is no dispute that Ryan was able to prevent three officers, working in concert, from handcuffing him for several minutes. As noted earlier, additional tasings may be justified when initial tasings fail to have the desired effect and the subject continues to struggle. . . . Moreover, guidelines promulgated by the Department of Justice, which the Court considers probative of reasonableness, permit the use of a Taser against subjects who are 'actively resisting.' DOJ Taser Guidelines 23. Active resistance includes '[p]hysically evasive movements to defeat an officer's attempt at control, including bracing, tensing, pushing, or verbally signaling an intention to avoid or prevent being taken into or retained in custody.' Id. at 15. Courts have also found that use of a Taser can be reasonable even as against restrained or nonviolent subjects who resist arrest and refuse to comply with lawful police commands. For example, in Buckley v. Haddock, 292 F. App'x 791, 795 (11th Cir.2008) the Eleventh Circuit found no Fourth Amendment violation in a case in which a handcuffed suspect arrested for speeding was tased three times because he resisted arrest by lying on the ground, refusing to stand, and crying. In Schumacher v. Halverson, 467 F.Supp.2d 939 (D.Minn.2006), the court found that police did not act unreasonably in tasing an inebriated man who resisted arrest by grabbing onto a basketball pole and refusing to let go. It is obvious, however, that an officer's purview to tase a noncompliant subject is not unlimited. The Department of Justice Guidelines state that additional Taser applications should be restricted to the minimum necessary to place the subject in custody. . . .There is simply insufficient evidence in the record to reflect whether it was actually necessary to deliver six additional shocks. Nevertheless, even assuming Officer Mee's Taser use to have been excessive in this respect, he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The question, properly presented, is whether clearly established law would have put an officer on notice that he must in some circumstances limit the use of his Taser in stun mode, even though the subject continues to struggle and resist officers' efforts to handcuff him. The answer is no. . . . Courts seem to be in rough accord that use of a Taser is impermissible when used in a sadistic manner, or against an individual who is in custody or otherwise poses no threat. . . . The main exception seems to involve protesters who refuse to comply with police orders to disperse. . . . Yet the Court's research reveals no authority, and certainly not a clearly established legal principal, offering guidance as to the point at which continued tasings become excessive when the suspect is actively resisting. A court with ample time to deconstruct a situation may determine in hindsight that alternative procedures would have been optimal, or that officers overstepped the amount of force strictly necessary to subdue a suspect. Such a judgment, however, is rarely more than 'indulge[nce] in unrealistic second-guessing.'. . The law does not countenance viciousness. Nor, however, does it require perfection. The interstice is composed of the 'mistaken judgments' that qualified immunity must protect if police are to do their jobs safely and effectively. . . The Defendants are entitled to summary judgment.")

Edwards v. Oliver, 31 F.4th 925, 930-32 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Oliver argues that the force he used was not unreasonable, and even if it was unreasonable, it was not clearly established to be so on April 29, 2017. Our precedent in Lytle v. Bexar County holds that the use of deadly force against a fleeing suspect who poses insufficient harm to others violates clearly established law. . . Unlike in Irwin, viewing the facts at issue here in the plaintiffs' favor, the district court stated Officer Gross was toward the back of the car, or behind the car, as it accelerated down Shephard Lane and before Oliver fired his shots. In fact, the parties dispute how close Officer Gross was to the car such that he could hit the back window with his gun before Oliver fired. The dissenting opinion asserts that the 'central question in this case is whether' the videos in Irwin 'are meaningfully distinguishable' from the videos at issue here. . . Although it is tempting to engage in such a factual comparison, to do so would be inappropriate because, unlike the Irwin panel (which was reviewing a final judgment of a grant of qualified immunity), we are reviewing an interlocutory appeal—that is, an appeal of a denial of qualified immunity. . . . Here, the lower court specifically found a factual dispute, and taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, found that 'neither Oliver nor Gross was positioned in front of the [moving] car when Oliver opened fire.' Our dissenting colleague encourages us to conduct a direct comparison of the two cases' videos. . . and conclude that the threat posed to Officer Gross was akin to the threat posed to Officer Santiago, who—according to the Irwin panel conducting a de novo review of a final judgment granting qualified immunity—'was standing "toward the front"' of the moving vehicle when the officers began shooting. . .Conducting a comparison of the two videos would not only run counter to our court's binding precedent regarding the scope of our role in interlocutory appeals in qualified immunity cases, but the conclusion our dissenting colleague would have us draw from that comparison would also implicitly overturn the lower court's determination that a genuine factual dispute exists. Furthermore, despite the dissenting opinion's comparison of this case to Irwin and statement that both cases involve cars driving away from an officer, . . . the panel in Irwin stated that 'the projected path of Irwin's vehicle was in the officer's direction, at least generally,' and distinguished that fact from other cases where the car 'was moving away from the officer[.]'. . If we were to compare the two cases, this case is unlike Irwin in that, here, the district court determined that a resolution of the factual disputes in the plaintiffs' favor places Officer Gross toward the back of or behind the car, not in the projected path of the car (where the front tires were facing southbound), and that the car was moving away from the Officer Gross when Oliver fired his shots. We need not say that Irwin was wrongly decided, nor do we attempt to. Rather, we say only that the factual dispute in this case is not the same as that in Irwin. Because an analysis of the clearly established prong is fact-intensive, 'courts must take care not to define a case's "context" in a manner that imports genuinely disputed factual propositions.'. . As such, '[w]e find that if a jury accepts Plaintiffs' version of the facts as true, particularly as to what occurred in the moments before [Oliver] shot [at the car], the jury could conclude that the officers violated [Plaintiffs'] clearly established right to be free from excessive force.'. . Moreover, to the extent that Oliver argues that the car's threat is immaterial to the excessive-force analysis, we disagree and find it material to the excessive force claim. . . Because the factual dispute is material, 'we lack jurisdiction to consider the propriety of the summary judgment denial.'. . We leave it to the jury to weigh the disputed facts.")

Edwards v. Oliver, 31 F.4th 925, 932-35 (5th Cir. 2022) (Ho, J., dissenting) ("In my view, the central question in this case is whether the events depicted in the videos taken from the body cameras of Officers Roy Oliver and Tyler Gross . . . are meaningfully distinguishable from the bodycam video at issue in Irwin v. Santiago, 2021 WL 4932988, at *1 n.1 (5th Cir.). If there is a meaningful distinction here, then we should explain what it is. But if there isn't one, then we should reach the same outcome as we did in Irwin—entry of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Barring that, we should at least explain why we think our court's unanimous but unpublished, non-precedential decision in Irwin is incorrect. For my part, I see no principled difference between the video evidence in Irwin and the videos in this case. In both cases, the driver of an automobile appears to be trying to escape a police officer by driving away from him—not by running him over. In both cases, the officer was nevertheless close enough to the anticipated path of the automobile that he theoretically could have been hit and badly injured as a result. So a reasonable viewer of the videos may be troubled by the callous conduct of the officers in both cases—or unconcerned because of the hypothetical threat to officer safety in both cases.

But the reaction should be the same. And that should decide this case. Because in Irwin, our court concluded that the officers may well have violated the Fourth Amendment, due to the absence of immediate danger of harm—but that any such violation was not 'clearly established,' so the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. . . And Irwin was decided well after the events in this case. So if the law wasn't clearly established at the time of Irwin, then it wasn't clearly established here, either. To be sure, a good case can be made that we should not require plaintiffs under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to identify a 'clearly established' violation of law. . . But we are of course bound by that requirement as a matter of longstanding Supreme Court precedent. . . And that precedent entitles Oliver to qualified immunity here, just as our court held in Irwin. . . . The panel majority concludes that we need not—and indeed cannot—decide whether the videos in this case are comparable to the video in Irwin. According to the panel, that's a fact dispute for a jury to resolve, not a qualified immunity question for this court to decide. . . But it's not clear to me why that is. . . . I see no principled reason why we should depart from what our colleagues did in Irwin. Both here and in Irwin, there was a genuine fact dispute—but an immaterial one for purposes of qualified immunity. In Irwin, the parties genuinely disputed, among other things, whether the vehicle was accelerating toward or away from the officer—a quintessential fact question. We nevertheless held that the dispute was immaterial as to whether the officers violated clearly established law. That's because, even accepting the plaintiff's view that '[n]either officer "was positioned directly in front of or in the pathway of [the] vehicle,"' the facts as depicted in the bodycam video were 'not sufficiently analogous to' prior authorities such that the officers 'would have been "on notice" that their conduct was unconstitutional.'. . So the fact dispute identified by the panel here is virtually identical to the dispute in Irwin: Oliver says the vehicle accelerated toward Gross, while Plaintiffs say Gross was never in the vehicle's path. If that dispute was immaterial in Irwin, it's immaterial here as well. . . . If Irwin is wrong, we should say so. It's unpublished. So we're not bound by it. We're subject only to persuasion by the respected members of that panel. But I'm not prepared to say that Irwin was wrongly decided. And nor, it appears, is the panel majority. . . Our legal system is premised on the principle of treating like cases alike. . . We should follow that principle here. I respectfully dissent.")

Wilson v. City of Bastrop, 26 F.4th 709, 714-15 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Plaintiffs argue that Johnson never fired his weapon, so he did not pose a threat. Our precedent rejects that argument: 'we have never required officers to wait until a defendant turns towards them, with weapon in hand, before applying deadly force to ensure their safety.' Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, 826 F.3d 272, 279 n.6 (5th Cir. 2016) (collecting cases). By the same token, officers need not wait until a fleeing suspect turns his weapon toward bystanders before using deadly force to protect them. See Boyd v. Baeppler, 215 F.3d 594, 601 (6th Cir. 2000) (deadly force justified when suspect fled with a pistol and disregarded police warnings to stop); Montoute v. Carr, 114 F.3d 181, 185 (11th Cir. 1997) (deadly force justified when suspect fled with a sawed-off shotgun and disregarded officer's command to stop).[3] [fn. 3: For similar reasons, we reject Plaintiffs' argument that Johnson posed no threat because he never actually aimed his gun at an officer. Plaintiffs identify no basis for second-guessing an officer's split-second judgment that a fleeing, armed suspect could turn a gun on him at a moment's notice. See, e.g., Ramirez v. Knoulton, 542 F.3d 124, 129 (5th Cir. 2008) (rejecting argument that suspect 'made no threatening gestures toward the officers' and 'never raised his weapon nor aimed it at the officers' because it 'largely employed 20/20 hindsight' and 'fail[ed] to consider the reasonable belief of an officer at the scene'). Moreover, even if the gun was never pointed toward the officers, they could have reasonably thought Johnson posed a serious threat to onlookers.")

Betts v. Brennan, 22 F.4th 577, 582-86 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The parties chiefly dispute the degree of Betts's resistance. Indeed, this was the main ground for the district court's rejecting Brennan's argument—namely, that when tased Betts was 'at most, passively resisting.' That reasoning misapplies our excessive-force precedents. True, we 'have paid particular attention to whether officers faced active resistance when they resorted to a taser.'. . But the line between active and passive resistance is sometimes hazy and must be judged in light of the 'necessarily fact-intensive' nature of the inquiry. . . [court gives examples] Measured against these cases, we disagree that Betts's resistance was 'at most passive.' Betts did not just mouth off at Brennan, ignore one of his orders, or move away from his grasp. Rather, as the video shows, Betts adopted a confrontational stance at the outset and things got worse from there. Betts repeatedly contested why he was stopped, ignored dozens of Brennan's commands, disputed Brennan's authority, accused him of lying, batted away his hand, warned Brennan to call other officers, and dared Brennan to tase him. Most importantly, Betts repeatedly disputed Brennan's power to order him to stand behind the truck. Faced with an angry driver, Brennan reasonably wanted to get Betts away from the driver's compartment where a weapon might easily be hidden. . . Yet, after Brennan told Betts this order was 'for my safety and for your safety,' Betts retorted: 'Come on, that's a lie.'. . . In sum, we conclude that Officer Brennan did not violate the Fourth Amendment by tasing Betts one time in order to arrest him. . . . The district court reasoned the unlawfulness of Brennan's single tase was clearly established by our decision in Hanks v. Rogers, 853 F.3d 738 (5th Cir. 2017). While Hanks shares some similarities with the situation Brennan faced, there are significant differences. We therefore disagree with the district court that Hanks placed the excessiveness of Brennan's tase 'beyond debate.'. . . For many reasons, Hanks did not settle 'beyond debate' whether Brennan's use of force was constitutionally excessive. . . [court distinguishes facts of Hanks] These multiple factual distinctions matter because, as Hanks itself recognized, '[e]xcessive force claims are necessarily fact-intensive' and turn on 'the facts and circumstances of each particular case.'. . Hanks therefore did not place 'beyond debate' whether Brennan's single tase of Betts violated the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court erred in concluding otherwise.")

Irwin v. Santiago, No. 21-10020, 2021 WL 4932988 (5th Cir. Oct. 21, 2021) (not reported) ("In our circuit, there are two particular facts that have emerged as highly relevant to determining whether a moving vehicle poses an immediate threat to a police officer: 'the limited time the officers had to respond and "the closeness of the officers to the projected path of the vehicle."'. . In this case, the district court found that only seventeen seconds elapsed between the officers exiting their vehicle and discharging their weapons as Irwin drove by Officer Santiago. The court also found that the evidence of how close Officer Santiago was to the path of the vehicle was genuinely disputed, and that, viewed in the light most favorable to Irwin, the evidence could be construed to show that Officer Santiago was outside the path of Irwin's vehicle even though he was still close to the front of it as Irwin began moving. We agree with the district court that a reasonable factfinder could conclude from this evidence that Officer Santiago may not have been in immediate danger of harm by Irwin's operation of his vehicle in disobedience of the Officers' orders to stop, and therefore a material dispute about the objective reasonableness of the Officers' conduct existed. The district court did not err in denying summary judgment to the Officers on the merits of Irwin's Fourth Amendment claim. . . Turning to the qualified immunity inquiry, we conclude that the district court did not err in deciding that there is no clearly established law demonstrating that the officers' conduct constituted an excessive use of force. The particular facts that are material here—Irwin's failure to heed officers' commands to stop, Officer Santiago's position, and the brief period of time it took for the Officers to perceive and react to the direction of Irwin's vehicle—are not sufficiently analogous to the facts of our cases finding excessive force such that officers Santiago and Roberts would have been 'on notice' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Irwin presents, and we have only been able to find, circuit precedent establishing a Fourth Amendment violation where an officer was positioned behind a vehicle that was moving away from him as he fired. In Lytle, it was assumed for the purposes of summary judgment that the officer shot a vehicle driving away from him that was 'three to four houses down the block.'. . Similarly, in Flores v. City of Palacios, a police officer approached a parked car from behind. While still at some distance, the car started to pull away and the officer shot it in the rear bumper. . . In contrast, Officer Santiago was standing 'toward the front' of Irwin's vehicle as it started to move forward, and then stood at its side as he fired. This is significant because the projected path of Irwin's vehicle was in the officer's direction, at least generally, whereas in Lytle and Flores the vehicle was moving away from the officer. Considering that there are also cases where an officer shot at a car moving directly at him and no Fourth Amendment violation was found, see Hathaway, 507 F.3d at 316, 322; Sanchez v. Edwards, 433 F. App'x 272, 274–75 (5th Cir. 2011), . . . we think that it was not a matter of clearly established law that Officers Santiago and Roberts were unreasonable in firing on Irwin's vehicle. We therefore AFFIRM the district court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity.") Peña v. City of Rio Grande City, Texas, 816 F. App'x 966, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("If Peña's allegations are accepted by the trier of fact as true, the incident involved an unarmed, teenage girl who neither threatened the officers, herself, nor anyone else, nor was a suspect in a crime or had any criminal record. She was driven to the police department by her parents after she failed to come home the night before. Upon arriving on the scene, Vela immediately threatened to tase Peña for not getting out of her parents' car and attempted to place her in handcuffs for reasons unknown to her. Vela admits he did not have probable cause to arrest Peña at this point. According to Peña, she hid her hands out of fear and attempted to run because she was 'really scared.' Peña was not given any other commands other than to get out of her parents' car. Peña was not told that she was under arrest or why she was being ordered out of the car. Once Peña was running, the officers did not order her to stop or warn her that she would then be tased. Solis, Salinas' supervisor and highest ranking officer at the scene, commanded Salinas three times to tase Peña. Salinas acknowledged that she is instructed to follow her supervisor's directives and that Solis was the one who made the decision to tase Peña. While running behind Peña and without stopping to aim, Salinas tased Peña. . . . Here, without warning or ordering her to stop, Salinas deployed her taser, which according to one report occurred within 19 seconds of Vela's call for assistance. In determining the objective reasonableness of the officer's use of force, it is also relevant that Peña was seventeen years old and five feet two inches tall. . . . Our prior decisions, despite factual differences, provide sufficiently specific guidance to put the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. If Peña's version of the events is true, no reasonable officer under the circumstances Salinas and Solis confronted would have believed it was reasonable to tase Peña—a juvenile girl who was not suspected of a crime, posed no objective threat to the safety of the officers' or others, and was not actively resisting arrest—without warning and without attempting to use any intermediate measures of force. . . Given the material factual disputes in this case, we cannot resolve the qualified immunity question in the officers' favor at summary judgment. . . It is not the law that is not clearly established, rather in this case the facts are not clearly established. However, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peña at the summary judgment stage, the officers' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at the time of the incident. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Malbrough v. Stelly, 814 F. App'x 798, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he law of the Fifth Circuit—not the Tenth—applies. And we have rejected the idea that a police officer uses excessive force simply because he has 'manufactured the circumstances that gave rise to the fatal shooting.'. . In the Fifth Circuit, the excessive force inquiry zeros in on whether officers or others were 'in danger at the moment of the threat that resulted in the officer's use of deadly force.'. . Moreover, even if the Fifth Circuit did recognize something like the Tenth Circuit's state-created-need theory, Defendants would still not be liable. We must draw all reasonable factual inferences in favor of the non-moving party. . . And we may not make credibility determinations. But we need not credit evidence that is 'blatantly contradicted by the record,' especially by video or photographic evidence. . . Here, Malbrough offers testimony taken six years after the event that most of the officers were not in uniform. . . But Malbrough's own stipulated photographic evidence contradicts this testimony. . . . We do draw all reasonable factual inferences in favor of the non-movant. . . But considering the photographic evidence, Malbrough's story—based on three depositions taken six years after the event—is wholly contradicted by the record, and no reasonable jury could believe it. Thus, the district court was correct to find that the officers were in uniform. And it was reasonable for the officers to expect Campbell to recognize them as law enforcement and comply with their commands. Moreover, even if we accepted Malbrough's contradicted assertions at face value, our inquiry focusses on the officers' conduct at the moment of the threat—not the manner of their arrival. So even if the officers negligently spooked Campbell, the officers did not act unreasonably if they reasonably believed that Campbell posed an immediate threat to officers or others. The reasonableness of that assessment—whether Campbell posed a threat—is where we turn next. . . Having disposed of Malbrough's state-created-need theory, we must determine whether it was reasonable for the officers to believe that Campbell posed a threat to the officers near the Yukon or the civilians on the street. The district court answered 'yes.' And we agree. . . .

It is tragic that Campbell was so severely injured. But we are obligated, in circumstances such as these—'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving'—to give allowance 'for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments' about the amount of force needed to confront a dangerous situation. . . We cannot allow the 'theoretical, sanitized world of our imagination to replace the dangerous and complex world that policemen face every day.'. . Because the officers here reasonably believed that Campbell posed an immediate threat to officers and others, the officers did not use excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Garza v. Briones, 943 F.3d 740, 748 (5th Cir. 2019) ("[P]laintiff avers 'that the sheer number of shots fired' and 'the number of times that Garza was hit by gun fire' are enough, by themselves, to render defendants' use of deadly force objectively unreasonable. Plaintiff suggests that '[n]o reasonable officer in the same circumstances as Defendants[ ] could have believed that it was lawful to fire such a high number of shots.' Plaintiff's position is wholly undercut by Plumhoff. In Plumhoff, . . . police officers fired fifteen shots in ten seconds to prevent a suspect from fleeing in his car. The petitioner contended that the sheer number of shots rendered the force used excessive. . . The Supreme Court rejected that position, instead stating that 'if police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended.'. . Defendants stopped firing when Garza fell to the ground and was no longer a threat. That they fired sixty-one shots in eight seconds, standing alone, does not render their use of force objectively unreasonable.")

Valderas v. City of Lubbock, 937 F.3d 384, 390-91 (5th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 454 (2019) ("Here, it is undisputed that Officer Mitchell saw Valderas intentionally brandish a firearm at the approaching officers. Although Valderas contends that he discarded the gun before he was shot, the events transpired in a matter of seconds, leaving Officer Mitchell with little time to realize that Valderas no longer possessed a gun before making the decision to open fire. Considering the totality of the facts and circumstances, a reasonable officer in Officer Mitchell's position would have reasonably perceived Valderas's actions to pose an imminent threat of serious harm at the time the shots were fired. See Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, 826 F.3d 272, 279 (5th Cir. 2016). It follows that it was not unreasonable for Officer Mitchell to use deadly force to protect himself and others. Officer Mitchell was not required to wait to confirm that Valderas intended to use the gun before shooting. . . Consequently, we find that Officer Mitchell did not violate Valderas's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Shepherd on behalf of Estate of Shepherd v. City of Shreveport, 920 F.3d 278, 282-85 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Ms. Shepherd argues that the district court erred in determining that there was no genuine dispute as to whether Corporal Tucker's use of force was unreasonably excessive. She argues that genuine disputes of material facts exist as to: (1) the distance between Mr. Shepherd and Corporal Tucker at the time the shot was fired; (2) the manner in which Mr. Shepherd approached when he was shot; and (3) the level of threat Mr. Shepherd presented with the knife when he was shot. . . . [E]ven if this court were willing to consider an issue that was conceded before the district court and then raised as a dispute for the very first time on appeal, that issue is discredited by the videotape in this case. Though the videotape is far from the paragon of clarity, it shows that the distance at the time of the shot was much closer to ten feet than to thirty feet. So, viewing this alleged factual dispute 'in the light depicted by the videotape[,]'. . ., we hold that there is no material issue of fact as to the distance between Mr. Shepherd and Corporal Tucker at the time of the shot. Counsel's attempt to manufacture a dispute over this point on appeal borders on frivolous. . . . In addition, the videotape also shows that Mr. Shepherd was advancing down the driveway at a relatively quick speed in the final moments before being shot—in a motion that looks much more like directed running than errant stumbling. Thus, once again viewing this alleged factual dispute 'in the light depicted by the videotape[,]'. . we hold that there is no genuine issue of material fact on this issue either. Third, we turn to the level of threat that Mr. Shepherd presented with the knife when he was shot. Ms. Shepherd repeats her argument, rejected by the district court, that the dispute over whether Mr. Shepherd had the knife up by his head or down by his side at the time when he was shot is material. Her argument is that Mr. Shepherd could not have reasonably posed a threat if the knife was by his side. The videotape does not clearly show how Mr. Shepherd was holding the knife in the moments leading up to the shot. However, we agree with the district court that this dispute is not material to the outcome of the case. Under the totality of circumstances present in this case, even if we were to accept that Mr. Shepherd still had the knife at his side at the moment when he was shot, there is ample reason to conclude that he posed a real threat of serious bodily harm to the officer. As such, we hold that Corporal Tucker's use of deadly force was reasonable. . . . [A]ll of the alleged disputes raised by Ms. Shepherd in this appeal are either immaterial or discredited by the videotape, and we affirm the district court's judgment that Corporal Tucker's use of force was neither excessive nor unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Caselaw at the time of the shooting (and at the time of this opinion) has not clearly established that it violates the Constitution for a police officer to shoot someone who is behaving erratically, advancing toward the police officer with a knife in his hand, and disregarding a command to get back. Indeed, caselaw supports the opposite conclusion. . . As such, even if Corporal Tucker's use of force was unreasonably excessive based on the totality of circumstances in this case (which we hold it was not), we also affirm the district court's alternate determination that Corporal Tucker is entitled to qualified immunity.") Morrow v. Meachum, 917 F.3d 870, 872-78 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Appellants seek money damages from the personal pocket of a law-enforcement officer. The qualified-immunity doctrine makes that task difficult in every case. In this case, it's impossible. . . . Qualified immunity includes two inquiries. The first question is whether the officer violated a constitutional right. The second question is whether the 'right at issue was "clearly established" at the time of [the] alleged misconduct.'. . We can decide one question or both. . .The second question—whether the officer violated clearly established law—is a doozy. The § 1983 plaintiff bears the burden of proof. . . And the burden is heavy: A right is clearly established only if relevant precedent 'ha[s] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The pages of the United States Reports teem with warnings about the difficulty of placing a question beyond debate. From them, we can distill four applicable commandments. . . . First, we must frame the constitutional question with specificity and granularity. . . . Second, clearly established law comes from holdings, not dicta. . . . Third, overcoming qualified immunity is especially difficult in excessive-force cases. This 'is an area of the law "in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case," and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . And as this case illustrates, excessive-force claims often turn on 'split-second decisions' to use lethal force. . . That means the law must be so clearly established that—in the blink of an eye, in the middle of a high-speed chase—every reasonable officer would know it immediately. . . The fourth and final commandment is we must think twice before denying qualified immunity. The Supreme Court reserves 'the extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal' for decisions that are 'manifestly incorrect.'. . Yet it routinely wields this remedy against denials of qualified immunity. [collecting cases] Appellants are seeking an extraordinary remedy. To get it, they must make an extraordinary showing. They have fallen far short. They have not identified a controlling precedent that ' "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . Nor have they identified a controlling precedent rendering it 'beyond debate'—such that any reasonable officer would know, even in only seven seconds, and even in the midst of a high-speed chase—that Meachum's rolling block violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . To the extent we can identify clearly established law in excessive-force cases, it supports Meachum, not Moon. In at least three recent cases, the Supreme Court has decided whether officers are entitled to qualified immunity for using deadly force to end high-speed chases. In all three cases, the Court said yes. [discussing Plumhoff, Mullenix, and Scott] Appellants argue these cases are distinguishable in various ways. True. All that matters here, however, is that three cases affording qualified immunity to officers who used deadly force to end police chases do nothing to foreclose using deadly force to end police chases. . . . Even if Lytle survives Mullenix, Plumhoff, and the Supreme Court's other recent applications of the qualified-immunity doctrine, cases involving gunshots are too factually dissimilar to put the relevant question 'beyond debate.'. . . Therefore, gunshot cases do not ' "squarely govern[ ]" the facts' of a case involving a collision between a police vehicle and a suspect's vehicle. . . Even if gunshot cases were relevant, the law is at best ambiguous. Sure, there's Lytle. On the other hand, Mullenix, Plumhoff, Vann, Pasco, and Thompson v. Mercer. . . all involved gunshots that ended high-speed chases. And qualified immunity applied in all five. Cases cutting both ways do not clearly establish the law. . . . We have not previously identified the level of out-of-circuit consensus necessary to put the relevant question 'beyond debate.'. . But we know the consensus must be 'robust.'. . And in McClendon v. City of Columbia, 305 F.3d 314, 330 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc), we held recognition of the state-created-danger doctrine in six circuits was insufficient to create a robust consensus. We reasoned that, despite widespread acceptance of the doctrine, the circuits were not unanimous in its 'contours' or its application 'to a factual context similar to that of the instant case.'. .Appellants fall far short of establishing an out-of-circuit consensus, let alone a robust one. . . . Under Appellants' view, Meachum should be forced to decide—with life-or-death consequences for innocent motorists, in less than seven seconds, and upon pain of personal liability—whether his chase is more like Abney and Mullenix, or more like a slow-moving motorcycle pursuit 'across an empty field in the middle of the night in rural Kentucky[.]'. . Section 1983 does not put Meachum to that choice. Nor do we.")

Escobar v. Montee, 895 F.3d 387, 395-96 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Although, as with the suspect in Cooper, Escobar's hands were visible and he complied with Montee's commands, much unlike the situation in Cooper, Escobar had a knife within reach, and Montee had reason to believe he still posed a threat. Also unlike Cooper, Montee had been told that Escobar would have to be killed—by Escobar's own mother no less. A reasonable officer could easily conclude that Escobar's surrender was not genuine. . . . Given the information from Escobar's mother and the nature of the chase (at night, through multiple backyards in a residential neighborhood), Montee had reason to doubt the sincerity of Escobar's surrender. And because the knife remained within reach, Montee could reasonably believe that Escobar—if the dog was called off before handcuffing—would then try to harm someone. . . Accordingly, a reasonable officer could think Escobar posed a threat. . . . [B]ased on all the circumstances, it was objectively reasonable to permit Bullet to continue biting Escobar until he was fully handcuffed and subdued. Montee did not violate Escobar's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Gorman v. Sharp, 892 F.3d 172, 175 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Brower and subsequent precedents foreclose liability under the Fourth Amendment in the absence of intentional conduct. Under the plain facts of this case, the shooting here of Gorman—as tragic as it was—was not 'willful[ly]' performed by Sharp. . . Nor was Gorman's 'termination of freedom of movement [accomplished] through means intentionally applied.'. . It is undisputed that Sharp genuinely believed he was using a dummy firearm. His only intention in pulling the trigger on co-instructor Gorman was to educate his audience as a firearms training instructor. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand with instructions that the district court dismiss the remaining Fourth Amendment claim against Sharp.")

Vann v. City of Southaven, Mississippi, 884 F.3d 307, 309-10 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Treating the petition for rehearing en banc as a petition for panel rehearing, the petition for panel rehearing is GRANTED. The panel opinion, Vann v. City of Southaven, 876 F.3d 133 (5th Cir. 2017), is WITHDRAWN, and the following is substituted. . . 'A qualified immunity defense alters the usual summary judgment burden of proof. Once an official pleads the defense, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff, who must rebut the defense by establishing a genuine fact issue as to whether the official's allegedly wrongful conduct violated clearly established law.'. .With respect to Jones, one of the two officers who shot Vann, it is undisputed that Jones shot Vann after his colleague, Logan, was knocked to the ground by Vann's car and as Vann's car approached Logan for a second time. Under these circumstances, Jones's use of force did not violate clearly established law. With respect to Logan, the other officer who shot Vann, even assuming arguendo that Logan used excessive force, the question then becomes, was there law that put Logan on notice that shooting in the situation presented violated the constitution? It is the plaintiff's burden to find a case in his favor that does not define the law at a 'high level of generality.'. . In the district court, Plaintiff, Vann's representative, cited nary a pre-existing or precedential case. That alone dooms his case here. . . Even on appeal, Plaintiff fails to cite a case on point from this court or the Supreme Court that helps his case, instead relying on an out-of-circuit case. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court's grant of summary judgment to Jones, Logan, Yoakum, and Long.")

Hatcher v. Bement, 676 F. App'x 238, 243-45 (5th Cir. 2017) ("In this circuit, Fourth Amendment cases clearly establish—and did so by 2013—that when a suspect is on foot, an officer may shoot the suspect only if a reasonable officer could reasonably perceive that the suspect posed an immediate and significant threat to the officer or to others. Our application of this clearly established law in analogous or near-analogous cases provided fair warning to Bement that it would violate the Fourth Amendment to shoot a suspect that, at the time of the shooting, is bent over, squinting, wiping pepper spray from his eyes, and slowly walking away from all the officers. . . . Assuming the facts in the light most favorable to Hatcher's Estate, as we must in reviewing a summary judgment ruling, Hatcher posed an objectively lesser threat than the suspect in Meadours, who held a weapon when the officer fired. This court rejected the officer's claim of qualified immunity because there was a genuine, material dispute regarding whether the suspect nevertheless posed a threat at the time of the shooting. A similar material factual dispute exists here. If Hatcher was bent over, squinting, wiping pepper spray from his eyes, and slowly walking away from all the officers, then it would be unreasonable for Bement to believe that he posed a threat. Accordingly, Hatcher's Estate has presented a genuine dispute of material fact, precluding summary judgment.")

Blair v. City of Dallas, 666 F. App'x 337, 341-42 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court has made clear that 'so long as "a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,' a plaintiff cannot 'avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless."'. . . The affidavit from William P. Flynn, a former law enforcement officer and an instructor at a police academy, primarily discusses whether the actions taken by the officers before they fired their weapons were reasonable. With respect to the shooting itself, the affidavit states that 'during the actual shooting ... both Officer Cantu's and Officer Aquino's conduct against David Blair ... was objectively unreasonable, unconstitutional and contrary to recognized and practiced police policies and procedures.' However, the affidavit does not explain why it may have been unreasonable for the officers to believe they were in danger when Blair opened his apartment door with flashlight in hand. Moreover, '[e]ven if an officer acts contrary to her training, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.'. . Flynn's affidavit argues that the officers acted contrary to recognized police policies and procedures, but that contention is not enough by itself to create a material fact issue. Accordingly, we hold that Blair has failed to demonstrate that there is a genuine dispute as to any material fact. . . .In the instant case, there is no evidence that the officers knew Oliver and D.O. were inside the apartment when they fired the shots. As a result, it appears that the officers' use of force was not deliberately applied to Oliver and D.O. This Court has not yet weighed in on whether an officer's use of force in such a circumstance constitutes a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Thus, under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it is apparent that any right that may have been violated was not clearly established at the time of the officers' alleged misconduct. We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment dismissing the claim that Oliver and D.O. were wrongfully seized.")

Mendez v. Poitevent, 823 F.3d 326, 333-34 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs . . . argue that the only relevant facts for our consideration are that, at the time of the shooting, Mendez had broken free, was running away from Poitevent, and had covered 15 feet. But we must consider all of the circumstances leading up to that moment, because they inform the reasonableness of Poitevent's decisionmaking. . . In other words, the question here is not, as plaintiffs assert, whether an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by shooting a suspect who is running away. Rather, it is whether an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by shooting a suspect who just fought the officer at length; disarmed him of his baton; prevented him from using his radio to call for backup; potentially attempted to obtain his gun; concussed and disoriented him; and broke free of his grasp; at the precise moment the officer's vision is impaired and he fears losing consciousness—and the evidence indicates that it was not apparent to Poitevent that Mendez was running away. In our view, using deadly force in such circumstances does not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . In sum, we hold that Poitevent did not use excessive force because a reasonable officer in his situation could have believed that Mendez posed a threat of serious harm, justifying the use of deadly force. Thus, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity.")

Pratt v. Harris Cty., Tex., 822 F.3d 174, 182-84 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Construing the facts in the light most favorable to him, Pratt ignored multiple requests and warnings from both Lopez and Medina. Indeed, Pratt aggressively evaded Lopez and Medina's attempts to apprehend him. Only after he continuously failed to comply, did either deputy deploy tasers; Medina used his taser only after Lopez's efforts to subdue Pratt were ineffective. The evidence showed that Medina cycled his taser only when Pratt continued to resist handcuffing. Once Pratt complied, and Goldstein was able to handcuff him, Medina stopped using his taser. But, when Pratt kicked an officer after being taken to the ground, Medina used his taser again; and, once again, officers were able to control him. It is also important that neither officer used their taser as the first method to gain Pratt's compliance. The record shows that both officers responded 'with 'measured and ascending' actions that corresponded to [Pratt's] escalating verbal and physical resistance.'. . In sum, Pratt has not shown that Lopez and Medina's use of tasers was 'clearly excessive' or 'unreasonable.' Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in granting both Lopez and Medina qualified immunity in this respect. . . .Although hog-tying is a controversial restraint, we have never held that an officer's use of a hog-tie restraint is, per se, an unconstitutional use of excessive force. We have, however, previously addressed the excessiveness and reasonableness of the restraint. . . .On appeal, Pratt argues that it is significant that the HCSD had a policy prohibiting the hog-tying of arrestees. Pratt also points out that Officer Wilks, the primary facilitator of Pratt's hog-tying, acknowledged his belief that hog-tying was unconstitutional. . . Pratt further contends that her son had stopped resisting, at least temporarily, at the time he was hog-tied, but acknowledges that he had to be subdued earlier after 'giving up'. . . But, the constitutionality of an officer's actions, is neither guided nor governed by an officer's subjective beliefs about the constitutionality of his actions or by his adherence to the policies of the department under which he operates. . . Instead, we must examine whether the HCSD officers' conduct was excessive or unreasonable under the 'circumstances of [this] particular case.'. . Considering the record evidence, neither the circumstances surrounding the arrest nor our precedent support that the decision to hog-tie Pratt was an excessive or unreasonable one. . . First, as earlier observed, we have never held that hog-tying is a per se unconstitutional technique of controlling a resisting arrestee. Thus, an assertion of hog-tying alone does not constitute a claim of excessive force. . . . Turning to the excessiveness and unreasonableness of Deputies Wilks, Goldstein, and Salazar's conduct, the record evidence shows that Pratt ignored multiple requests and warnings from all three officers; and, he aggressively evaded their attempts to apprehend him, even after promising compliance. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to him, it is clear from the record that Pratt did not follow through on his offers to comply with the officers' requests. Instead, Pratt renewed resistance, broke free from the officers' grips, and kicked at officers attempting to restrain him (eventually kicking one officer in the groin twice). Furthermore, unlike the arrestee in Gutierrez, the officers who hog-tied Pratt were unaware of his use of drugs or alcohol when they hog-tied him, and Pratt does not contend that her son volunteered such information. Additionally, unlike the arrestees in Gutierrez and Hill, neither party contests that Pratt was only restrained for a very brief period. Thus, in the factual context of this case, the use of the hog-tie restraint was not unconstitutionally excessive, or unreasonable. To conclude, in the light of Pratt's 'on again, off again' commitment to cease resisting, his recurring violence, and the threat he posed while unrestrained, it was not, under the totality of the circumstances, 'clearly excessive' or 'unreasonable' for HCSD officers to restrain him as they did. For these reasons, we hold that the district court did not err in granting Wilks, Goldstein, or Salazar qualified immunity.")

Pratt v. Harris Cty., Tex., 822 F.3d 174, 185 (5th Cir. 2016) (Costa, J., concurring in the judgment) ("My colleagues' differing opinions on whether the force applied in this tragic case was excessive demonstrate that the constitutional question is a close call even for a judge who can spend days parsing the fine points of case law, let alone for an officer making split second decisions in the field. It is precisely for such situations—when the existence of a constitutional violation is not 'beyond debate'—that qualified immunity provides a defense.")

Pratt v. Harris Cty., Tex., 822 F.3d 174, 186, 189-91(5th Cir. 2016) (Haynes, J., concurring and dissenting) ("Wayne Pratt received the death penalty at the hands of three police officers for the misdemeanor crime of failing to stop and give information. The majority opinion concludes that the deputies' decision to hog-tie Pratt and apply force to his back while he was in this position was a reasonable response to Pratt's failure to stop and identify himself following an accident and his failure to comply with their instructions. . . . Qualified immunity cannot be interpreted to license officers to use deadly force under these facts. Because it was clearly established that officers in Deputies Wilks, Goldstein, and Salazar's position should not have hog-tied Pratt in the manner they did, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds for Deputies Wilks, Goldstein, and Salazar's alleged use of excessive force in hog-tying Pratt. I concur in the remainder of the judgment. . . . In each of these cases [Mullenix, Sheehan, and Plumhoff], the officers faced an immediate threat of serious harm, as did others who might come into contact with the individual in question. Conversely, in the instant case, there is no indication that Pratt ever posed a serious threat of harm to any of the officers, nor any indication that the officers feared for their safety in any meaningful way that might justify the use of deadly force. This is not the 'split second' decision described in the concurring opinion. Thus, balancing Deputies Wilks, Salazar, and Goldstein's use of deadly force against the importance of the government's interests alleged to justify the intrusion leads inexorably to the conclusion that the deputies' alleged use of force in this case was excessive and constitutes a violation of Pratt's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .With respect to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it is apparent that the officers' actions in using excessive force violated clearly established law. As of May 10, 2010, the date on which the events in this case occurred, the Fifth Circuit had decided two cases directly addressing whether the use of hog-tie restraints constitutes excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment: Gutierrez and Hill v. Carroll Cty., 587 F.3d 230 (2009). . . . The facts of this case fall squarely under the holding in Gutierrez . . . Here, the officers had reason to suspect that Pratt had abused drugs based on his erratic behavior, and the presence of a glass pipe and lighter in his hands takes this from mere unexplained erratic behavior into the 'on drugs' camp. . . Furthermore, Pratt was unarmed and posed a relatively little risk of harm to the officers despite his refusal to comply with their commands. At no point did Pratt attempt any kind of violence other than kicking at the officers while he was on the ground. Pratt never attempted to reach for the officers' weapons, nor did he pose any other threat of serious harm to the officers. Additionally, the officers did not discover that Pratt had stopped breathing until after an ambulance arrived, and the amount of time Pratt was actually hog-tied is a disputed fact. Furthermore, distinct from the facts in Hill, the officers did not attempt to use leg restraints before placing Pratt in a hog-tie restraint. Most importantly, unlike Hill, the officers here used both the hog-tie restraint and put a knee on his back, greatly impairing his ability to breathe. . . In light of the holding in Gutierrez and the similarities between it and the instant case, the state of the law at the time of the incident was sufficiently established to provide fair warning to Deputies Wilks, Salazar, and Goldstein that their alleged conduct violated Pratt's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force.")

Cass v. City of Abilene, 814 F.3d 721, 731-33 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Appellants argue that '[t]he district court erred in allowing the Individual Defendants to create a dangerous, deadly situation and then avoid liability for their acts due to the alleged "necessity" of having to respond with deadly force to the very situation they created.' We agree that by choosing to conduct the raid with surprise and with guns drawn, APD created a dangerous situation that led to Cass's death. Nevertheless, our precedent forecloses consideration of this context in evaluating Appellants' excessive force claim:

> The excessive force inquiry is confined to whether the officer was in danger at the moment of the threat that resulted in the officer's shooting. Therefore, any of the officers' actions leading up to the shooting are not relevant for the purposes of an excessive force inquiry in this Circuit.

Harris v. Serpas, 745 F.3d 767, 772 (5th Cir.) (internal citation, quotation marks, and modifications omitted), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 137, 190 L.Ed.2d 45 (2014).

Because Smith reasonably believed himself to be in immediate danger when he shot Cass, the shooting did not violate the Fourth Amendment and Smith is entitled to qualified immunity on Appellants' deadly force claim. . . . In a distinct Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, Appellants argue that APD's execution of the warrant was unreasonable, creating a dangerous situation with a high likelihood of serious bodily injury or death. Appellants cite evidence that Abilene Gold Exchange had a history of cooperating with police, none of the officers had ever been threatened by an employee of the business, and the alleged crime upon which the warrant was predicated—failure to properly report purchases of precious metals—was only a Class B misdemeanor. Appellants also argue that a fact issue exists as to whether the police announced themselves upon entry. Viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to Appellants, a reasonable juror could find APD's use of force, coupled with the failure to announce, to be objectively unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Smith argues that the raid was justified by the presence of guns, Camp's felony conviction, a general sentiment that Camp and Cass had an 'anti-police attitude,' and the suspicion that Abilene Gold Exchange might be involved in criminal activity more serious than the bookkeeping violations that were the subject of the warrant. However, neither an unsubstantiated suspicion that crime may be afoot nor a general consensus among officers that business owners have an 'anti-police attitude' justifies a surprise tactical raid on a lawful business, particularly one with a history of cooperating with the police. Nor does the mere presence of guns or a decades-old nonviolent conviction automatically permit the use of force employed here by APD. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellants, various APD officers had entered Abilene Gold Exchange on numerous occasions as part of criminal investigations without ever being threatened, giving APD no reason to expect a violent response. On these facts, a reasonable juror could find that Smith's use of force violated Cass's Fourth Amendment rights and unnecessarily created a dangerous situation that made Cass's death likely. However, Appellants also have the burden to show that Smith violated Cass's clearly established rights. Appellants' entire argument on this second prong of the qualified immunity test is that 'it is clearly established in the law that citizens are protected against unjustified, excessive police force.' This general statement is insufficient to meet Appellants' burden. . . .We note that the district court did not reach the 'clearly established' prong. Moreover, Smith entirely failed to argue that Cass's right was not clearly established, and on an ordinary affirmative defense, Smith would bear the burden of proving the defense. Nevertheless, our precedent dictates that 'once a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . We conclude that on this record, Appellants have not shown a violation of clearly established law so as to satisfy this burden.")

Mason v. Lafayette City-Parish Consol. Gov't, 806 F.3d 268, 276-78 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The district court did not correctly analyze the summary judgment record. The district court appears to have relied entirely on the officers' account of events. For example, the district court accepts as 'uncontroverted' Faul's position that Mr. Mason's hand went toward the gun in his waistband before Faul released the canine. Babino's account of the shooting, which conflicts with the officers' accounts in several key respects, is absent from the district court's opinion despite having been discussed in the Masons' briefing. Babino's deposition contains an account of the shooting, and the facts she related are material to the Fourth Amendment question. When addressing excessive-force claims, courts have an obligation to 'slosh our way through the factbound morass of "reasonableness."'. . Additionally, the Supreme Court has recently emphasized that in an excessive-force case on summary judgment, like any other case, a court must accept as true the evidence of the nonmoving party and draw all justifiable inferences in that party's favor. . . The district court failed to give credence to, or even make note of, Babino's conflicting account of the shooting, which perhaps constitutes the Masons' strongest evidence. We must give full credence to Babino's testimony. . . .We have explained that 'an exercise of force that is reasonable at one moment can become unreasonable in the next if the justification for the use of force has ceased.'. . Although the record reflects that there was a break between the first five and last two shots that struck Mr. Mason, and that Mr. Mason lay on the ground when the final two shots were fired, the district court did not expressly address whether Faul's use of his firearm was justified throughout the encounter. We conclude that genuine issues of material fact arise regarding the final two shots that struck Mr. Mason, which requires reversal of the summary judgment in part, and we do not express an opinion as to whether Faul was entitled to qualified immunity for each of the first five shots. A reasonable jury could conclude that a reasonable officer in Faul's position would not have 'probable cause to believe that [Mr. Mason] pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm'. . . at the time the final two shots were fired. . . . In light of Babino's and Dr. Traylor's testimony, a reasonable jury could conclude that Mr. Mason lay incapacitated on the ground and did not move in a threatening manner before Faul fired the final two shots. . . Accordingly, a reasonable jury could conclude that Mr. Mason objectively posed no immediate threat, such that Faul violated the Fourth Amendment by firing the final two shots. We therefore must determine whether Faul is entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that he did not violate clearly established law. The law is clearly established if there is factually similar, controlling case law from this court or the Supreme Court. . . The present case is an 'obvious one where Graham and Garner alone offer a basis for decision.'. . The constitutionality of the final two shots can be decided on the threshold issue—under Garner—of whether deadly force was permissible, i.e., whether Mr. Mason objectively posed an immediate threat. . . The second, more complex inquiry dictated by Graham—balancing the severity of the threat against other factors. . . —is not necessary here. A reasonable jury could conclude that when Faul fired the final two shots, Mr. Mason would have appeared incapacitated to an objectively reasonable officer. Shooting a clearly incapacitated suspect is inconsistent with Garner's command that deadly force is unconstitutional when a 'suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others.'. . We therefore conclude that there are material fact questions as to whether Faul is entitled to qualified immunity for firing the final two shots.")

Mason v. Lafayette City-Parish Consol. Gov't, 806 F.3d 268, 282-89 (5th Cir. 2015) (Higginbotham, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("As Quamaine Mason and his girlfriend, Racquel Babino, stepped outside of her apartment, they were met by three officers with guns drawn. Quamaine put his hands up and stood still. Officer Martin Faul and his police dog together attacked Quamaine, Faul shooting him seven times at point-blank range as he fell down struggling to fend off the dog. No other officer fired a shot. I concur in the rejection of immunity for the final two shots and the disposition of Appellants' other claims, but I dissent from the majority's refusal to address the district court's grant of qualified immunity for the first five shots that led to Quamaine's senseless death. . . Accepting the version of facts most favorable to Appellants, as we must, . . . I offer a narrative of events from which a reasonable jury could find that no reasonable police officer could have perceived an imminent threat to his own life or the life of another. . . . Quamaine stood still with his hands up and empty, complying with all police instructions. . . But holding his dog by its collar, Officer Faul and the dog charged Quamaine—the two were separated by less than the length of the dog's thirty-six-inch tether. . . .While the dog was on Quamaine, Officer Faul shot Quamaine seven times at point-blank range . . . . On the narrative sketched above, Officer Faul and the dog together attacked Quamaine even though the young man made no threatening movement whatsoever. . . . There is no doubt that Officer Faul's use of lethal force in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . The majority fully agrees with this analysis with respect to the final two shots, but it leaves the district court's grant of summary judgment in place with respect to the first five shots—refusing to address the appeal from that judgment. . . . I am at sea as to why the majority slices a single event into distinct segments—seven shots into five and two—then performs the proper analysis with respect to one segment—the final two shots—and then orders the district court to try again with respect to the other segment—the first five shots. This decision is especially puzzling when the issue is qualified immunity. As we have said before in this context, there is no reason to require the district court to address again a legal question that this Court reviews de novo. . . And we inevitably will face another appeal before this case can go to trial, at which evidence offered to the jury can hardly be segmented. The upshot is that the majority simply declines to 'express an opinion' with regard to a legal issue—the main issue of this case—that was squarely addressed by the district court, fully briefed by the parties, and remains the heart of this case. The majority also declines to vacate the district court's judgment with respect to the first five shots. To these eyes, that is indefensible. . . .Whatever the majority's reasoning, and with all due respect, I cannot concur in its opinion leaving the door open for another decision in Officer Faul's favor. This 'remand for consideration' implicitly holds that on this record the district court could conclude that Officer Faul enjoys qualified immunity as a matter of law for the first five shots and to these eyes that cannot be so. Appellees rely upon the principle that officers may use deadly force when threatened even if they negligently create circumstances leading to the need for force. . .That is, Appellees argue that Officer Faul was justified in using deadly force because even if he negligently released his attack dog, Quamaine reacted—in a reflexive attempt to fend off the dog—by moving his hands downward and unintentionally closer to the gun in his waistband. But that principle does not address the situation here, where an officer used both a dog and a gun together as part of the same attack, the same direct and intentional deployment of deadly force. The doctrine regarding negligent creation of the circumstances requiring deadly force is necessary to avoid collapse of the jurisprudence of deadly force into a negligence action, but it is not without limit—for it would then blur and ultimately erase the effort of the law to limit the use of deadly force. And I do not read the extant cases to say otherwise. . . . Excessive force cases are highly fact specific, and two key circumstances distinguish this case from Young and its progeny. First, the officer's use of the dog to attack Quamaine did not merely set a risky scene before shots were fired. It was at all times an assault of dog and gun. The moment the dog did as trained, Officer Faul began firing away. That he continued to put two more rounds in his back after Quamaine was lying on his stomach is doubly relevant. It signifies both as an independent act, as the majority observes, but also for its powerful suggestion that Officer Faul intended his force to be deadly from the beginning. . . Officer Faul's multiple breaches of police protocol—including 'rush[ing] into ... the killing zone' without a plan, failing to take cover, and insisting on taking the lead despite being tethered to an attack dog—suggest the same. Though Officer Faul cannot be held liable for these negligent actions, a jury could certainly infer that they paint the picture of an officer eager to engage in a deadly confrontation. Second, in the Young cases, officers' actions created risky situations, but the suspects then chose to commit intervening acts which threatened the officers. . . The officers set the scene, but the tragic outcome was not inevitable; suspects were free to comply with officer commands. . .but instead chose to attack, flee, or reach for objects out of officers' view. Officers faced with these newly developed threats then responded reasonably in the moment. There was no intervening act in this case. To the extent Quamaine moved his hands, he cannot be faulted for reflexively attempting to protect himself from the dog. No reasonable officer would have perceived his reflexive movements as threatening. Indeed, given the firing sequence and trajectories, a reasonable jury could easily conclude that hand movement had nothing to do with this shooting. . . . Other circuits with rules similar to Young have recognized that officers may be liable for using excessive force when their actions cross the line from negligence to recklessness. . . Still others have recognized the principle that officers may be liable for excessive force when their actions directly create the justification for the force. . . . These cases chart a limit to Young comporting with common sense. At some point, an officer crosses the line between setting up a risky situation and actually himself directly causing the 'threat.' Officers are at risk in nigh every traffic stop as they approach a vehicle, as are the persons in that vehicle—so also with street confrontations. Yet no one will maintain that an officer can lawfully avoid all risk by simply shooting and asking questions later. So long as the suspect has his hands in the air—and certainly when three officers have drawn guns trained on him—an officer cannot simply shoot him, avoiding all risk to himself. If that is so, an officer cannot knock him down and shoot him because he then no longer has his hands up. That the officer has information that the suspect is armed does not work a different result. . . To say otherwise is to hold that a deadly attack upon a man standing with his hands in the air is not excessive force just because he has a gun in his waistband—an unconscionable result insupportable in law, and perversely confounding the current sanctioning of open carry of handguns. . . . Under Appellants' version of the facts, there was nothing that Quamaine Mason or indeed anyone in the area matching his description could do to escape Quamaine's fate. He was dead as soon as police were called. He complied with all orders until he was attacked by a dog and police officer who shot him seven times at point-blank range. We have the responsibility of providing arresting officers all guidance in the use of deadly force that we can, as these cases are often close and difficult—and when these cases are close and difficult, we clothe the officers with post-hoc immunity. This attack of man and dog is far from that genre. We ought not decide this case—that decision belongs to a jury. Avoiding a trial is an important component of qualified immunity, but denial of qualified immunity does not deny Officer Faul his immunity defense from liability. It only concludes that he must be judged by a jury of his peers. . . Appellants should not have go through the time and expense of another interlocutory appeal to get this Court to recognize as much. I cannot join this newly minted form of abstention, and I respectfully dissent.")

Davis v. Romer, 600 F. App'x 926, 929-31 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Appellants' principal argument is that Romer's conduct caused the dangerous encounter. Specifically, Appellants contend that 'Romer's life was in danger because of his own intervening actions of attempting not once but twice, to grab a hold of a moving vehicle when Romer had a choice not to do so.'. . Appellants contend that the district court erred in interpreting this Court's precedent to limit its analysis to the circumstances existing at the moment Romer shot Thomas. Recently, this Court has rejected the same argument. [discussing precedent] Appellants recognize the above precedent and seek to distinguish it, stating that Davis and the minor children testified that Romer's arm was not trapped in the window as Romer claims. . . Appellants asserted at oral argument that Romer should have made the 'better decision ... to let [Thomas] go.' Appellants argue that Romer caused the danger by jumping on the running board of the vehicle. In other words, their argument is that instead of jumping on the vehicle Romer should have moved away from the fleeing vehicle. Appellants' argument that the 'officer[ ] could have moved away from the car is, unfortunately, a suggestion more reflective of the "peace of a judge's chambers" than of a dangerous and threatening situation on the street.' . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellants, there is testimony that Romer removed his arm from the window after Thomas began driving toward the service road. Nonetheless, this does not constitute a genuine issue of material fact because Appellants' brief concedes that Romer's arm was inside the vehicle at the time Thomas began driving away. . . Moreover, the evidence, including Davis's testimony, demonstrates that Thomas's driving away with Romer's arm inside the vehicle and Romer subsequently jumping on the vehicle's running board occurred very rapidly. Under such chaotic, dangerous circumstances, Appellants have not shown that Romer's conduct was objectively unreasonable. As previously discussed, the definitive question is whether Romer had a reasonable belief that Thomas posed a risk of serious harm at the time Romer used deadly force. Appellants have conceded that Romer was on the running board of the fleeing vehicle when he fired the fatal shots. We therefore conclude that at the time of the shooting, Romer had reason to believe that there was a serious threat of physical harm to him. . . .Appellants also point to the fact that Romer fired 12 rounds as opposed to a single shot in self-defense. . . The Supreme Court has rejected the argument that an officer's firing of 15 rounds constituted excessive force because 'if police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended.'. .Accordingly, because Romer's use of force was objectively reasonable, Appellants have not shown a Fourth Amendment violation. Thus, Appellants cannot show that Romer's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable under clearly established law at the time the incident occurred. . . The district court properly granted summary judgment as to the Fourth Amendment claim based on qualified immunity.")

Thompson v. Mercer, 762 F.3d 433, 437-41 (5th Cir. 2014) ("The district court correctly concluded that the Thompsons have not alleged a constitutional violation. A plaintiff does not overcome qualified immunity by merely alleging 'that a violation arguably occurred.'. . . Here, even construing the facts in the Thompsons' favor, there was no Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Upon reflection it seems that Keith—who was in possession of a firearm and had committed multiple felonies over the course of two hours—posed a significantly greater threat than the Scott suspect, an unarmed driver suspected only of speeding in a pursuit that lasted less than six minutes. So if the Scott chase 'closely resemble[d] a Hollywood-style car chase of the most frightening sort, placing police officers and innocent bystanders alike at great risk of serious injury,'. . . the chase here posed all the greater risk. Accordingly, after multiple other attempts to disable the vehicle failed, it was not unreasonable for Mercer to turn to deadly force to 'terminate [the] dangerous high-speed car chase.'. .The Thompsons disagree, arguing that their son was no longer a risk because he was driving on a 'lonely' rural road and his vehicle had already been disabled. The argument is not persuasive. The Supreme Court has already rejected the defense that 'the roads were mostly empty.'. . Similarly, this court recognizes the 'inherent danger' of vehicular flight, 'even when no bystanders or other motorists are immediately present.'. . But more importantly, the Thompsons' characterization of the scene is belied by the video evidence. Even when Keith was driving along this 'virtually empty' country road, multiple cars had to pull over as Keith and his pursuit caravan raced back toward town. And rather than decreasing the inherent risk, the rural nature of the road made the pursuit all the more dangerous, as there was no shoulder for cars to pull onto, and visibility was often limited. . . .Even assuming arguendo that Mercer's use of force was excessive under the Fourth Amendment, that decision was not so unreasonable so as to deprive him of qualified immunity from § 1983 liability. To overcome the defense, the Thompsons must allege an infraction so egregious that 'no reasonable officer' could have believed the conduct constitutional. . . Consider, then, the circumstances facing the officer here. Mercer knew that this unidentified suspect had stolen a car and abducted a woman. He also knew that the pursuit had lasted for two hours, and that attempts to disable the vehicle had failed. He had been told that the suspect was armed and suicidal, and he saw that the suspect was headed toward a town a mile away. It was therefore manifestly reasonable for law enforcement to assume that the unknown suspect represented a tremendous risk to the officers and to the community that lay ahead. . . Thus, even if the force was excessive, that force was not so excessive that 'no reasonable officer' would have thought the conduct constitutional.")

Royal v. Spragins, 575 F. App'x 300, 304, 305 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Jeffery, a suicidal man, not only exited his car with his gun, but also began lowering the gun and pointing it at the officers. This was sufficient to give the officers full reason to believe that Jeffery posed a threat of serious harm to them. Under these circumstances, the use of deadly force was not clearly excessive or clearly unreasonable. . . . We decline Royal's invitation to stray from our precedents by considering the officers' actions before the moment of the threat that resulted in the officers' shooting—here, the moment when Jeffery began lowering the rifle. Even assuming that Wichita Falls had a policy in place for dealing with suicidal persons and the officers were not aware of or did not follow the policy, the officers did not violate Jeffery's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force as they acted reasonably when Jeffery began lowering his gun.")

Harris v. Serpas, 745 F.3d 767, 772-74 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Appellants argue that taken as a whole the officers' actions in this case were unreasonable. To the extent that Brian Harris became agitated and threatening, Appellants contend, it was only due to the provocation of the officers. Appellants point to the officers' awareness that Brian had not threatened his wife or children, and that they were only called to the home to assist Brian, who was depressed and had possibly taken an overdose of sleeping pills. Brian was engaged in lawful activity before and during the incident, Appellants contend, up until the officers roused him from his bed by breaching his bedroom door yelling commands and firing taser darts at him seconds later. Accordingly, Appellants assert that under the totality of the circumstances, the officers' use of force was unreasonable. The United States Supreme Court has long held that courts must look at the 'totality of the circumstances' when assessing the reasonableness of a police officer's use of force. . . This Court, however, has narrowed that test, holding that '[t]he excessive force inquiry is confined to whether the [officer] was in danger at the moment of the threat that resulted in the [officer's] shooting.'. . Therefore, any of the officers' actions leading up to the shooting are not relevant for the purposes of an excessive force inquiry in this Circuit. . . .In the instant case, the taser video evidence confirms that Mr. Harris was holding a knife above his head at the moment Officer McGee fired his weapon. Notwithstanding, Appellants argue that the district court erred by 'making a finding of fact that [Officer] Kish was in imminent danger of being stabbed by an advancing Brian Harris' at the time of the shooting. Appellants contend that the parties' locations and movements in the room at the time of the shooting is a 'hotly contested' material factual issue that precludes summary judgment. The relevant law, however, does not require the court to determine whether an officer was in actual, imminent danger of serious injury, but rather, whether 'the officer reasonably believe[d] that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious harm to the officer or to others.'. . Moreover, '[t]he "reasonableness" of a particular use of force must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . When looking at the 'moment of the threat' that resulted in Officer McGee's use of deadly force, it is clear from the taser video that Mr. Harris was standing up out of bed and had raised the knife above his head at the time the shots were fired. Accordingly, the district court properly held that under these circumstances, the officers reasonably feared for their safety at the moment of the fatal shooting. . . .We affirm the district court's opinion based solely on our examination of the moment when the fatal shooting occurred. We express no opinion regarding the appropriateness of the officers' conduct that preceded the moment of the shooting in this case. In summary, the taser video evidence confirms the district court's finding that Brian Harris was holding a knife in a stabbing position at the moment of the fatal shooting. Therefore, the district court properly concluded that the use of deadly force was not unreasonable. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court's grant of summary judgment for the officers based on qualified immunity. As such, we also AFFIRM the dismissal of the Monell claim against the City of New Orleans.")

Williams v. City of Cleveland, Miss., 736 F.3d 684, 688 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Addressing Saucier's second prong, we find that the officers did not violate a right that was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. We note that in previous Taser cases in which we have rejected qualified immunity for officers, the person tased was not attempting to flee. [collecting cases] . . .

. Although the parties' experts witnesses disagreed on whether the Taser use and chokehold was excessive force, the undisputed facts lead us to the legal conclusion that the force exercised against Williams was, under the circumstances reflected in the record, reasonable. Our rule on qualified immunity is that '[u]se of deadly force is not unreasonable when an officer would have reason to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious harm to the officer or others.' Mace v. City of Palestine, 333 F.3d 621, 624 (5th Cir.2003). The deceased performed a push-up with both Goza and Perry on his back after being tased three or four times and after reaching for the officers' Tasers and Officer Goza's gun. He continued to pose a threat of serious harm throughout the struggle.").

Watson v. Bryant, 532 F. App'x 453, 458, 459 (5th Cir. 2013) (not published) ("It is irrelevant that Bryant may have neglected to follow best practices by attempting to handcuff a suspect while holding a gun, however tragic the result. . . . However inadvisable Bryant's actions were, the evidence does not show that it was objectively unreasonable for an officer to fail to reholster his weapon in the midst of handcuffing a potentially armed suspect. . . and we refuse to make such disarmament a constitutional requirement. Bryant thus is entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Watson's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Hogan v. Cunningham, 722 F.3d 725, 735 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Viewing the facts in Hogan's favor, he approached his apartment door, told the Officers that they could not come inside, attempted to close the door, and was immediately tackled by two officers. In tackling him, the Officers caused him to fall on his back, and they fell on top of him. As a result, he suffered two broken ribs. We conclude that Hogan has not met his burden to show that existing precedent at the time of his arrest placed beyond debate the question of whether the use of such force amounted to a constitutional violation because the cases on which Hogan relies are distinguishable from the circumstances of this case.")

Newman v. Guedry, 703 F.3d 757, 763, 764 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Guedry contends that he had no reasonable warning that tasing Newman multiple times violated Newman's constitutional rights, because there was then no binding caselaw on the appropriate use of tasers. . . Lawfulness of force, however, does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it. . . Qualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel. . .Furthermore, 'in an obvious case,' the Graham excessive-force factors themselves 'can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . None of the Graham factors justifies Guedry's tasering Newman. As noted above, on Newman's account, he committed no crime, posed no threat to anyone's safety, and did not resist the officers or fail to comply with a command. . . Therefore, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Newman at the summary-judgment stage, the officers' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at the time of the incident.")

Newman v. Guedry, 703 F.3d 757, 763, 767-69 (5th Cir. 2012) (Barksdale, J., dissenting) ("The majority reduces the inquiry to a single question: whether the Officers applied more force than

necessary to effectuate Newman's arrest. Dispensing with qualified immunity's second prong by casting this an 'obvious case', the majority hangs its analysis on Graham's well-known excessive-force factors. . . But the cases it cites to support this proposition . . . are non-precedential and distinguishable on their facts. . . . A proper application of qualified immunity's second prong leads to holding the Officers' conduct was not objectively unreasonable in the light of clearly-established excessive-force law. A right is sufficiently clear, and thus 'clearly established', when 'every "reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right"'. . . . The majority's incantation that the right to freedom from excessive force was clearly established at the time of Newman's arrest . . . disregards the Supreme Court's admonition not to define clearly-established rights at a high level of generality. . . The fact-specific nature of excessive-force claims . . . requires viewing the Officers' actions prospectively, in the light of 'the circumstances that appeared to the officer', to determine whether such conduct was objectively reasonable. . . Equally important is the Officers' concomitant, obvious right to use 'measured and ascending responses', calibrated to physical and verbal resistance. . . .Therefore, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless it was clearly established that the measured and ascending force they applied would have been objectively unreasonable to 'every reasonable official' in like circumstances. . . 'It is not the critic who counts.... The credit belongs to [those] actually in the arena ... spend[ing] [themselves] for a worthy cause'. Theodore Roosevelt, Address at the Sorbonne, Paris: Citizenship in a Republic (23 Apr. 1910). Most regrettably, the tone and tenor of the majority opinion convey sarcasm and hostility for the Officers' conduct in a volatile, hostile, and dangerous situation; a situation in which split-second decisions must be made for the safety of all involved—citizen and police. The conduct resulting from those decisions may not be polite and pretty, but it is necessary. And, it may require more than hurt feelings. Nor is the interaction between officers and citizens a debating society. . . . And, more to the point here, the Officers' conduct is shielded by qualified immunity.") Khan v. Normand, 683 F.3d 192, 195, 196 (5th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he dissent contends that the 'very limited' holding in Gutierrez renders the officers' conduct here a violation of a clearly established right. This is incorrect for at least three reasons. First, the brevity of Khan's restraint and the constant supervision similarly distinguish this case from Gutierrez. Indeed, Gutierrez explicitly based its holding on the officers' failure to monitor the decedent during the extended car ride, 'facts bearing heavily against the officers [that] are not in dispute.'. . Second, in determining that hog-tying 'may present a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm' to certain drug-affected people, Gutierrez relied primarily on a study that (as this court subsequently noted) has been called into question by more recent scholarship. . . Third, even assuming the research in Gutierrez accurately depicts the dangers of four-point restraints for someone in a drug-induced psychosis, Gutierrez dealt with officers who knew the decedent had—as he told the officers—'shot some bad coke.'. . The record contains no similar knowledge by the officers in the field, despite the subsequent autopsy report that found methamphetamine in his system, and there is evidence that the officers thought Khan may have been suffering from a mental illness, just as the complaint alleges. Under our precedent in Hill and Gutierrez, we cannot say that there has been a violation of clearly established law. Although this is a tragic incident, police officers must often make split-second decisions, and qualified immunity shields them from subsequent second-guessing unless their conduct was objectively unreasonable under clearly established law. . . Consequently, the defendants are protected by qualified immunity even if their conduct constituted excessive force.")

Khan v. Normand, 683 F.3d 192, 199-201 (5th Cir. 2012) (Emilio M. Garza, J., dissenting) ("[A]lthough the Gutierrez holding was 'very limited,' it applies squarely to the facts of this case. Like Gutierrez, Khan was a 'drug-affected person in a state of excited delirium' who was allegedly 'hog-tied and placed face down in a prone position.'. . Our decision in Hill did not unsettle the rule established by Gutierrez, and the law in this area was clearly established. . . . In addition to my disagreement with the majority's conclusions, I respectfully recommend that this court consider prohibiting the application of the four-point restraint to individuals who are in an apparent state of diminished mental capacity. This rule would not be novel. See Cruz v. City of Laramie, Wyo., 239 F.3d 1183, 1188 (10th Cir.2001) ("We do not reach the question of whether all hog-tie restraints constitute a constitutional violation per se, but hold that officers may not apply this technique when an individual's diminished capacity is apparent."). The majority suggests that a four-point restraint in these circumstances is permissible if its application is brief and under 'constant supervision.' This strange necessity counsels another look at our law—the majority sanctions the use of a restraint that, when used on a certain group of vulnerable individuals, carries such a risk of death that it can only be applied legally if someone maintains constant vigilance and removes the restraint at the first sign of distress. Of course, I am mindful of the need to balance the individual's right to be free from excessive force against the tremendous demands placed on police officers in the field. It is no coincidence that two of the three four-point restraint death cases that have come before this court involved individuals who were experiencing some sort of psychotic episode. Those who have lost contact with reality can pose a grave danger to themselves, to police officers, and to the general public. But the law should also take account of the fact that these individuals may be uniquely susceptible to harm from a four-point restraint. Furthermore, a broad restriction on the four-point restraint may not substantially disturb current police practices. There is evidence that the hog-tie may already be dying its own slow death. . . . Indeed, my suggested holding would place no new prohibition on the defendant-officers in this case. The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office had already banned the hog-tie by the time of Khan's death. It may be time for a new restriction on the four-point restraint. Regardless, Nayeem Khan's family brought claims that, under this court's clearly established precedent, should have survived summary judgment. I respectfully dissent.")

Elizondo v. Green, 671 F.3d 506, 510 (5th Cir. 2012) ("We agree with the district court's conclusion that Green's use of deadly force was not clearly unreasonable. Ruddy ignored repeated instructions to put down the knife he was holding and seemed intent on provoking Green. At the time Green discharged his weapon, Ruddy was hostile, armed with a knife, in close proximity to Green, and moving closer. Considering the totality of the circumstances in which Green found himself, it was reasonable for him to conclude that Ruddy posed a threat of serious harm. Finally, in the absence of a constitutional violation, there can be no municipal liability for the City.")

Elizondo v. Green, 671 F.3d 506, 511, 512 (5th Cir. 2012) (DeMoss, J., specially concurring) ("I join the majority opinion in full because, under the current state of our law, the panel is correct in its legal judgments with respect to jurisdiction and liability. However, I once again feel compelled to write separately to express my disapproval of and disappointment with the actions of the City of Garland police department. We decide this case less than two months after a separate panel on which I sat issued similar opinions in the equally tragic case of Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985 (5th Cir. Dec. 15, 2011) (DeMoss, J., specially concurring). In Rockwell, six City of Garland police officers responded to a domestic disturbance where Scott Rockwell, a diagnosed bipolar schizophrenic who had previously attempted suicide, was ranting and raving alone in his room. Id. He had threatened—but not harmed—his parents earlier that night, and was barricaded in his room when the officers arrived. Id. Yet in less than 30 minutes the officers armed themselves, ignored the parents' request to give Scott time to calm down, broke down his bedroom door, provoked a knife attack, and shot him four times. Id. It was the officers' job to prevent violence or suicide, yet they quickly escalated the situation to the point where they were legally justified to use deadly force against a mentally ill person who obviously needed help. Id. Sadly, Ruddy Elizondo's case is very similar to Rockwell. I firmly believe that Officer Green 'should have been trained to use better judgment in [his] approach to volatile and unfortunate situations such as this one.' Id. Officer Green was a very large man highly trained in self defense and armed with a night stick, taser, and firearm, while Ruddy was a short and obese teenager who was distraught, intoxicated, and contemplating suicide with a relatively small knife. Moreover, Officer Green had only been on the scene for a few seconds, backup was on the way, and emergency medical personnel was waiting outside when the shooting occurred. Deadly force should have been Officer Green's very last resort rather than his first reaction. Presumably Officer Green followed standard police protocol for domestic disturbances where a knife is involved, so I focus my criticism specifically at the City of Garland police department's training and tactical response programs. There must be effective ways for police officers to resolve volatile situations that avoid threatening or using deadly force. [footnote omitted] Forcing Ruddy's bedroom door open, yelling orders at him, and immediately drawing a firearm and threatening to shoot was a very poor way to confront the drunk, distraught teenager who was contemplating suicide with a knife. Either law enforcement procedures or our law must evolve if we are to ensure that more avoidable deaths do not occur at the hands of those called to 'protect and serve.' Saving lives remains job number one for every law enforcement agency, and it is imperative that they have better procedures in place to deal with those persons who are young, intoxicated, mentally ill, or otherwise likely to react poorly in already volatile situations. I firmly believe that the light of public concern must be shined on tragic cases such as Scott Rockwell's and Ruddy Elizondo's if more deaths are to be prevented. Hopefully publication of this opinion will help to compel the City of Garland police department—and all law enforcement agencies—to re-evaluate their training and response procedures so that the use of deadly force remains the last resort in every situation.")

Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985, 992, 993 (5th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he Rockwells, relying on case law from other circuits, urge this Court to examine the circumstances surrounding the forced entry, which may have led to the fatal shooting, in evaluating the reasonableness of the officers' use of deadly force. This argument is unavailing. It is well-established that '[t]he excessive force inquiry is confined to whether the [officer or another person] was in danger at the moment of the threat that resulted in the [officer's use of deadly force].'. . . At the time of the shooting, Scott was engaged in an armed struggle with the officers, and therefore each of the officers had a reasonable belief that Scott posed an imminent risk of serious harm to the officers. We need not look at any other moment in time. Accordingly, the officers' use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. Because we hold that Scott's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force was not violated, we need not consider the issue of whether that right was clearly established.")

Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985, 996 (5th Cir. 2011) ("In light of the above case law and the overall dearth of binding Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit case law directly on point, we conclude that, at the time of the incident in this case, it was not clearly established that it was unreasonable for the officers to believe that the threat Scott posed to himself constituted an exigent circumstance. Consequently, we hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the Rockwells' claim for warrantless entry.")

Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985, 996 (5th Cir. 2011) (DeMoss, J., specially concurring) ("We hold today that the six police officers who breached Scott Rockwell's bedroom door and ultimately shot him to death are entitled to qualified immunity under federal law and official immunity under Texas state law. Noting that the state of the law in these particular circumstances remains relatively primitive, I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately to express disapproval of and disappointment with the officers' actions during the course of this sad incident.")

Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 188, 189 (5th Cir. 2011) ("Mrs. Carnaby argues that qualified immunity for the officers is inappropriate, because it was their own negligence in approaching Carnaby's vehicle instead of remaining behind cover that caused them to be placed in a position of vulnerability. That contention, however, has little bearing on our analysis, given the facts. The use of deadly force may be proper regardless of an officer's negligence if, at the moment of the shooting, he was trying to prevent serious injury or death. . . The officers were trying to prevent serious injury or death, so their use of force was reasonable, and we need not proceed further in the qualified-immunity analysis in regard to the officers.").

Hill v. Carroll County, Miss., 587 F.3d 230, 235, 237 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Gutierrez does not hold four-point restraint a per se unconstitutionally excessive use of force, nor does it extend beyond its facts as a mirror of the then-unchallenged San Diego Study. . . Taken on their own terms, neither the San Diego Study nor Gutierrez raises a triable fact issue in this case where there is no evidence of drug abuse or drug-induced psychosis. . . . The deputies cannot be held responsible for the unexpected, albeit tragic result, of their use of necessary force. Judged from the perspective of an officer at the scene of Loggins's arrest and transportation, as Graham, supra, requires, the deputies had no objective basis not to use four-point restraints. Dr. Spitz's criticism, founded on the singularity of Loggins's death, is just the sort of hindsight that Graham cautioned against. On the other side of the excessive force ledger, the sheriff's office was called in because Loggins was in a fight. She refused to turn loose of her victim voluntarily. She fought with Deputy Spellman, assaulted him with his own flashlight and physically taxed two deputies as they restrained her legs and repeatedly tried to put her in a squad car before they resorted to four-point restraints. She continued to squirm, kick and twist even after being hog-tied. This level of demonstrated violence required stern control measures. A thorough review of the trial court record persuades us that summary judgment was warranted on Hill's excessive force claim. She failed to develop a material fact issue that the deputies' use of four-point restraints was unnecessary, excessively disproportionate to the resistance they faced, or objectively unreasonable in terms of its peril to Loggins. This holding should not be read to condemn or condone the use of four-point restraints. We conclude only that Hill did not meet her burden of proof in this case.").

Manis ex rel. Plaisance v. Lawson, 585 F.3d 839, 846 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Before October 2005, Supreme Court precedent and cases in this circuit authorized deadly force when an officer had 'probable cause to believe that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm.'. . Applying that precedent, this court upheld the use of deadly force when a suspect reached below an officer's sight line in defiance of contrary orders and appeared to retrieve a gun. . .Thus, far from clearly establishing that Zemlik's conduct was unlawful, the controlling authority in this jurisdiction did not prohibit his use of deadly force in the similar situation confronting him. Moreover, even if contrary authority existed, the 'cases taken together [would] undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case' and certainly would not 'clearly establish' that Zemlik's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 201, 125 S.Ct. 596, 600 (2004). Therefore, Zemlik's actions were objectively reasonable under clearly established law, and he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Club Retro LLC v. Hilton, 568 F.3d 181, 202, 203 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Based on the facts as alleged by plaintiffs in this case, Operation Retro-Fit was broader in scope and more extreme in manner than the administrative inspection laws permit. Swint, Bruce, and Russo all concluded that similar, arguably less extreme, searches were unconstitutional under existing Supreme Court precedent. The search of Club Retro deserves to be called what it was–a raid to discover evidence of criminal wrongdoing. Such raids are 'not the sort of conduct that was approved by the Supreme Court in Burger.'. . Operation Retro-Fit was therefore a violation of Club Retro, L.L.C.'s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . No reasonable deputy sheriff in defendants' positions could believe that the law permitting an official to accept a public invitation to enter a commercial establishment as would a typical citizen justifies a S.W.A.T. team assault by forty armed officers with weapons drawn and a full search without a warrant that is supported by probable cause. Similarly, no reasonable deputy sheriff in defendants' positions could have concluded that such a raid–in which they, e.g., threatened individuals with weapons, threw employees to the ground, searched the attic and trashed the cash registers, broke down the door to a closed apartment, and blocked the exists [sic] to a club they believed to be overcrowded . . .was a lawful, warrantless administrative search to check for underage alcohol consumption or fire code violations.").

Deville v. Marcantel, 567 F.3d 156, 169 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Accepting Deville's version of events for summary judgment purposes, this case involved: a traffic stop for a minor traffic offense unsupported by probable cause; Deville's passive resistance to being removed from her car and separated from her grandchild, in compliance with her well-established rights under state law to resist an unlawful arrest (i.e., an arrest unsupported by probable cause); the officer's threat of calling child protective services despite no indication that the child was in distress or that Deville intended to flee; an officer who others said smelled of alcohol beating on Deville's driver's window with a heavy flashlight and breaking the window; a rough extraction of Deville from the vehicle by both officers, causing a forceful blow to Deville's abdomen; and handcuffs applied so tightly that they caused severe nerve damage. These alleged facts are sufficiently egregious to warrant a denial of qualified immunity because a reasonable officer would have known that the degree of force was unconstitutionally excessive under the circumstances.").

Pasco ex rel. Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 579-82 (5th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e hold that the district court erred in concluding that Knoblauch loses qualified immunity because he failed to follow his supervisor's order to end the chase. The district court also found that Tennessee v. Garner. . . established a clear Fourth Amendment rule making Knoblauch's actions unconstitutional because no innocent bystanders were present. . . . Considering the vast difference between an unarmed suspect fleeing on foot and a reckless, intoxicated driver speeding away from police in a vehicle, we hold that Garner did not establish a clear Fourth Amendment rule making Knoblauch's conduct unlawful based on the summary judgment record in this case. In 2000 neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit had spoken directly to the question of whether an officer may attempt to end a high-speed car chase by bumping the suspect off of the road. However, in 2007 the Supreme Court confronted facts similar to this case in Scott v. Harris. . . . In reaching the conclusion in Scott, the Court did not cite to any existing cases dealing with this factual situation. The Court did, however, determine that Garner could not establish a clear Fourth Amendment rule governing car chases because that case involved a suspect fleeing on foot. . . Scott therefore reaffirms our conclusion that Garner did not clearly establish a rule making Knoblauch's conduct unlawful. In the absence of a specific rule governing the constitutionality of Knoblauch's actions, our inquiry turns on whether Knoblauch's actions were objectively reasonable. . . The Court's analysis of the reasonableness of the officer's actions in Scott is instructive. Though the specific facts of every car chase will be different, the Court acknowledged the generally inherent danger that suspects fleeing from police in vehicles pose to the public–even when no bystanders or other motorists are immediately present. At the moment the officer in Scott rammed the suspect's vehicle, it was not threatening any other vehicles or pedestrians. . . .This indicates that the holding of Scott was not dependent on the actual existence of bystanders–rather, the Court was also concerned about the safety of those who could have been harmed if the chase continued. . . . The early morning hours, the rural nature of the area, and the fact that Pasco may have slowed down immediately before impact do not render Knoblauch's actions unreasonable. Like in Scott, it was Pasco himself who created this dangerous situation and put himself at risk when he fled from the officers. As indicated by the undisputed facts of the chase, it was reasonable for Knoblauch to believe that Pasco would continue to pose a danger to anyone he might encounter. Stuck between the choice of letting a presumptively intoxicated and reckless driver continue unabated or bumping the suspect off the road, Knoblauch chose the course of action that would potentially save the lives of individuals who had no part in creating the danger. Although this choice ended tragically with Pasco's death, the balancing test indicates that Knoblauch's actions were reasonable. . . . We find that Knoblauch's actions in terminating the serious threat posed by an intoxicated suspect fleeing down a narrow, curvy highway at excessive rates of speed did not violate clearly established law, and were reasonable under the circumstances. Accordingly, qualified immunity protects Knoblauch from suit..").

Arshad ex rel. Arshad v. Congemi, No. 08-30061, 2009 WL 585633, at *7 (5th Cir. Mar. 9, 2009) ("Here, Officer Miller had been called to the scene because of the accident, not because of Dr. Arshad's presence, and nothing appeared to be out of the ordinary upon his arrival. However, the situation escalated quickly as soon as Officer Miller asked Dr. Arshad to present her credentials. It is clear that Officer Miller first attempted to rely on verbal orders, but Dr. Arshad repeatedly refused to comply by presenting her credentials, refused to step away from the boy, continued to assert that it was her scene, and grew increasingly agitated. Only then did Miller attempt to arrest her simply by pulling her away by her arm, but she physically resisted arrest. In light of Dr. Arshad's behavior and her resistance to less forcible methods, it was not objectively unreasonable to use a forcible takedown to effect her arrest. That is especially true in light of the fact that she sustained, at most, only minor scrapes and bruises in the takedown itself and, unlike in Gregory, showed no signs of cardiopulmonary arrest–even shortness of breath–during or immediately after the struggle. The district court correctly concluded that Officer Miller's use of force was not excessive under the Fourth Amendment and that his actions were not objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, Officer Miller and all other individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.").

Hudspeth v. City of Shreveport, 270 F. App'x 332, 2008 WL 749547, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. Mar. 19, 2008) ("At issue, then, is whether Hudspeth 'posed a threat so serious as to justify a reasonable officer in [the defendant Officers'] position to respond with deadly force'. . . Of course, on summary judgment, the objective-reasonableness inquiry is a question of law; in other words, it cannot be decided if material fact issues exist. . . . [I]n the light of the videotape evidence, the Officers' actions were objectively reasonable. That Hudspeth pointed a cell phone in the Officers' direction, resisted interaction with them, tussled with Officer Ramsey, turned suddenly toward the Officers, and attempted to flee is shown by the videotapes and undisputed. The Officers had an articulable basis to believe Hudspeth was armed and could reasonably have perceived him as posing a threat of serious bodily harm.. . Therefore, no genuine issue of material fact exists; and, as a matter of law, their actions were objectively reasonable. Plaintiffs' contentions to the contrary are unavailing. That Hudspeth was unarmed is also irrelevant. . . That Hudspeth had his back to the Officers at the instant deadly force was used is also irrelevant. . . Moreover, as stated, the proper inquiry is an objective one. . . . Despite Appellants' contentions, the alleged inconsistencies in Officer Hawthorn's testimony regarding why he fired at Hudspeth, or whether Hudspeth was aiming at Officer Hawthorn, or just pointing the cell phone in his general direction, for this reason, fail to create a genuine issue of material fact on the objective reasonableness of the Officers' actions. Along that line, also irrelevant are the Officers' subjective beliefs provided by testimony but not shown by the videotapes, namely whether any of the Officers truly thought: Hudspeth had a gun; their lives were in danger; or, Hudpseth was pointing the device (whether gun or cell phone) at an Officer. Further, the fact that Officer Ramsey stated over the radio that Hudspeth appeared to be talking on a cell phone while driving does not make summary judgment inappropriate. Obviously, Hudpseth's doing so during the high-speed pursuit did not preclude his having a weapon on exiting his vehicle. In asserting this radio-transmission raises a material-fact issue, Appellants gloss over the fact that Hudspeth, after exiting his vehicle and being approached by the Officer, pointed his cell phone, as most guns are held shortly before they are fired, at an Officer. Appellants have not carried their burden to show the Officers acted objectively unreasonably. Accordingly, as the district court held, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hathaway v. Bazany, 507 F.3d 312, 322 (5th Cir. 2007) ("The evidence before us–and the lack of specific facts to the contrary–requires a conclusion that Bazany fired his weapon and was struck by the Mustang in near contemporaneity. The only remaining question, then, is whether an officer would be justified in firing his weapon when threatened by a nearby accelerating vehicle, even if, owing to the limited time available to respond, the shot was fired when or immediately after the officer was hit. . . The evidence indicates that Bazany was in close proximity to a car that he had asked to pull over that then accelerated towards him, making perception of a serious threat reasonable. Given the extremely brief period of time an officer has to react to a perceived threat like this one, it is reasonable to do so with deadly force. . . It is this brevity, and the coordinate rapid response that it demanded from Bazany, that is the distinguishing factor in this case. This is not an instance, as in Waterman, where an officer fired after the perception of new information indicating the threat was past. Instead, the entirety of the officer's actions were predicated on responding to a serious threat quickly and decisively. That his decision is now subject to second-guessing–even legitimate second-guessing–does not make his actions objectively unreasonable given the particular circumstances of the shooting. . . . Because Bazany's actions were objectively reasonable, we conclude that he did not violate Jon-Eric Hathaway's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Mack v. City of Abiline, 461 F.3d 547, 555, 556 (5th Cir. 2006) ("Appellees' search of a car in an open parking lot without a search warrant, without probable cause, without a concern for officer safety, and without consent violates clearly established law. A reasonable officer would not think the Constitution allows a random search of a vehicle where none of the above justifications apply.").

Martinez-Aguero v. Gonzalez, 459 F.3d 618, 626, 627 (5th Cir. 2006) ("Gonzalez could argue that Martinez-Aguero's Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established because courts have split on the precedential value of Verdugo-Urquidez; because it is uncertain how the Court intended the 'substantial connections' test to be applied; and because the Court seemed explicitly to reserve the question whether illegal aliens would have Fourth Amendment rights on U.S. soil. .

. But, decisions pre-dating Verdugo-Urquidez, including cases from this circuit, state unequivocally that aliens are entitled to Fourth Amendment protection. . . Also, the inquiry into whether rights are clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . If Martinez-Aguero deserves any Fourth Amendment or due process protection at all, it surely must extend to the right to be free of entirely meritless arrests and the excessive use of force. Lynch plainly confers on aliens in disputes with border agents a right to be free from excessive force, and no reasonable officer would believe it proper to beat a defenseless alien without provocation, as Martinez-Aguero alleges.The logic of Lynch applies equally to arresting an alien without cause . . . .This reasoning is particularly compelling when an alien has made a good-faith effort to comply with federal requirements for obtaining a temporary visa and has made frequent use of a border-crossing card to visit the country in the past. On these facts, no officer would reasonably conclude that Martinez-Aguero lacked protection against suspicionless arrest.").

Washington ex rel J.W. v. Katy ISD, No. CV H-18-1848, 2019 WL 2368592, at *14–16 (S.D. Tex. June 5, 2019) ("Courts in the Fifth Circuit have not squarely addressed what constitutes an objectively unreasonable use of a taser against a student. Outside the Fifth Circuit, several cases offer guidance. Most cases suggest that an officer's use of a taser against a student may be objectively reasonable if the student was warned before the officer deployed the taser, and the student was resistant, fighting, or struggling with the officers. . . . Ms. Washington looks outside the case law to argue that Officer Paley's use of force was objectively unreasonable because he did not follow school policies and procedures. . . . This argument does not address qualified immunity in a § 1983 action. The critical question is whether Officer Paley violated J.W.'s federally protected rights, not whether he followed school policies or state law. The record shows that J.W. refused to follow school staff members' and officers' instructions, was agitated and insistent on leaving, and that Officer Paley gave warnings before using the taser, but it is disputed that he pushed a staff member, so as to justify the taser use. And Officer Paley did not stop using the taser when J.W. stopped resisting. The record evidence of Officer Paley's interactions with J.W. shows genuine factual disputes material to deciding whether the tasing itself, its length, and its intensity, were objectively reasonable. These disputes preclude summary judgment. . . .The body-camera recording underscores factual disputes that are material to determining whether Officer Paley's tasing was reasonable. While the recording shows J.W. disagreeing with school staff about leaving, it is unclear that he pushed against a staff member or a security guard when trying to go through the door. . . In less than one minute after J.W. tried to exit, he begins screaming, is tased, falls to his knees, and has the taser held against him until he falls to the ground. . . While Officer Paley stated that the first tasing had no effect on J.W., the video recording shows J.W. falling to his knees when Officer Paley 'drive stuns' J.W. The drive stunning either continues or is repeated until J.W. lies completely flat. . . Officer Paley then aims the taser at J.W.'s head and threatens him for several seconds after J.W. is no longer moving and is flat on the ground. . . .The questions on which the evidence conflicts include whether it was objectively reasonable to believe that the force used was needed to keep J.W. in the building, and, perhaps more critically, whether Officer Paley's continued use of the taser, including the 'drive stun' technique, after J.W. fell to his knees was reasonable. These and related disputes preclude summary judgment.")

Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *8-11 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) ("At the time Officer Bagley informed Sanders that he was 'under detention,'. . . , he had the following information available to him: Sanders, wearing a backpack containing unidentified items, was videotaping the parking lot of the Addison Police Department without having requested permission to do so, informed the police department of his reasons for doing so, or even notified the police department that he would be doing so, and, when Officer Bagley approached Sanders, Sanders refused to tell Officer Bagley why he was videotaping the police department and refused to identify himself or provide Officer Bagley with identification. . . Under the totality-of-the-circumstances, these facts are sufficient to create a reasonable suspicion that criminal activity is afoot. . . .Sanders has failed to plausibly allege that Officer Bagley violated his Fourth Amendment rights when he initially detained Sanders for an investigation. To the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on these allegations against Officer Bagley, the court grants defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . . Sanders alleges that Officer Bagley used excessive force, in violation of his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure, when he took Sanders to the ground using a leg sweep. . . .Considering the Graham factors and judging the alleged use of force from 'the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene,'. . . the court concludes that, viewed favorably to Sanders and accepted as true, the well-pleaded allegations in the amended complaint show that Officer Bagley used excessive force when he performed a leg sweep to take Sanders down. The facts pleaded in the amended complaint show that Sanders did not verbally or physically threaten Officer Bagley; he was not attempting to flee; he was not resisting arrest; he was not given the opportunity to submit voluntarily to Officer Bagley's control; and he was never warned that if he did not submit to Officer Bagley's orders, physical force would be used against him. Even in light of Sanders' admitted failure to cooperate with Officer Bagley's requests during the investigatory detention, the facts alleged show that there was no need for force. . . Accepting these facts as true, the amount of force from the leg sweep would be disproportionate to the lack of need for force. . . . Having concluded that Sanders has plausibly pleaded that Officer Bagley used excessive force by performing a leg sweep to take Sanders down, the court next considers whether it was clearly established at the time of the incident that, under the circumstances alleged, the use of such force violated the Fourth Amendment. As discussed above, viewed favorably to Sanders and accepted as true, the well-pleaded allegations in the amended complaint show that Sanders posed little or no threat to Officer Bagley, and that the use of force was not justified under the circumstances. . . .While the 'Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test is "not capable of precise definition or mechanical application,"'. . . the test is clear enough that Officer Bagley should have known that he could not constitutionally use a leg sweep to forcibly take Sanders down when he never gave Sanders the opportunity to voluntarily submit to his control, Sanders was not attempting to flee or resisting arrest, and Sanders did not verbally or physically threaten Officer Bagley's physical safety. The court thus concludes that Officer Bagley is not entitled to qualified immunity at the pleading stage with respect to Sanders' excessive force claim.")

Schaefer v. Whitted, 121 F. Supp. 3d 701, 713-17 (W.D. Tex. 2015) ("As the above summarized cases make clear, it is axiomatic § 1983 provides redress only for gross or reckless abuses of power, but not for simple negligence. . . . However, Young and Fraire are silent where, as here, Plaintiff alleges Officer Whitted's unprovoked assault was not a negligent failure to follow police protocol, but instead independently qualifies as the precise type of objectively unreasonable conduct the Fourth Amendment is designed to protect against. Further, Young and Fraire did not involve suspects who were induced or forced by the officer to engage in the act that ultimately justified the shooting nor was the act arguably justifiable self-defense. . . Here, Schaefer's motion to secure his weapon—the only action serving to justify Officer Whitted's shooting—arose as a direct and perhaps justified response to an allegedly gross abuse of police power. Assuming the facts alleged are true, Officer Whitted cannot now hide behind Schaefer's reasonable response to an unconstitutional assault in order to justify the killing, especially where he was subjectively aware his actions would very likely evoke Schaefer's response. Accordingly, to the extent Officer Whitted 'manufactured' his own legitimate fear of serious bodily injury by recklessly and unjustifiably physically attacking Schaefer, the Court finds this case distinguishable from Young and its progeny. Indeed, facts alleged by Plaintiff substantiate allegations Officer Whitted used recklessly excessive force in violation of Schaefer's Fourth Amendment rights when he resorted to physical violence before first verbally ordering Schaefer to put down his gun and this conduct forced or induced Schaefer to instinctively move to secure his weapon. . . . Consequently, even if Officer Whitted was ultimately justified in believing his life was in jeopardy at the time he fired the fatal shots, he can still be held liable for recklessly abusing his power to generate the threat he seeks to use as the basis for his shooting. . . . [A]ccepting the facts alleged as true, physically assaulting Schaefer before commanding him to drop the gun was a reckless abuse of police power directly inducing the action now used to justify the shooting. Under these circumstances, the Court finds Plaintiff states a Fourth Amendment claim against Whitted based on the assault, even where the shots themselves may be justified. . . . Under the second prong of qualified immunity, the Court must next decide whether 'the law was sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the constitution.'. . . For the reasons this case is distinguishable from Thomas, so too is the law clear a reasonable officer would know assaulting a lawfully armed citizen without first announcing himself, giving a warning, or otherwise commanding the individual to disarm would rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . Further, it is clearly established the use of 'deadly force violates the Fourth Amendment unless "the officer has probably cause to believe the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm either to the officer or to others."'. . This threat must be 'immediate.'. . The circumstances of the unprovoked assault and shooting described in the Amended Complaint are sufficiently grievous to compel the Court to deny qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage because a reasonable officer would have known the degree of force used was unconstitutionally excessive. Drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, it is facially plausible the threat of physical harm was not immediate because Schaefer did not actually draw the weapon and point it in Officer Whitted's direction. If Plaintiff's allegations are true, and Schaefer merely turned away, extended his left harm to repel Officer Whitted, and used his right harm to secure his weapon, a jury might find it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in Officer Whitted's position immediately shooting Schaefer twice in the chest was a violation of Schaefer's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Whether Officer Whitted's was guilty of ordinary negligence that proximately caused an otherwise justifiable use of force, which would not give rise to constitutional liability, or whether Officer Whitted's use of force on Schaefer's property was reckless and objectively unreasonable, which would, is best left to be decided on a developed record at summary judgment. Considering the competing accounts of what occurred, and because excessive force cases such as this are exceedingly fact intensive, the issue of whether Whitted violated Schaefer's Fourth Amendment rights is not appropriate for adjudication on a motion to dismiss.") Rakestrau v. Neustrom, No. 11–CV–1762, 2013 WL 1452030, *8-*11 (W.D. La. Apr. 8, 2013) ("As set forth more fully below, it is possible for an excessive force constitutional violation to arise in certain circumstances when a taser is used. This Court finds there exists a material issue of fact in dispute regarding the reasonableness of Guidry's conduct as to the second taser discharge which precludes summary judgment on the issue of whether excessive force was used, and therefore, whether there was a constitutional violation. However, that does not preclude consideration of the qualified immunity defense as this defense is distinct from the merits of an excessive force claim. . . . Since this Court cannot conclude as a matter of law whether a constitutional right was violated, the analysis must turn to whether Guidry's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of his actions. . . .In Williams v. City of Cleveland, Ms. 2012 WL 3614418 (N.D.Miss.8/21/2012), the court collected the case law on a national basis along with some outside sources pertaining to the use of tasers. The jurisprudence addressing taser use in excessive force claims generally falls into two categories. The first involves individuals over whom officers have not obtained control and are tasered while actively resisting arrest by physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers. [footnote collecting cases] In such cases courts conclude either that no constitutional violation occurred, or that the right not to be tasered while resisting arrest was not clearly established at the time of the incident thus entitling the officer to qualified immunity. The cases from the Fifth Circuit follow the same pattern. [citing cases] Many courts, including the Fifth Circuit, have upheld the use of even deadly force by police officers when suspects refuse to obey commands regarding the placement of their hands. . . This includes the use of taser guns and pepper spray. . .The second group involves a law enforcement official tasering an individual who had done nothing to resist arrest or was already detained and had been subdued. [footnote collecting cases] In the second group, courts have almost uniformly held that a § 1983 excessive force claim is available and this circuit is consistent in that regard as well. [citing cases] It is clear that the use of tasers in general is not objectively unreasonable, even where multiple discharges occur. It is not as clear when the use of tasers is objectively unreasonable in a specific context although one could possibly draw some conclusions from the jurisprudence cited. . . . The severity of the crime at the time was unknown to Guidry beyond the reasonable suspicion of a drug transaction. Depending upon the drug involved, and the amount involved, the crime could have been a felony or a misdemeanor. Rakestrau could have been in possession of a deadly weapon. In hindsight only, it was learned Rakestrau was in possession of a small amount of marijuana. It was Rakestrau's conduct which escalated events from a request for identification, to Guidry's use of soft hands to gain compliance, and when that failed, to Guidry's use of hard hands. When that failed, and Rakestrau appeared to be in a state to either fight or flee, Guidry deployed the taser. Four seconds after the cycle stopped, (1) after having been involved in an altercation with an individual larger than he, (2) who resisted being questioned or searched, (3) who still had not been searched for a weapon (4) whose hands were not visible and (5) with no backup present, Guidry decided to deploy the taser a second time. Guidry testified that Rakestrau moved and his hands were still under him (a fact that is somewhat contradicted by the eyewitnesses). It would not be plain to every reasonable officer that the use of the taser again was unlawful under these circumstances unless it was clear that Rakestrau was completely subdued, and therefore, not a flight risk, a threat to the safety of Guidry or capable of resisting arrest. This is particularly so given the language of the LPSO policy that 'additional discharges may be used to gain compliance.' Based on the information available from the video which this Court has viewed numerous times, this Court cannot conclude that none of the Graham factors was plainly present. . . . While the nine second cycle is troubling to this Court, given the conditions at the moment, when a five second cycle would have been the minimum, this Court cannot say that the additional four seconds, while perhaps constituting excessive force, violated clearly established law such that 'every reasonable official would have understood' Guidry's nine second discharge violated Rakestrau's right to be free from excessive force. Therefore, Guidry is entitled to qualified immunity and the claims against him in his individual capacity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 must be dismissed.")

Buchanan v. Gulfport Police Dept., No. 1:08CV1299LG–RHW, 2012 WL 1906523, at *9-*11 (S.D. Miss. May 25, 2012) ("Excessive force cases based on tasing a suspect or detainee seem to divide themselves fairly neatly into two categories: (1) those that occur prior to the officers' obtaining control over a suspect, and (2) those that occur after a suspect has been subdued. In the second category, courts have almost uniformly concluded that tasing constitutes excessive force. In the first category, where the suspect is resisting arrest or disobeying the officers' orders, tasing may not be considered excessive force. [collecting cases] Given the circumstances of this case, where Buchanan was initially non-compliant, where he was warned that he would be tased if he did not put the bat down, where he ultimately put his baseball bat on the ground, but refused to move out of reach of it, where the officers were in relatively close proximity to Buchanan and had reason to be concerned about his access to a weapon, and where the officers ultimately believed that he was reaching for the bat, this Court is of the opinion that no reasonable juror could find that the use of tasers constituted excessive force. . . . Even if the tasing amounted to excessive force, Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity if their action did not violate clearly established law. . . . This event occurred in July 2007. This Court cannot identify any controlling precedent existing at that time that had held that use of a taser on a non-compliant suspect who has not been subdued, and whom police believe is reaching for a weapon, amounts to excessive force. Other jurisdictions reviewing this issue in similar time frames have reached the same result. [collecting cases] In fact, the Court has not found any precedent at all that would clearly establish that the use of tasers on Buchanan amounted to excessive force in this situation.")

Ramos v. Lucio, No. B-08-122, 2009 WL 700635, at *7 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 17, 2009) ("This Court concludes that, in light of the medical evidence presented in this case as well as the current state of the medical research, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether it is improper to hog-tie a suspect suffering from cocaine psychosis. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the officers were ever on notice that hog-tying posed a serious danger of substantial bodily harm or death. . . While the Fifth Circuit noted in Gutierrez that 'San Diego mailed copies of the San Diego Study to police departments around the nation ... in 1992,' there is no evidence in this case that the Cameron County Sheriffs Department received a copy nor that the individual officers would have received that information sixteen years later. . . Even if they did receive a copy, a study is not 'clearly established law.'").

Broussard v. Louisiana State Police, CIV A 05-0574, 2006 WL 3375398, at *6 & n.4 (W.D. La. Nov. 20, 2006) ("Defendants contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because McFarland was in danger of death or serious bodily injury, and it was certainly not 'clear to a reasonable officer that [the] conduct [of Woodard] was unlawful in the situation [he] faced.' Defendants point out that Plaintiff's vehicle was in such close proximity to McFarland's vehicle, a fragment of glass from his headlight landed on the hood of McFarland's car after Woodard's first shot. While Plaintiff has testified by affidavit that he did not intend to hit any vehicle and that he did not point his vehicle at any of the officers' vehicles, Defendants argue that his testimony cannot raise a genuine issue of material fact when he was admittedly high on crack cocaine at the time of the pursuit. In support of their argument, Defendants have cited to Brosseau and suggested that, like the officer in that case, it was not clear to Woodard that he was violating Plaintiff's constitutional rights. The Court disagrees. First, as pointed out by Plaintiff, this case is distinguishable from Brosseau because there are disputed issues of fact. At the summary judgment stage, even under the qualified immunity standard, the Court is required to view those facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. . . . If a jury were to believe Plaintiff's version of events, then Woodard was faced with the following situation: whether to use deadly force to seize a suspect who had possibly committed a misdemeanor traffic offense by having an expired temporary tag, fled from an officer in a chase that did not exceed the speed limit, was not endangering any civilians at the time of the shooting, was not endangering any officers, and with no information that the suspect was armed or otherwise dangerous. Under these circumstances, it is clear, under Garner and Graham, that Woodard's decision to use deadly force was a violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights, and he is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . Even if Brosseau were applied, the facts in this case are distinguishable from the 'hazy' situation faced by officer Brosseau: (1) officers had no knowledge that Plaintiff was a convicted or 'disturbed' felon or had any outstanding warrants, (2) officers did not believe Plaintiff to be armed (and he was not), (3) no civilians were present or in potential danger, and (4) no officers were on foot or unaccounted for. Similarly, if this case required particularized review, the Court's consideration of the case law available at the time of the incident shows that Woodard's actions were a clear violation of Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right. See, e.g., Vaughn v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323 (11th Cir.2003); Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (3rd Cir.1999); McCaslin v. Wilkins, 183 F.3d 775 (6th Cir.1999). In each of these cases, the circuit courts denied summary judgment, and, at least in Vaughn and McCaslin, the suspect's conduct was more egregious than that of Plaintiff. In reaching this conclusion, the Court expresses no opinion as to whether Plaintiff's version of events will be found credible by the jury, only that Plaintiff has raised sufficient issues of fact for trial. Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment on the Section 1983 claims against Woodard is DENIED.").

Brown v. Faison, No. Civ.A. 6:04-CV-016-C, 2005 WL 473681, at *6, *7 & n.12 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 1, 2005) (not reported) ("The greater the uncertainties of the situation, the greater the tolerance the general standard allows for reasonable mistakes about what is lawful. However, 'qualified immunity is not appropriate when the Graham analysis yields an answer that is clear beyond all reasonable doubt.'. . This Court is of the opinion that this general standard alone, without greater particularity, is sufficient to put a reasonable officer on notice that he may not use anything greater than minimal force to arrest an individual for a minor crime, where that individual is not resisting arrest and poses no threat of danger to the officer or anyone else at the time the force is applied. . . Under these circumstances and in a situation that is not otherwise 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving,' which describes the facts of the instant case when viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, no factor exists that would move the calculus of reasonableness into the hazy border area between excessive and acceptable force. . . Rather, in such a situation the general standard is sufficient to give fair and clear warning that the only appropriate level of force is none at all or a very minimal degree at most. Even though Faison's actions were within the bounds of reasonable conduct when he reached into Plaintiff's car and placed his hands on her to effect the arrest, no reasonable officer could possibly believe that, under the circumstances alleged, he possessed the lawful authority to hit her in the face, kick her leg, and grab her arms tight enough to cause bruising. If we accept Plaintiff's allegations regarding Faison's use of force in the face of no resistance, then this Court must conclude that Faison's actions were not those that a reasonable officer would have believed were lawful. . . . Despite Faison's contention that 'in the heat of the moment,' Plaintiff could have reached for a concealed weapon (even though one did not exist), nothing in the situation as even he alleges it developed would indicate that it was objectively reasonable to believe such an occurrence was likely. From the perspective of Plaintiff's allegations, the tenseness of the situation appears to be largely Faison's creation, and not the result of her actions. While this Court is not crediting Plaintiff's allegations for any purpose other than the creation of a material fact issue, the Court is reluctant to throw the mantle of qualified immunity over an officer's actions, where those actions may be the unilateral cause of a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation. Based on Plaintiff's allegations, the situation was far from that 'hazy border' where reasonable officers might disagree about the line between excessive and necessary force or about what particular force might be lawful under clearly established case law. . . . However, this Court does not need to rest its opinion on the general standard alone. At the level of greater particularity, the Fifth Circuit has sustained a jury's determination that an officer acted unreasonably and with excessive force against a woman who did not resist and did not pose any threat, when, after pursuing and stopping her for avoiding a checkpoint, the officer injured the woman by grabbing her by the arm, yanking her from her car, and spinning her around, causing her injury. Brown v. Bryan County, Okla., 67 F.3d 1174, 1179-80 (5th Cir.1995), vacated on municipal liability but not qualified immunity grounds, Bd. of County Comm'rs of Bryan County, Okla. v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397, 117 S.Ct. 1382, 137 L.Ed.2d 626 (1997). . . Other circuit courts had reached similar conclusions at the time Faison is alleged to have acted unreasonably. [citing cases] Quite simply, the general standard regarding reasonable force, as well as the particular holdings of cases from this and other circuits, was sufficient at the time of the alleged incident to put Faison on notice that his conduct, when viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, was not lawful.").

Barlow v. Owens, No. Civ.A. G-04-557, 2005 WL 1719699, at 4-6 (S.D. Tex. July 22, 2005) ("Although the Court believes that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, in part because of the difficult standard a plaintiff must meet to overcome that immunity, the Court does respectfully note two serious systemic apprehensions about this case. First, the Court has noticed an escalating series of allegations in both the press and the filings in this Court revolving around claims of local police brutality and insensitivity. The Court certainly cannot decide this case on that basis, but as the local federal tribunal, the Court feels that it is important to bring to the attention of the Galveston Police Department the need for sensitivity and training in these areas. . . . Should it become evident that a widespread pattern of abuse of the power to effect warrantless arrests for misdemeanors exists, that would undermine part of the factual basis for the Lago Vista decision. . . . The Court's second concern is a broader apprehension about the rapidly burgeoning judicial sanction of warrantless searches and seizures. . . This is only the Court's respectful opinion, because the Court understands that unlike the Courts of Appeal or Congress, it is not a policy-making organ. However, the Court wants to note that judicial sanction of searches and seizures based entirely on a perceived need for strict law enforcement, rather than on constitutional principles, is the first step down the slippery slope to a police state, and this is especially true in circumstances of wide apprehensions arising from acts of terror. Precedent is often created by cases in which police have had to deal with obnoxious and genuinely criminal citizens, but by deciding these cases without reference to the broader picture of a generally law-abiding populace deserving of constitutional protection creates an environment in which real abuse can occur. We live in a seriously troubled world, and the easy response to threats of violence and crime is to erode rights in an attempt to find safety. In the end, however, a heavy-handed approach only results in our loss of both. This case is a good illustration of the Court's concerns. By looking at the events step by step, the Court can trace the chain of legal (or at least arguably legal) behavior by Defendants, and this is all that is required to establish qualified immunity. At first glance, though, it seems absurd that a neighbor's report of some obnoxious but non-violent behavior by a teenage boy would result in such a violent arrest. . . Defendants have not pointed to any fact showing that they believed Moncebaiz constituted a genuine physical danger to themselves or others, at least until they tried to arrest him. Moncebaiz retreated to what was, for him, his home-he had nowhere else to go. A community needs police officers who zealously pursue criminals and suspected criminals. However, those officers should remember that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land; it is their duty to uphold that law as much as it is their duty to uphold laws against trespassing and disturbing the peace. If they fail to obey the law set forth in the Constitution, they are no better than the criminals they pursue. . . . The public must be able to trust the police to abide by the law and to respect the constitutional rights of all citizens. The Bill of Rights is no safeguard if the government and its agents choose to ignore it. Therefore, while the Court finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's § 1983 claims, the Court urges Defendants and the Galveston Police Department to give thoughtful consideration to their ever-present obligation to uphold the Constitution and to protect the rights of all citizens.")

Ham v. Tucker, No. SA-01-CA-0837-RF, 2005 WL 356836, at *3, *5 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 31, 2005)(not reported) ("The incident before this Court occurred in September 1999, but the state of case law regarding excessive force was virtually identical to that which the Supreme Court had found to be unclear. As a result, this Court's earlier resolution of the qualified immunity question before it on Defendants' motion for summary judgment reflected this lack of clarity. Since 'the focus [in qualified immunity] is on whether the officer had fair notice that her conduct was unlawful,'. . . the Supreme Court's decision in Brosseau warrants a second review of Defendant Tucker's motion for summary judgment. . . . Under Brosseau then, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident in question that Deputy Tucker's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Since the focus is on whether Tucker had fair notice that his conduct was unlawful and the existing case law did not provide this notice, the Court is constrained to conclude that he did not have notice that his conduct violated the Constitution. . . The defense of qualified immunity thus shields Deputy Tucker from suit under the Fourth Amendment because he made a decision that, even if constitutionally deficient, reasonably misapprehended the law governing the situation with Ham that confronted him on the day in question. . . As a result, Deputy Tucker is entitled to a defense of qualified immunity and the Court hereby reconsiders its earlier denial of summary judgment on this point. As a result, the Court will grant Defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims against Deputy Tucker.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Burghardt v. Ryan, No. 21-3906, 2022 WL 1773420, at *2 (6th Cir. June 1, 2022) (not reported) ("Here, Beard and Burghardt cite various cases in which we held that officers who shot at a fleeing vehicle had used unreasonable force. See Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 773–775 (6th Cir. 2005); Godawa v. Byrd, 798 F.3d 457, 466 (6th Cir. 2015); Latits v. Phillips, 878 F.3d 541, 548 (6th Cir. 2017). But in those cases the suspect's car had already passed by the officers when they opened fire. . . Here, as the back end of the van struck Ryan's cruiser, the officers had good reason to think that the van would pull forward again. And if it did so the van could have struck any of the officers—including East, who stood in the van's plausible escape route. That makes this case different from Godawa, for example, where the car physically could not have struck the officer when he fired. . . And that makes this case more like Williams v. City of Grosse Pointe Park, where the officers fired when the vehicle still could have struck them. . . That the van had already passed by the officers when they fired is not dispositive here; what matters is that it remained a threat to strike any of them when they opened fire. . . Thus, at the time of this shooting, no case from this court or the Supreme Court made clear that, under these circumstances, the officers could not open fire. Qualified immunity therefore protects Ryan and London as to the federal claims.")

Gordon v. Bierenga, 20 F.4th 1077, 1082-85 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Here, we begin and end with the second prong. Even when a defendant violates a plaintiff's constitutional rights, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless the right at issue was 'clearly established[.]'. . . The inquiry depends on the specific facts of the case and their similarity to caselaw in existence at the time of the alleged violation. . . Such specificity is 'especially important' in the Fourth Amendment excessive force context, because 'it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . . In this case, although it is a close call, no existing precedent '"squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.' . . The 'critical question' in cases involving use of deadly force during vehicular flight is 'whether the officer has "reason to believe that the [fleeing] car presents an imminent danger" to "officers and members of the public in the area."'. . Deadly force is justified against 'a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car.'. . Deadly force is generally not justified 'once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety[,]' but an officer may 'continue to fire at a fleeing vehicle even when no one is in the vehicle's direct path when "the officer's prior interactions with the driver suggest that the driver will continue to endanger others with his car."'. . Thus, in evaluating the reasonableness of deadly force in the context of a fleeing driver, we must look both to whether anyone was in the car's immediate path at the time of the shooting and to the officer's prior interactions with the driver that show potential for 'imminent danger to other officers or members of the public in the area' if the driver is permitted to continue fleeing. . . We have held, in several cases, 'that deadly force was objectively unreasonable when the officer was to the side of the moving car or the car had already passed by him—taking the officer out of harm's way—when the officer shot the driver.'[citing cases] However, none of those cases contained facts similar enough to this case such that 'every reasonable official' in Bierenga's position would have been on notice that his conduct violated Gordon's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Here, like in Latits, the video from the White Castle drive-thru permits an interpretation that Bierenga fired four shots at Gordon after Gordon's car 'had passed the point where it could harm him,' such that Bierenga 'had time to realize he was no longer in immediate danger.'. . But the driver's conduct prior to the moments of the shooting in Latits are not close enough to the facts here such that every reasonable officer in Bierenga's position would be on notice that shooting Gordon, rather than permitting Gordon to continue to flee and potentially endanger the public, would violate Gordon's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Crucial to our analysis in Latits was that the 'chase occurred under circumstances in which risk to the public was relatively low.'. . The driver fled, in the dead of night, on 'a large, effectively empty highway surrounded by non-populated areas (a cemetery and vacant state fairgrounds), passing no pedestrians, cyclists, or motorists besides the police trailing him.'. . Furthermore, the driver in Latits 'had shown no intention or willingness to drive recklessly through residential neighborhoods.'. .The circumstances of Gordon's flight are different. Gordon fled from Bierenga during rush hour in the middle of a major road in a populated Detroit suburb, adjacent to residential neighborhoods and businesses. Bierenga observed Gordon make a reckless left turn in the face of oncoming traffic near a busy intersection to escape from Bierenga, causing oncoming cars to brake to avoid colliding with Gordon as he turned into the White Castle parking lot. Several cars were parked in the parking lot. Multiple patrons and employees were inside. What's more, after Bierenga later blocked in Gordon at the drive-thru window, Gordon reversed into the occupied vehicle behind him before accelerating forward and hitting Bierenga's police vehicle. Although Gordon's contact with those vehicles occurred at a relatively low speed, his conduct showed a willingness to strike both police and civilian vehicles to effectuate his escape from police. Given the time and place at which it occurred, Gordon's reckless driving posed a materially higher risk of harm to the surrounding public than the reckless driving in Latits. . . Thus, Latits did not 'clearly establish' that using lethal force in the specific scenario Bierenga confronted was unconstitutional. . . .In this case, unlike in Cupp or Sigley, a reasonable officer in Bierenga's position had at least some suggestion that Gordon 'pose[d] more than a fleeting threat' to the surrounding public. . . While Cupp and Sigley are similar to this case in that they 'involved officers confronting a car in a parking lot and shooting the non-violent driver as he attempted to initiate flight[,]' . . . neither case involved reckless flight from a traffic stop in a crowded area prior to the shooting, or the striking of both civilian and police vehicles in an attempt to flee. To be sure, Gordon's reckless driving did not demonstrate an 'obvious willingness to endanger the public by leading the police on chases at very high speeds and through active traffic.'. . But that is what makes this such a close case. On one hand, Gordon's reckless flight did not rise to level of that in cases like Plumhoff and Freland. On the other hand, Gordon's reckless flight posed a materially higher risk to the public than the driver in Latits. Thus, stuck on this 'hazy border[ ] between excessive and acceptable force,' we cannot say that 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.' Rivas-Villegas, 142 S. Ct. at 7–9 (citations omitted). In sum, the estate cannot point to a case that meets the requisite level of 'specificity' to clearly establish that it was unlawful for Bierenga to shoot Gordon in this factual scenario. . . Thus, Bierenga is entitled to qualified immunity.") Tucker v. Marquette County, Michigan, No. 20-1878, 2021 WL 2828027, at *2-4 (6th Cir. July 7, 2021) (not reported) ("The district court granted summary judgment to Romback on qualified-immunity grounds. Romback is entitled to qualified immunity either if he did not violate a constitutional right or if the right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . We can begin with either prong. . . Like the district court, we begin (and end) with the first. . . . To begin, there are no disputes of material fact preventing summary judgment. Romback's bodycam video provides a clear picture of what happened save for two things: whether, when Romback shot him, Tucker had his hand near the trigger area of the gun or on its butt; and whether the gun was resting on the floor. We construe both in the light most favorable to Tucker's estate. . . But even so construed, Romback's actions were reasonable based on all the circumstances. Romback was confronted by a potentially suicidal man who did not want Romback in his home. . . . Tucker was clearly angry and confrontational, and he did not want Romback there. When it became clear to Tucker that Romback would not leave after Romback called to check on the status of his backup, he went into another room and picked up a shotgun. He briefly pointed the muzzle of the gun at Romback when he swung it to his side. Then, repeatedly ignoring Romback's commands of 'don't' and 'put it down,' Tucker yelled for Romback to shoot him as he moved forward slowly and waived his free arm wildly. All told, Romback faced an agitated, potentially suicidal man who was closing the already short distance between them, ignoring commands, and holding a shotgun, all the while yelling for Romback to shoot him. Based on the totality of those circumstances, and consistent with our caselaw, it was reasonable for Romback to use deadly force. He had probable cause to believe that he faced an immediate threat to his safety, especially considering the deference owed to his on-the-spot judgment. . . Like the officers in Thomas, Livermore, and Thornton, Romback did not have to wait for Tucker to aim his gun. Tucker's estate resists that conclusion, arguing that this case is different for two main reasons: first, because Tucker's hand was not on the trigger of the gun, he could not quickly have aimed it at Romback; and second, because Romback already had his gun pointed at Tucker, he could pull the trigger quicker than Tucker if Tucker did take aim. Neither of those arguments, both made with the benefit of hindsight, renders Romback's actions unreasonable. The extra time that it would have taken for Tucker to move his hand to the trigger before taking aim does not mean that he could not 'have easily and quickly transformed' his deadly threat into deadly action. . . And Romback was not required to bet on having a quicker trigger finger than Tucker just because he already had his gun aimed. . . The Fourth Amendment does not require an officer to make that gamble. In a similar vein, Tucker's estate argues that, because Tucker's gun was not pointed at Romback, our cases require the reasonableness question to go to a jury. But the cases on which the estate relies had disputes of material fact as to whether a suspect aimed a gun at the officers or posed no serious threat at all. . . Importantly, in those cases, the totality of the circumstances—assuming the gun was not aimed at the officers—was insufficient to have clearly posed a threat of harm. For example, in King, officers shot a suspect, who had allegedly made threats earlier in the day, after they found him sleeping on a couch in his house. . . From outside the house, the officers woke him by announcing their presence and then shot him through the window after they claimed he pointed a gun at them. . . But the forensic evidence suggested that the suspect did not in fact point the gun at the officers. . . If that were so, then the officers would have shot a man who simply had a gun; the surrounding circumstances added little to the threat he posed. But that is not the case here. Instead, just as in Thomas, Livermore, and Thornton, the totality of the circumstances present here—including the close surroundings, Tucker's steps toward Romback, him ignoring Romback's commands, his angry or threatening statements and unpredictable gesticulation, and his potential ability to aim the gun quickly, among others—made the threat such that the use of deadly force was reasonable. And, just as in those cases, we can resolve the legal question of reasonableness.")

Jordan v. Howard, 987 F.3d 537, 543-44, 547-48 (6th Cir. 2021) ("The record here demonstrates the defendant officers' use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. Three of the four officers surrounding McShann's vehicle testified that when McShann woke, he was compliant or mostly compliant with their order that he put his hands up. (Officer O'Neal testified that he was not sure whether McShann put his hands up.) But then, after looking back and forth at the officers surrounding the vehicle for a few seconds, all four officers testified that McShann grabbed his gun. At this point, Officer Howard perceived a serious and deadly threat to himself and his fellow officers and took aim at McShann's 'center mass'—necessarily taking his vision away from the gun itself. While that process was playing out, the other three officers agree that McShann 'swung'

the gun towards Officer Knight at the driver-side window. Officer Knight testified that he feared for his safety once McShann swung the gun towards him. At that point, both Officers Knight and Howard used deadly force. Given these unrebutted facts, we conclude that both Officers Howard and Knight acted reasonably to stop a serious threat of deadly force, and the district court correctly granted them qualified immunity. In other words, when an initially compliant suspect stops following officer commands and instead grabs a readily accessible firearm, an officer 'need not wait for [the] suspect to open fire on him ... before the officer may fire back.'. . .' Time and time again, we have rejected Fourth Amendment claims ... when the officers used deadly force only after the suspects had aimed their guns at the officers or others.' Presnall, 657 F. App'x at 512 (collecting cases). The uncontroverted evidence here leads to the same result.") Jordan v. Howard, 987 F.3d 537, 548, 553, 555 (6th Cir. 2021) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("Plaintiff Sabrina Jordan's expert report, in conjunction with the officers' testimony and the autopsy report, established a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Jamarco Dewayne McShann held or pointed a firearm at the officers at the time that the officers shot him. When officers use deadly force against an individual, they are only entitled to qualified immunity where there is no genuine dispute of material fact that the officers had probable cause to believe that the individual posed 'a threat of serious physical harm.'. . In the present case, there is a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether McShann posed a serious threat of physical harm to the officers: the mere presence of a firearm next to McShann in an open carry state while he was in a locked vehicle would not pose an immediate threat of safety to the officers—who surrounded McShann's vehicle while holding firearms and a ballistic shield. In view of the conflicting testimony and credibility issues, the district court erred when it found no genuine dispute of material fact as to whether McShann held or pointed a gun at the officers and determined that Defendants were entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. I would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment and remand the case for further proceedings. . . . The district court also erred by finding that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity for their use of deadly force in this case. . . .For purposes of the present case, Garner clearly established that the use of deadly force without probable cause to believe that the individual posed a threat of serious physical harm is constitutionally unreasonable. . . And in King, we stated that '[i]t has been clearly established in this circuit for some time that "individuals have a right not to be shot unless they are perceived as posing a threat to officers or others.". .' 694 F.3d at 664 (quoting Ciminillo v. Streicher, 434 F.3d 461, 468 (6th Cir. 2006)). In that case, we held that the district court erred in granting summary judgment based on qualified immunity because there was a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the defendant pointed a gun at the officers before being shot. . . We reasoned that if he had not pointed the gun at the officers, then his clearly established right to be free of deadly force would have been violated. . . We also determined in Bletz v. Gribble that 'if genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the officer committed acts that would violate a clearly established right, then summary judgment is improper.'. . Similarly, in the present case, assuming that McShann did not hold or point the gun at the officers, Howard and Knight violated McShann's clearly established right to be free from deadly force—McShann not having posed a threat of physical harm to the officers based on the officers' reasonable belief. For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent and would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Defendants and remand the case for further proceedings.")

Whitehead v. Washington County, Tennessee, No. 19-6246, 2020 WL 6386592, at *1 (6th Cir. Oct. 29, 2020) (not reported) ("Fourth Amendment excessive force claims are analyzed under the objective reasonableness standard, which asks whether the seizure was justified under the totality of the circumstances. . . Courts consider 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . They examine the propriety of the use of force 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. .The court does not consider whether poor planning or bad tactics created circumstances that led to the use of force. Reich v. City of Elizabethtown, 945 F.3d 968, 978 (6th Cir. 2019), [cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 359 (2020)]. The focus is on the moments just before the use of force.")

Hicks v. Scott, 958 F.3d 421, 435-37 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Because Scott's use of deadly force was an objectively reasonable response to having a rifle pointed at her face from five feet away, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Scott. . . . Here, there is no genuine dispute that Quandavier pointed his rifle directly at Scott in the moments before he was shot. . . .Here, the longest estimation of the entire encounter was '[t]wo to three seconds, at most.'. . Thus, even if Quandavier had been disarmed at some point during the encounter, it would still have been reasonable for Scott to act on her initial perception of a threat. Finally, Hicks argues that Scott's use of deadly force was unreasonable because she placed herself in harm's way and then failed to warn Quandavier before firing. Hicks has a point: Scott may have been negligent or worse in creating the situation when she entered the apartment and failed to announce herself. Under the 'segmented analysis' employed by this court, however, '[w]e do not scrutinize whether it was reasonable for the officer to create the circumstances.'. . Instead, the only inquiry that matters is whether, in the 'moment' before using deadly force, an officer reasonably perceived an immediate threat to her safety. . . Here, as already discussed, Scott reasonably perceived such a threat. And it is for this same reason that Scott was not required to give a warning. When the 'hesitation involved in giving a warning could readily cause such a warning to be [the officer's] last,' then a warning is not feasible. . . It was not feasible for Scott—unexpectedly confronted with the barrel of a rifle from five feet away—to give a warning before firing her weapon. . . Accordingly, because the district court properly found that Scott's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable, we affirm the court's grant of qualified immunity to Scott.")

Reich v. City of Elizabethtown, Kentucky, 945 F.3d 968, 978-80, 982 (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 359 (2020) ("Our precedents . . . refine our view by requiring that we analyze excessive force claims in segments. . . This approach requires us to evaluate the use of force by focusing 'on the "split-second judgment" made immediately before the officer used allegedly excessive force,' not on the poor planning or bad tactics that might have 'created the circumstances' that led to the use of force. . . We thus need not engage Reich's argument that the officers created the need to use deadly force by pursuing and initiating contact with Blough despite his mental illness. Even were we to consider that argument, Supreme Court precedent suggests that it should not change our answer. . . Nor do we find persuasive Reich's citation to Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893 (6th Cir. 2004), for the proposition that we should consider a person's mental illness when determining whether an officer used reasonable force. That case actually says that '[t]he diminished capacity of an unarmed detainee must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted.'. . Wielding a knife until the moment officers shot him obviates Champion here. And Reich points to 'no case law restricting an officer's ability to use deadly force when she has probable cause to believe that a mentally ill person poses an imminent threat of serious physical harm to her person[.]'. . With that foundation, our analysis focuses on the officers' final encounter with Blough. We construe the evidence and draw all reasonable inferences in Reich's favor but, because this case concerns qualified immunity, consider 'only the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers.'. . That means we put aside the numerous 911 calls from neighborhood residents describing Blough's alarming behavior and the steps each took to secure their homes and families. . . Here, applying the Graham factors, the totality of the circumstances gave the officers probable cause to believe that Blough posed a threat of serious physical harm to them and others. . .The undisputed facts show that both officers saw Blough wielding a knife, shirtless, pacing back and forth between houses in the neighborhood. . . They both knew that he had severe schizophrenia, had not been taking his medication, disliked the police, and thought 'everybody [was] out to get him.' After the officers exited their vehicles, Blough walked at a fast pace toward the officers with the knife in his right hand and refused Reich's pleas to drop the knife and return to her vehicle. Both officers stayed near their vehicles, never moving toward Blough. When both officers then commanded—at least once each—that Blough drop the knife, he again did not. Instead, Blough 'took a step forward toward' Richardson with his knife raised in his right hand in a stabbing position and said, 'you're gonna have to kill me mother * * * *er.' That prompted officers to fire three rapid shots in a single volley—the first two by Richardson, the last by McMillen—with Blough having advanced within six to twelve feet of Officer Richardson. Reich claims that Blough 'turned around' and took 'one or two steps' before the officers fired, and thus posed no threat to anyone at the time the officers fired. Absent Blough's step away, our precedents provide a clear answer. . . . But even including Reich's view that Blough 'step[ped] away' in the story, the officers' conduct was still objectively reasonable—Blough had just told Officer Richardson 'you're going to have to kill me mother * * * *er,' refused repeated commands to drop his weapon, and advanced within six to twelve feet of Richardson with the knife raised in a stabbing position. . .Yes, in addition to the bullet that grazed Blough's forearm and entered his 'lower right chest,' one bullet entered Blough's 'upper right back.' But the officers fired from different spots, and Blough approached Officer Richardson 'at a slight angle' with his body 'bladed a little bit,' not with his shoulders square to the officers. . . Taken as a whole, this record cannot support the inference Reich wishes us to draw—that the officers shot despite Blough posing no imminent threat at the time. . . . Reading Sova and Studdard would not impress upon every reasonable officer the clear understanding that it is illegal to shoot someone behaving like Blough if that person is twenty-five feet away from one officer and thirty-six feet away from another. In the 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' circumstances of Blough's encounter with Officers Richardson and McMillen, reasonable minds could deny that twenty feet made the difference between a legal use of deadly force and an illegal one. . . Thus, for the same reasons the officers did not violate constitutional law by shooting Blough if he was five feet away, they did not violate clear constitutional law by shooting Blough if he was twenty-five to thirty-six feet away. No legal principle 'clearly prohibit[ed]' the use of deadly force 'in the particular circumstances before [the officers].'. . And it was not 'plainly incompetent' for the officers to consider Blough a threat.")

Reich v. City of Elizabethtown, Kentucky, 945 F.3d 968, 984, 990-91 (6th Cir. 2019) (Moore, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 359 (2020) ("The majority paints a distressing picture, one in which Officers Richardson and McMillen shot and killed Joshua Blough because he was a 'knife-wielding belligerent' 'advanc[ing] toward them with his knife hand raised in a stabbing position,' and screaming obscenities like 'you're gonna have to kill me mother * * * *er.'. . If the record supported that picture—and that picture alone—I might agree with my colleagues that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. The problem, however, is that the record is not amenable to such a one-sided rendering. Rather, as I see it, there are two sides to this story: the officers' view—which the majority details with great care—and Elizabeth Reich's view—which the majority sweeps under the rug. And, as Reich tells it, Officers Richardson and McMillen shot and killed her fiancée, Blough, right in front of her, (a) while Blough was standing 20 to 30 feet away from the officers and Reich, and (b) while Blough was turning to run away from the officers. Accepting Reich's narrative as true, as we must at this stage of litigation, any reasonable police officer should have known that shooting Blough violated clearly established Sixth Circuit law. See Studdard v. Shelby County, 934 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 2019); Sova v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 142 F.3d 898 (6th Cir. 1998). Accordingly, in my view, qualified immunity does not protect Officers Richardson and McMillen; this case should be going to trial. . . . Even acknowledging the 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' nature of Defendants' encounter with Blough, and the challenges of evaluating police conduct with 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight,'. . . if there was a genuine dispute of material fact in Sova and Studdard as to whether the suicidal, knife-wielding decedent posed a 'threat of serious physical harm' to the surrounding public, such that deadly force was justified, surely there is a triable dispute here. If anything, Reich's testimony that Defendants essentially shot Blough in the back, as he turned to run away, makes the officers' actions even more unreasonable than the actions at issue in Sova and Studdard. . . This brings me to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis—clearly established law. As the majority observes, this is a tough standard, meant to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . But it is not insurmountable. . . In my view, then, the correct question to ask for purposes of this second prong is whether, as of July 6, 2015, our law clearly established that it was unconstitutional for a police officer to shoot a non-compliant, mentally unstable person with a knife, if that person was not advancing toward another individual in the immediate area. The answer to the question is yes. In 1998—almost two decades before the shooting—Sova established that reasonable police officers do not shoot non-compliant persons brandishing knifes when they are not advancing toward another individual in the immediate area, even if the person is mentally ill, suicidal, and/or yelling threats to the officers. . . Consequently, because a reasonable juror could find that Defendants violated this clearly established law when they shot Blough, Reich has met her burden under prong two. In response, the majority claims I am trying to create a black-and-white 'strike zone rule,' where the viability of a Fourth Amendment claim rise and falls solely on the precise number of feet the decedent stood from the police at the time of the shooting. . . I am not. I am simply noting that, when confronted with a materially similar set of facts twenty years ago, we held that qualified immunity did not lie, and that, therefore, Officers Richardson and McMillen were on fair notice that qualified immunity would not protect them here either. . . Indeed, to hold otherwise is to hold Reich, and other Fourth Amendment plaintiffs like her, to an impossibly high standard, where they must dredge up a mirror-image case (that happened to arise in this circuit, and happened to result in a decision by this court) to have any hopes of surviving a qualified-immunity challenge at summary judgment. But, because history rhymes far more often than it repeats exactly, we cannot, and should not, condition a Fourth Amendment plaintiff's access to a jury trial on their meeting such an onerous burden. The majority seeing it differently, I respectfully dissent.")

Hodge v. Blount County, Tennessee, 783 F. App'x 584, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("We typically analyze excessive force cases in segments, and the officer's conduct must be reasonable at every stage. Dickerson v. McClellan, 101 F.3d 1151, 1161 (6th Cir. 1996). The facts underlying this claim can be broken into two segments: (1) Vaughn approaching Hodge's truck with his gun drawn and pointed at Hodge, and (2) Vaughn forcefully removing Hodge from the vehicle after Vaughn had holstered his weapon and opened Hodge's vehicle door. The district court held that the first segment could not support a claim for excessive force. Therefore, that segment is not at issue. As to the second segment, we find that the plaintiff has satisfied both prongs. First, the force Vaughn used when Hodge was sitting in his car was excessive under the Fourth Amendment, and second, the right to be free from such force was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Based on Giannola, Vaughn should have known that the force he used was excessive. After Vaughn holstered his firearm, he approached Hodge's truck, and for two minutes, Vaughn told Hodge to get out of his vehicle. Hodge, like Giannola, only passively resisted the officer's commands. Vaughn then violently yanked Hodge out of the vehicle, causing him to hit his head on the concrete pavement. Thus, according to the plaintiff's version of the events, Vaughn used at least as much force as did the officers in Giannola. Because we held that the force used there was excessive, a reasonable officer in Vaughn's shoes would have known that he could not violently throw Hodge to the pavement when he was sitting in a car, passively resisting verbal orders to exit the vehicle. . . . Indeed, we addressed this exact issue in Anderson v. Antal, 191 F.3d 451 (6th Cir. 1999) (unpublished table decision). In Anderson, an officer also encountered a plaintiff during a traffic stop who 'refused to get out of the car.'. . But unlike the officer in Giannola, the officer used an appropriate amount of force 'to get her out of the car.'. . . In contrast, Vaughn's conduct—violently jerking Hodge face-first into the ground—went much further, as did the officers in Giannola. Vaughn is thus not entitled to qualified immunity.") Shanaberg v. Licking County, Ohio, 936 F.3d 453, 456 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Stetson reasonably feared that Shanaberg was armed and intoxicated. Shanaberg was also verbally belligerent—yelling at the deputies and repeatedly refusing to comply with their reasonable request that he lie down on the ground, which would have placed them in a safer position as they approached to handcuff him. This made for a dangerous combination. A reasonable officer in Stetson's position would have feared that Shanaberg might react to any attempt to detain him by drawing a weapon or reaching for one. And that fear, alone, made it objectively reasonable to tase Shanaberg to end the threat to the deputies' safety. On this issue, Shanaberg argues that he had surrendered to the officers before being tased when he sank to his knees and placed his hands in the air. He cites a few cases in support of his position, see, e.g., Kent v. Oakland County, 810 F.3d 384, 391 (6th Cir. 2016); Correa v. Simone, 528 F. App'x 531, 534 (6th Cir. 2013); Thomas v. Plummer, 489 F. App'x 116, 126 (6th Cir. 2012), but we find them distinguishable. Present here, and missing in those cases, was a suspect who was reported to be armed and dangerous and who was verbally belligerent in response to reasonable requests to further officer safety by moving to a less threatening position before handcuffing.")

Shanaberg v. Licking County, Ohio, 936 F.3d 453, 458-59 (6th Cir. 2019) (Nalbandian, J., concurring in judgment) ("I agree that the district court correctly granted qualified immunity in favor of Deputy Brian Stetson. But I would grant qualified immunity for a different reason: it is not clearly established, in the context of this case, what level of verbal noncompliance, or 'verbal belligerence,' justifies a taser's use. As a result, I concur in the judgment only. . . . We have recognized that some level of verbal noncompliance alone can justify the use of a taser. When a suspect actively resists arrest, an officer can use a taser. Kent v. Oakland Cty., 810 F.3d 384, 396 (6th Cir. 2016). And we have linked verbal noncompliance with active resistance. When noncompliance is paired with a 'verbal showing of hostility,' this combination can amount to active resistance, justifying the use of a taser. Eldridge v. City of Warren, 533 F. App'x 529, 535 (6th Cir. 2013). Unfortunately, we do not have great examples of what type or level of 'verbal hostility' or 'verbal belligerence' justify the use of a taser. We have an extreme example in Caie v. West Bloomfield Twp., 485 F. App'x 92 (6th Cir. 2012). But there, the suspect's suicidal statements included that he would 'fight the officers so that they would have a reason to kill him.'. .In Eldridge, we suggested that something less could amount to active resistance if a statement, 'along with a lack of physical cooperation, demonstrated a deliberate choice to be defiant.'. . And in Correa, we again hinted that verbal hostility, in some circumstances, could justify the use of a taser. We explained that '[t]he mere possession of a gun is not, in and of itself, resistance [enough to justify the use of a taser] unless coupled with something more, such as physical or verbal action.'. . In other words, the officer's use of the taser could have been justified in Correa if the suspect was also verbally noncompliant or hostile. These cases show the problem with Shanaberg's claim: it was not clearly established what level of 'verbal belligerence' could justify the use of a taser. And to be sure, Shanaberg's conduct fell squarely within the uncertainty in our caselaw: he was a 'verbally hostile' suspect who the officers considered 'armed and dangerous.' These two factors connect what is missing in Plummer and Correa. Plummer didn't have a weapon. And Correa wasn't verbally noncompliant. But Shanaberg checked both boxes. So even though I don't believe that Shanaberg's verbal-noncompliance rose to level that justified the use of a taser, Stetson is still entitled to qualified immunity.")

Judd v. City of Baxter, Tennessee, 780 F. App'x 345, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("There are multiple cases in our circuit holding that kneeing and/or jumping on top of a subdued suspect constitutes excessive force. Although most of these cases involve police officers, not paramedics, we have held that paramedics who act in a law enforcement capacity are held to the same standard as police officers. See, e.g., Stephan v. Heinig, 676 F. App'x 466, 468 (6th Cir. 2017) (holding that the defendant paramedic 'acted reasonably by intervening, because a reasonable officer in her position would have found the intervention necessary") (emphasis added); Peete v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville., 486 F.3d 217, 220 (6th Cir. 2007) (holding that qualified immunity applied to firefighters, paramedics, and EMTs because even though qualified immunity cases normally involve police officers, "courts have held that the protection extends to actions by other government officials"). Because Judd prevails on both steps of the qualified immunity analysis, Haney is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Studdard v. Shelby County, Tennessee, 934 F.3d 478, 480-82 (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 1108 (2020) ("May police officers shoot an uncooperative individual when he presents an immediate risk to himself but not to others? No, case law makes clear. We thus affirm the district court's decision to deny the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . .As a specific matter, the officers' actions violated Sova v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 142 F.3d 898 (6th Cir. 1998). Officers faced a knife-wielding man who had gashed his arms and chest. From inside his parents' home, he told the police to go away. The officers entered a screened porch off the kitchen of the house and asked the man what he wanted. He replied that he wanted the police to shoot him. When the man moved toward the door to the porch, the officers yelled at him to drop the knife. He did not comply and instead stepped out on the porch. One officer sprayed the man with mace, forcing him back inside the house. But the man walked back to the door. When he pushed the screen door open, but while he still stood in the doorframe, the officers fired. . . On those facts, we held, a reasonable jury could find that the officers used excessive force. The two cases warrant the same outcome. Both cases involved men with knives who had cut themselves—and threatened worse to themselves. In each case, the suspects ignored commands to drop their knives. And in each case, the suspects made similar movements toward the officers just before being shot—one swaying forward from 34 feet away, one opening the screen door onto the porch where the officers stood. Sova indeed seems to be the harder case, as the officers were closer to the suspect and more at risk. That means Studdard's claim deserves resolution by a jury too.")

Fazica v. Jordan, 926 F.3d 283, 289-93 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Defendants challenge the district court's denial of summary judgment on one narrow ground, and we limit our review to that question: whether Fazica has sufficiently offered proof of each individual Defendant's alleged constitutional violations such that a reasonable jury could find him personally involved. . . We therefore address only the question of proof of Defendants' individual liability for acts that Fazica alleges amount to unconstitutional excessive force; we do not delve into whether the physical contact was in fact excessive force or whether its unconstitutionality was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Having personal involvement in or direct responsibility for the violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights does not. . . necessarily mean that each Defendant officer directly placed hands on her. There are several ways that a defendant officer may violate a pretrial detainee's constitutional rights. A plaintiff who claims that a defendant used excessive force must show that the officer '(1) actively participated in the use of excessive force, (2) supervised the officer who used excessive force, or (3) owed the victim a duty of protection against the use of excessive force.'. . . Defendants argue that because Fazica cannot clearly attribute particular uses of force to particular Defendants, she cannot prove that any particular Defendant's conduct violated her constitutional rights. . . . We reject Defendants' argument and conclude that a reasonable jury could find that each of the named Defendants violated Fazica's clearly established constitutional rights either by directly using excessive force against her or by observing others doing so and failing to act. . . . Binay, Burley, and Pershell therefore stand for the proposition that where a plaintiff who was unable to identify clearly which officers committed specific acts during the incident produces evidence that places an individual defendant in a small group of officers that committed allegedly unconstitutional acts within each other's presence, the plaintiff's claim against that defendant may survive summary judgment. . . . Defendants argue that the only reason that the court might deny qualified immunity in a case in which the plaintiff is not able conclusively to identify which officer committed which potentially unconstitutional act is 'to avoid rewarding defendants who intentionally conceal their identities.'. . Certainly, disincentivizing officers from obscuring their identities so that they may use excessive force without consequences is a valid concern. . . However, it is not the only concern. Plaintiffs who are unable to pinpoint precisely which named defendant did what, even where the defendants did not intentionally conceal their identities, still have an interest in the vindication of their constitutional rights. Section 1983 claims do not only incentivize officers' good behavior; they also compensate and achieve justice for victims. . . The victim can suffer the same unconstitutionally excessive force whether the officer intentionally hid his face or the spit hood accidentally rode up to cover the victim's eyes. Finally, whether or not the officers intended to conceal their identities, the victim must ultimately carry her burden to prove each defendant's individual liability by a preponderance of the evidence at trial. Fazica, like the plaintiffs in Binay, Burley, and Pershell, has put forth record evidence such that a reasonable jury could conclude that each of the named Defendants either violated her constitutional rights or observed his colleagues violating her constitutional rights and failed to intercede.")

Williams v. City of Chattanooga, 772 F. App'x 277, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Regardless of arrival time, each Officer responded to a 'tense [and] uncertain' situation. . . Every defendant-Officer arrived in time to see Eagle sprint toward Sergeant Churchwell with a pistol and a sword, only halting after being shot. After the first volley, Eagle continued to shift his position on the ground and Officers did not know where Eagle's pistol was at the time he stretched his arms out. The Officers had probable cause to shoot Eagle, even those arriving later in time, because they could have reasonably believed that Eagle was reaching for his gun as he was moving on the ground, consistent with his prior sprint toward Churchwell. Accordingly, the Officers' decisions to fire a second volley were not objectively unreasonable. . . Our discussion would not be complete without examination of a closely analogous, although unpublished, prior decision: Margeson v. White City, 579 F. App'x 466 (6th Cir. 2014). At issue in Margeson was whether 'the amount of force was reasonable' where officers first shot an armed man and then shot him a second time after he was unarmed. . . The officers in Margeson, acting on a bench warrant for the suspect's arrest, approached the suspect's house with the knowledge that the suspect was armed and willing to shoot at the police. . . The suspect met the officers with rifle in hand and refused to comply with their commands to drop the weapon. . . The officers then fired at the suspect. . . After the first shot, according to the officers, the suspect dropped his rifle and then reached for a pistol. . . The plaintiff denied that the suspect had reached for a pistol, and instead claimed that the officers continued to fire upon an unarmed man who no longer posed a threat after the first volley. . . Although the record was unclear as to the timing between the two volleys—and even whether there were more than two volleys—this court reasoned that denying summary judgment to the police was appropriate because 'a jury could reasonably infer that [the suspect] became incapacitated, and was therefore unable to pose a threat after having been shot with the first few bullets.'. . Margeson illustrates circumstances in which a jury could find that police officers did not have a reasonable basis to continue firing upon the suspect even though, according to the officers' version of events, the suspect was reaching for a firearm after being shot the first time. Unlike in Boyd, 215 F.3d at 603-04, where this court held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity for firing additional shots at the already-wounded decedent who was reaching for his gun, and in Pollard, 780 F.3d at 400, 404, where this court held that there was probable cause to shoot the decedent a second time when he pointed his hands in the shape of a gun at the officers, in Margeson, there was an evidentiary basis for the jury to find no probable cause to shoot the suspect a second time because, under the Margeson plaintiff's version of events, the suspect could not move after he was first shot, 579 F. App'x at 472. Summary judgment for the officers in Margeson, therefore, was inappropriate. There are similarities between the present case and Margeson. However, Margeson is distinguishable because even under Williams's narrative of events, Eagle continued to move his position while the gun and sword, though their precise location was unknown, remained within Eagle's reach. The facts in this case, therefore, align more with Pollard and Boyd. Even accepting Plaintiff's version of events, the officers (similar to the officers' situation in Pollard) had probable cause to shoot a second time, and at the very least, the Officers (as in Boyd) had qualified immunity.") Clemons v. Couch, 768 F. App'x 432, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he ultimate question under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis is whether Sergeant Armstead's use of deadly force against William was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. . . We find that it was. . . . Lemmon Sr.'s main argument is that Sergeant Armstead's use of force was unreasonable because William 'placed his hand in his waistband and never removed it or attempted to do so prior to being shot.' . . Although this fact is undisputed by both parties, Sergeant Armstead does not claim that he utilized deadly force against William solely because William's hand was in his waistband and William was being defiant. Instead, he claims that the totality of the circumstances, which include William being a suspect in an armed robbery, daring officers to shoot him, dropping the bike, and suddenly moving in Sergeant Armstead's direction while possibly being armed, are what ultimately caused him to fear for his life. Accordingly, Lemmon Sr. has not come forward with any evidence that rebuts the evidence in the record and has not made any showing that there is a genuine issue for trial regarding the reasonableness of Sergeant Armstead's use of force. . . . Regardless of whether the Terry stop was proper, Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the events leading up to William being stopped in the parking lot are immaterial to the issue of whether Sergeant Armstead reasonably utilized deadly force during the standoff. . . . Lemmon Sr. also seems to claim that the segmented approach that this court applied in Livermore ex rel Rohm v. Lubelan prohibits the court from considering the fact that William was an armed robbery suspect in our deadly force analysis. However, Lemmon Sr. conflates the court's 'totality of the circumstances' analysis with his allegation that the officers created the risk of harm when they allegedly misidentified William as the robbery suspect. . . . [I]t is proper to attribute Sergeant Armstead's knowledge that William was a suspect in an armed robbery, and that he personally witnessed William holding something on his side, to the overall risk of bodily harm that William presented during the standoff with officers. . . . [B]ecause the undisputed record shows Sergeant Armstead had probable cause to believe that William posed a threat of serious harm, his use of deadly force was objectively reasonable under the circumstances and thus constitutionally permissible. As for the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, because there is no constitutional violation, we have no need to evaluate whether the law was clearly established.")

Stahl v. Coshocton County, 754 F. App'x 355, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("This issue presents a close question, but in the end we agree with the conclusion reached by the district court. The dashboard camera video conclusively establishes that the shooting unfolded in seconds, without the benefit of calm reflection. Deputy Snyder had just witnessed Stahl's felonious assault of Deputy Sharrock. When the shots were fired, Stahl was accelerating in Deputy Snyder's direction. . . . We therefore affirm the grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Snyder with respect to his use of deadly force.")

Wilkerson v. City of Akron, 906 F.3d 477, 482-83 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Danzy did not violate Thomas's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. In the minute before Danzy fired, he and Stewart were wrestling a large and resistant suspect, one who managed to fight off two officers at once. No one disputes the scuffle. No one disputes that Thomas's gun discharged while the three men struggled on the ground. No one disputes that Thomas rapidly freed himself and started to run. And no one disputes the absence of evidence that he left the gun behind. In the moments preceding the decision to fire, a reasonable officer would have had probable cause to believe this suspect posed an immediate threat to both officers. Wilkerson insists that Thomas never pointed the gun at Danzy and suggests that Thomas's gun discharged accidentally under his body during the tussle. That does not affect the outcome. Either way, a reasonable officer in this setting would believe himself in serious danger, knowing Thomas had a gun and knowing it had discharged. Wilkerson adds that Thomas did not pose a threat to the officers when he ran away and, as the video suggests, grabbed at his falling trousers with both hands, making him unable to fire at the officers. But this fact and that inference do not change things. Once an officer reasonably believes a suspect is dangerous to him, other officers, or other citizens, he may use deadly force and may do so even if the suspect attempts to flee. . . That indeed is the fact pattern of one of our cases. See Livermore, 476 F.3d 397. Even if for a brief moment Thomas's falling pants occupied both of his hands, moreover, the moment remained brief. The interlude did not end the danger and did not give enough time to reassess the matter. . . Nor was a warning feasible. In the span of two seconds, Thomas had cleared several yards. Danzy was racing after him, aiming as he ran. As far as Danzy knew, Thomas still had the once-discharged weapon (as the evidence shows he did), and nothing prevented Thomas from turning to fire upon the officers. That reality distinguishes this dispute from Wilkerson's case citations, which involve scenarios in which officers had reason to doubt the seriousness of the threat. Not one of them involved encounters in which the reasonable officer would believe that the suspect was armed or about to fire. The court correctly granted summary judgment to Danzy on the undue-force claim.")

Stevens-Rucker v. City of Columbus, 739 F. App'x 834, 842-44 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1291 (2019) ("We affirm based upon the reasoning of the district court. Sergeant Frenz was faced with an individual carrying a knife coming in his direction. He knew that person had already confronted another officer and that shots had been fired. Given the deference that we accord the split-second decisions which officers are sometimes called upon to make, Latits v. Phillips, 878 F.3d 541, 547 (6th Cir. 2017), the facts—even when viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff—justify the grant of qualified immunity. . . We now turn to the district court's analysis of the final four shots fired by Officer McKee after he emerged from a breezeway and was confronted by Mr. White standing in an open area. In addressing that confrontation, the district court elected to break the four shots into two separate volleys of two shots each. It granted qualified immunity to McKee for firing the first two of the four shots but denied him qualified immunity for firing the final two. . . .The district court correctly concluded that the record indicates that the first two shots fired by McKee were separated in time from the four subsequent shots; however, it failed to point to any evidence that the final four shots were likewise separated by such a significant gap in time that they must be viewed as distinct incidents requiring individualized analysis. Rather, the uncontroverted evidence supports a conclusion that the final four shots were fired in such rapid succession that they constituted a single event. Officer McKee testified in his deposition that only eight to ten seconds elapsed from the time that he fired his first shot at Mr. White until he fired his final shot. Moreover, according to his affidavit, 'only a second or even fractions of a second' separated his final two shots from his third and fourth shots. This timeline is uncontroverted by the record and leads us to conclude that McKee's firing of his weapon constituted two, not three, distinct incidents: the first includes the initial two shots, the second the final four. . . .Based upon the uncontroverted evidence, what the district court characterized as separate second and third salvos was, in our view, but a single shooting consisting of four shots fired within a second of one another. That was not enough time for Officer McKee to stop and reassess the threat level between the shots. He continued to use his firearm to stop what he justifiably perceived as an immediate threat to his safety. For these reasons, we conclude that Officer McKee is entitled to qualified immunity in all respects, and we therefore reverse the judgment of the district court to the extent that it conflicts with this decision.")

Stevens-Rucker v. City of Columbus, 739 F. App'x 834, 847-50 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1291 (2019) (Stranch, J., concurring and dissenting) ("I agree that Officer Frenz's use of force and Officer McKee's first and second volleys of gunfire are entitled to qualified immunity and therefore concur with the majority on those issues. I do not, however, agree that the law and the facts of this case compel the result reached by the majority with respect to Officer McKee's third use of force and the Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim. I respectfully dissent on those issues. The majority opinion today holds that police can shoot and kill a non-fleeing suspect who is already gravely wounded even when there is no immediate threat to the officers or the public. It reaches that conclusion by construing Officer McKee's final four shots as a single and continuous use of force rather than as the last two uses of force, as was argued by Stevens-Rucker and necessarily conceded by the Officers. The district court also held that Officer McKee used force in 'three distinct circumstances and ... each must be segmented and analyzed individually.' I think this case should have been analyzed on the facts argued by the parties and found by the district court. DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 n.1, 611 (6th Cir. 2015) (holding that in qualified immunity cases, we usually 'defer to the district court's factual determinations' and 'ideally ... look no further than the district court's opinion for the facts and inferences cited expressly therein'). . . .By lumping the second and third shootings together, the majority obscures material issues of disputed fact. But even if we assume that it might be appropriate and plausible to accept an interpretation of the facts that 'only a second or even fractions of a second' separated the two shootings, Officer McKee's own testimony supports a finding that sufficient time elapsed between the two volleys to allow him to deliberate and reassess whether force was required. Describing the circumstances, McKee explained that White 'was laying [sic] on his left side kind of with his arm underneath, his left arm underneath almost in front of him, and was trying to post himself back up, meaning push up to get himself back off the ground.' McKee also refers to these shots as the second in a series of 'double-taps,' not as an unpunctuated, single set of four shots. Thus, this record reveals a quintessential dispute of material fact that renders summary judgment inappropriate, particularly in an appeal of the denial of qualified immunity. But even if we undertake review and apply our precedent to the third volley of shots by Officer McKee, we should affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity. First, I acknowledge that there may be instances in which the police could lawfully use lethal force to subdue an already wounded suspect. . . . Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, as we must, McKee's testimony indicates that he had sufficient time to evaluate White's movements, discern his intent to get back up, and elect to fire again. Reasonably inferring that McKee possessed sufficient time to deliberate regarding whether additional force was necessary, a jury could have concluded that, under the circumstances, the use of such force was unreasonable. The threat posed by White is an order of magnitude less than the threat posed in cases where a suspect has a firearm. White was armed only with a knife, lay 15 feet from officers in an open field, and there were no civilians in the immediate vicinity. Numerous other officers were descending on the scene to reinforce McKee and their arrival was imminent. It is simply not a plausible argument that McKee was in immediate danger when he delivered the fatal shots. The majority's decision to depart from precedent and lump the second and third shootings together therefore distorts both the governing precedent and the factual reality. . . .This police shooting also points to a broader, troubling pattern. After serving his country in the war in Iraq, Jason White returned to the United States as a decorated veteran suffering from significant mental health problems. On the day the police shot him, he was suffering an acute mental health incident.

Although we lack comprehensive data, '[i]t is safe to say that a third to a half of all use-of-force incidents involve a disabled civilian.'. . People with mental illness are 16 times more likely to be killed by police. . .This is a societal problem and police are often caught in an unenviable position on the frontlines of mental health emergencies. Our criminal justice system, moreover, serves as the de facto treatment provider for many individuals with mental illness, and the majority of jail inmates suffer from a mental health condition. . .Our failure as a society to adequately address the treatment of mental health problems routinely leaves these problems to be addressed through the criminal justice system. But the laws governing crime are a poor fit for the reality of dealing with mental health issues, perhaps because the selection of law enforcement officers and their training occupies so little common ground with the selection and training of those who treat mental health issues. And then we add the layer of qualified immunity that excuses 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . This over-thickening shield does little to force society to reconsider the propriety of leaving mental health issues in the hands of police officers untrained to handle them. At least two members of the Supreme Court have concluded that the recurring grant of qualified immunity in these incidents sends the wrong message to law enforcement officers and 'tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished.'. . In addressing these events, I think we have embarked on the wrong road and the place to which it leads will prove detrimental to law enforcement, those with mental health issues, and our society as a whole. 'Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.'") Latits v. Phillips, 878 F.3d 541, 549-53 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Several of our cases have concluded that deadly force was objectively unreasonable when the officer was to the side of the moving car or the car had already passed by him—taking the officer out of harm's way—when the officer shot the driver. . . But the fact that no one was in the car's direct path at the time the driver was shot does not end the analysis. . . We must also look to the prior interactions between Latits and Officer Phillips and the potential of imminent danger to other officers or members of the public in the area. . . .Altogether, Latits's conduct prior to being shot, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, showed a persistent intent to flee but not an intent to injure, and never placed the public or the officers at imminent risk. . . .Phillips argues that this case is comparable to Plumhoff, Hocker, Williams, and Freland. As explained above, these cases are distinguishable. In sum, considering the totality of the circumstances in the light depicted by the video and otherwise most favorable to the Plaintiff, we conclude that Latits did not present an imminent or ongoing danger and therefore that the shooting was not objectively reasonable. In addition, although police procedures do not set the bounds of the Fourth Amendment, we consider it relevant that Officer Phillips repeatedly violated police procedures in both ramming Latits and running up to his car. . . For these reasons, we conclude that Officer Phillips's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable and in violation of Latits's constitutional rights. . . .The Plaintiff has not identified any caselaw where an officer under sufficiently similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment, and neither have we. The Plaintiff relies on Sigley and Cupp to argue that Phillips violated clearly established law. The dissent also argues that Sigley and Cupp had clearly established by 2010 that Phillips's conduct was unconstitutional. We have held that, as of 2007, Sigley and Cupp had clearly established that 'shooting a driver while positioned to the side of his fleeing car violates the Fourth Amendment, absent some indication suggesting that the driver poses more than a fleeting threat.'. . But Sigley and Cupp are distinguishable from this case in a material way: Those cases involved officers confronting a car in a parking lot and shooting the non-violent driver as he attempted to initiate flight. . . Here, Phillips shot Latits after Latits led three police officers on a car chase for several minutes—during which Latits repeatedly sought to evade capture—an important factual distinction that sets this case apart from Sigley and Cupp. . . This case presents a close call, but in light of the Supreme Court's recent analyses in Mullenix and Pauly, these cases do not suffice. They did not involve many of the keys facts in this case, such as car chases on open roads and collisions between the suspect and police cars. Accordingly, although we now hold that Phillips's conduct fell outside the bounds of the Fourth Amendment, controlling authority at the time of the events had not clearly established the rights we identify today. . . Although it is relevant to the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, . . Phillips's violation of Ferndale Police Department policies does not require a different outcome. . . . It must have been clearly established that the conduct at issue violates the Constitution, not internal policies. This case establishes important constitutional parameters. At the time of the actions of Officer Phillips, however, it cannot be said that existing precedent made it clear to reasonable officials that what Phillips did violated the Fourth Amendment. Thus, this case fails to satisfy the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity doctrine. . . .We hold that Officer Phillips's conduct was objectively unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Its unreasonableness, however, was not clearly established at the time of Officer Phillips's actions, and he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Latits v. Phillips, 878 F.3d 541, 554-59 (6th Cir. 2017) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority spends the bulk of its opinion explaining how Officer Phillips' use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, citing case upon case (many from before 2010, the year of the incident in question) to conclude that Officer Phillips violated Latits' constitutional rights. In the final stretch, however, the majority abruptly shifts gears to hold that Latits' constitutional rights were not clearly established and that Officer Phillips is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. In so holding, the majority has created a nearly impenetrable barrier for plaintiffs seeking to vindicate their rights against governmental officials. Because I believe that the majority opinion is contrary to governing case law, which clearly establishes that an officer may not shoot a fleeing suspect who poses no danger to others, I respectfully dissent. . . . The unconstitutional nature of Phillips' conduct would have been clear to a reasonable police officer. Indeed, it was clearly established under Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 11 (1985),that police officers may not fire at non-dangerous fleeing felons such as Latits. . . . Although Garner did not involve a preceding car chase, its holding was clear enough to have placed Phillips on notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . .Unlike Mullenix, this is not a case where a police officer may have needed more judicial guidance to determine whether the particular risk justified the use of deadly force. Indeed, the majority concludes that Latits 'did not present an imminent or ongoing danger' to officers or to any civilians. This case therefore falls into the category of cases that Mullenix distinguished—i.e., those squarely controlled by Garner. In reaching its conclusion that Latits' right to be free from the use of deadly force in these circumstances was not clearly established, the majority markedly raises the legal barrier posed by the qualified immunity defense beyond any existing legal standard, making it virtually impossible for plaintiffs to overcome the defense even under circumstances where their rights have obviously been violated. The majority quotes Mullenix as holding that '[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . The majority then takes this general proposition and applies it literally, asking whether—along a continuum of more or less reasonable officials—any official could have believed that he was not violating the right. If any official could have so believed, the majority seems to conclude, then the right was not clearly established and hence there was no actionable violation. Under the majority's standard, no plaintiff could overcome a qualified immunity defense if any official could conceivably believe that he was not violating the plaintiff's rights. But this newly minted standard is not the law. Instead, 'the crux of the qualified immunity test is whether officers have "fair notice" that they are acting unconstitutionally.' . . It was clearly established at the time of the shooting, based on Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit caselaw, that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing felon who poses no threat to others. . . .The majority contends that Cupp and Sigley are insufficiently similar to the facts in this case in order for it to be clearly established that Phillips' conduct violated the law. It is a truism that every case is distinguishable from every other. But the degree of factual similarity that the majority's approach requires is probably impossible for any plaintiff to meet. Indeed, the majority's attempt to meaningfully distinguish Cupp and Sigley is entirely unpersuasive. The majority says that these cases are different from the instant case insofar as 'each involved little more than one or more officers confronting a car in a parking lot and shooting the driver as he attempted to initiate flight.' That is precisely the situation we have here. . . Latits was shot as he was slowly backing away and attempting to resume his flight from police. Unlike the plaintiff in Mullenix, Latits made no threats, and he showed no intention to harm the officers or others. Absent some indication that Latits presented more of a threat than the suspects in Cupp or Sigley, preventing the resumption of a flight instead of a flight in the first instance is a distinction without a difference. . . .Again, applicable case law clearly establishes that an officer should not be protected by qualified immunity when the shooting victim poses no immediate danger to the officer or to the public. Our panel is unanimous in its conclusion that the officer in this case acted in an objectively unreasonable manner and needlessly cost a person his life. Because I also believe that Latits' right not to be seized by deadly force when fleeing arrest was clearly established at the time he was killed, I respectfully dissent.")

Smith v. City of Troy, Ohio, 874 F.3d 938, 944-46 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Whether the right alleged to have been violated is clearly established and whether the official reasonably could have believed that his conduct was consistent with that right are questions of law for the court. . . But if genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the official committed acts that would violate a clearly established right, then dismissal of the claim is improper. . . When a defendant raises qualified immunity as a defense, the plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . In order to deny public officials qualified immunity, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . When more than one officer is involved, the court must consider each officer's entitlement to qualified immunity separately. . . Finally, the court must segment the incident into its constituent parts and consider the officer's entitlement to qualified immunity at each step along the way. . . .It was well-established at the time of the incident in this case that a non-violent, non-resisting, or only passively resisting suspect who is not under arrest has a right to be free from an officer's use of force. . . A reasonable juror could conclude that, in pulling his arm away, Smith's resistance was minimal and that Osting's response in taking Smith to the ground was excessive. . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Smith, a reasonable officer in Osting's position would have known that he would violate Smith's right to be free from excessive force by using a leg sweep to force him to the ground. Accordingly, for purposes of summary judgment, we conclude that Osting violated Smith's right to be free from excessive force by knocking him to the ground and then landing on top of him. Osting is not entitled to qualified immunity for this use of force. Smith also has presented a genuine factual dispute regarding whether his failure to put one of his arms behind his back while lying face-down on the ground constitutes 'resistance' sufficient to justify forcible handcuffing by Osting. Significantly, at no point during the entire episode was Smith under arrest for any offense whatsoever. And, during his deposition testimony, Osting conceded that the mere failure of a citizen—not arrested for any crime—to follow the officer's commands does not give a law enforcement official authority to put the citizen in handcuffs. If Smith indeed had committed no crime, if he was unarmed, and if no evidence was adduced that he posed a threat to himself or to others, Osting's forcible handcuffing of him would be excessive and in violation of well-established constitutional principles. Osting thus also was not entitled to qualified immunity for his actions in this regard, especially given the fact that there is no evidence that Osting took Smith to the ground for any reason other than to handcuff him and restrain him forcibly. Smith also claims that Osting failed to intervene to protect him from Officer Gates's allegedly excessive deployment of the taser to subdue him. In order to establish a claim against a police officer for failing to intervene or for failing to protect him from another officer's use of excessive force, the plaintiff must prove that the officer observed or had reason to know that excessive force would be or was being used and that the officer had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring. . . In this case, Osting was occupied trying to gain control of Smith's arms while Gates was deploying the taser. Consequently, no reasonable juror could find that Osting had the opportunity and the means to prevent Gates from tasing Smith excessively. . . . Osting had already taken Smith down and was struggling to gain full control of him before Gates arrived on the scene. Gates therefore could not have prevented Osting's initial use of force against Smith. Gates was justified in tasing Smith because Gates was unaware of what had transpired before his arrival on the scene and because Smith appeared to be resisting being handcuffed. . . Smith, however, has presented evidence that Gates tased him for 48 seconds in less than two minutes and that, under the circumstances, Smith did not have sufficient time to comply with the officers' commands to submit to handcuffing. It was clearly established at the time of the incident in this case that a police officer violates a suspect's right to be free from excessive force by repeatedly tasing the suspect without giving him a chance to comply with orders. . . Consequently, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Smith, we conclude that Gates's repeated deployment of the taser on Smith was unreasonable and that Gates is not entitled to qualified immunity on this aspect of Smith's excessive-force claim.") Roell v. Hamilton Cty., 870 F.3d 471, 482-87 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The deputies were . . . required to take into account Roell's diminished capacity before using force to restrain him. . . But no caselaw supports Nancy Roell's assertion the deputies were prohibited from using any physical force against Roell before first attempting alternative de-escalation techniques. . . In sum, we agree with the district court's observation that 'the fact that Roell's resistance was probably caused by his excited delirium did not preclude the deputies from using a reasonable amount of force to bring him under control.'. . Despite Roell's apparent diminished capacity, he had committed a series of property crimes, was a threat to the Agarwals and to the deputies, and was actively resisting arrest. . . . The type of force employed by the deputies against Roell—physically restraining his limbs, wrestling with him, attempting to tase him, and shackling his arms and legs—was likely not excessive. But we need not definitively answer this question because, at the time of the alleged violation, no caselaw clearly established that the degree of force used by the deputies violated Roell's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . We must determine, in other words, whether a reasonable officer would have known that the forcible physical restraint employed in this case against an individual who appeared mentally impaired, yet posed a potential threat to the officers and to others, violated that person's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Unlike the officers in Martin, Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston did not repeatedly beat Roell or apply compressive body pressure to his back. They instead 'grappled with Roell's arms and legs to try to control him, which they eventually did.'. . Deputy Huddleston did attempt to tase Roell, but no electricity was conducted into his body. And although this court has observed that use of a taser entails a higher level of force 'than simply knocking someone back to the ground,'. . . a 'growing national judicial consensus' exists that the use of a taser in dart mode constitutes only an intermediate use of force. . . . Martin, moreover, was 'unarmed and minimally dangerous,' whereas Roell was threateningly waving a hose with a metal nozzle that could be used as a weapon. Because of these factual differences, Martin did not put the deputies on notice that their actions violated Roell's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. Nor do the other cases cited by Nancy Roell, which hold that police use excessive force when they deploy gratuitous force or a taser against an individual who is already restrained or is doing nothing to resist arrest, provide such notice. . . .We believe that this case is instead more analogous to Cook v. Bastin, 590 Fed.Appx. 523 (6th Cir. 2014). . . .The Cook court held that the degree of force used by the officers was reasonable because Campbell had committed significant property destruction and a physical assault, posed an immediate threat to himself, the officers, and to others, and attempted to free himself from the officers' restraint. . . Like Campbell, Roell caused significant property damage, was a threat to the officers and to others, and resisted arrest during an episode of excited delirium. Although Deputies Alexander, Dalid and Huddleston did not observe any 'signs of physical violence,' they did observe that Roell was holding objects that could be used as weapons. True enough, the deputies wrestled with and attempted to tase Roell, arguably deploying a higher level of force than the officers in Campbell. But this court has previously held that an officer's 'single use of the taser in drive-stun mode' against a mentally unstable plaintiff who was a threat to officer safety and his own safety, and who was resisting police attempts to transport him to the hospital, did not constitute excessive force. . . And there is no question that the degree of force employed by Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston was far less than the unconstitutionally severe force used by the officers in Martin. In sum, the relevant caselaw does not clearly establish that the deputies violated Roell's Fourth Amendment rights because their actions fell in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . Finally, Nancy Roell relies on the procedures articulated in the training materials of the Ohio Peace Officer Training Commission (OPTC) and in proffered expert testimony in an effort to prove that Roell's right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. She first argues that the deputies did not follow the OPTC procedures when they neglected to recognize that Roell was exhibiting the common symptoms of excited delirium, proceeded to engage Roell before staging the scene with multiple officers and medical personnel, and failed to use verbal de-escalation techniques before attempting to physically restrain him. Nancy Roell also points to the expert testimony of Dr. Michael Lyman, who stated that de-escalation was the 'standard technique' recommended for crime-related encounters with excited-delirium subjects and who opined that, had the deputies used verbal de-escalation, Roell would have likely been talked into surrendering without an altercation. Based on this evidence, Nancy Roell argues that the deputies had a 'clearly established duty' to use de-escalation techniques prior to using force against Roell. . . . A finding of qualified immunity is . . . not precluded simply because the deputies acted contrary to their training. City of San Francisco v. Sheehan, —— U.S. – ——, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1777, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015) ("Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted."). In addition, although the deputies did not follow every OPTC protocol, we note that the training materials acknowledge that the use of a taser might be effective in controlling an individual suffering from excited delirium, that a physical struggle might ensue, and that force might be appropriate or necessary in order to restrain the individual. . . . In sum, Nancy Roell points to no caselaw clearly establishing that the deputies violated Roell's Fourth Amendment rights in effectuating his arrest. Even assuming that law-enforcement officers must 'adjust the application of force downward' when confronted with a conspicuously mentally unstable arrestee, . . . no precedent establishes that the level of force used by the deputies in this case was excessive or that the deputies were required to use only verbal de-escalation techniques. The content of the OPTC training material and Nancy Roell's proffered expert testimony do not change our conclusion. Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston are therefore entitled to qualified immunity, meaning that the district court did not err in granting summary judgment to the them on Nancy Roell's § 1983 claim.") Roell v. Hamilton Cty., Ohio, 870 F.3d 471, 490-94 (6th Cir. 2017) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("Our circuit law clearly states that when an individual 'exhibit[s] conspicuous signs that he [is] mentally unstable' and is 'unarmed,' 'Champion require[s] the officers to de-escalate the situation and adjust the application of force downward.'. . There are disputed facts as to whether Roell was unarmed and as to how aggressively Roell was acting, which determine how much force was appropriate. Although the law governing this case is clear, the facts surrounding Roell's death are not. The district court erred by granting summary judgment on Nancy Roell's § 1983 claim against Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston. I would reverse summary judgment on this claim, and I respectfully dissent. . . . If it is apparent to officers that an individual is unarmed and mentally unstable, then the officers must de-escalate and may not use as much force as would be permissible when confronted with an individual who was either mentally stable or armed. While the majority acknowledges that Champion mandates that '[t]he deputies were ... required to take into account Roell's diminished capacity before using force to restrain him,' it essentially brushes this requirement aside by asserting that 'no caselaw supports Nancy Roell's assertion the deputies were prohibited from using any physical force against Roell before first attempting alternative de-escalation techniques.'. . I agree that the deputies were not necessarily prohibited from using any physical force on Gary Roell, but that point is irrelevant to this case. The question in this case is whether the officers complied with their obligation, under Champion and Martin, to adjust their use of force downward. Even if the officers were permitted to use some physical force, they could have violated Champion and Martin by failing to adjust the level of force downward. . . . There are several unresolved questions of fact relevant to whether the officers had, and, if so, whether they complied with, an obligation to adjust the level of force downward. . . . A jury should resolve the disputed, material facts and ultimately determine whether the officers complied with their obligation to adjust the level of force downward. Therefore, as to the majority's resolution of Nancy Roell's § 1983 claim against Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston, I respectfully dissent.")

David v. City of Bellevue, 706 F. App'x 847, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("In Brandenburg, this court held that where the question of fact was whether Brandenburg's gun was up or down when police shot him, expert testimony that indicated that his finger was not on the trigger and that questioned whether his arm was lifted to aim a rifle at officers was sufficient to defeat qualified immunity. . . This case presents the same question. The expert acknowledges that two shots were fired while David was standing. The question, then, is whether expert testimony and facts that indicated that David did not have his arm raised with a weapon pointed at the officers are sufficient to defeat qualified immunity. As in Brandenburg, we hold that they are. The facts, taken in the light most favorable to David, show that it is a reasonable conclusion that David did not have his arm raised at Lawson. If that were the case, then the shooting would be unjustified. Accordingly, summary judgment is inappropriate. This holding does not implicate merely Lawson, who first pulled the trigger, but also removes qualified immunity from Matter as well. It is of no import that Matter shot only after Lawson opened fire. What counts is whether Matter knew that David did not pose a threat. We have held that an officer's opening fire—even if he was unsure who shot first [footonote omitted]—was sufficient to defeat qualified immunity if the victim was not a threat. . . If David's arm was by his side—as the facts construed in the best light for David would indicate—Matter's opening fire would also be unjustified and a constitutional violation.")

Roth v. Viviano, 704 F. App'x 548, 554-56 (6th Cir. 2017) ("During the pendency of this appeal and after argument, we addressed the situation in which the 'objective reasonableness' standard of Graham . . . does not fit 'because the person in question has not committed a crime, is not resisting arrest, and is not directly threatening the officer.' Estate of Hill by Hill v. Miracle, 853 F.3d 306,

314 (6th Cir. 2017). '[W]e suggest that a more tailored set of factors [than Graham's] be considered in the medical-emergency context, always aimed towards the ultimate goal of determining "whether the officers' actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them."'. . Accordingly, we held in Estate of Hill that a three-part test applies to determine whether an officer in a medical-emergency situation is entitled to qualified immunity:
(1) Was the person experiencing a medical emergency that rendered him incapable of making a rational decision under circumstances that posed an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or others?
(2) Was some degree of force reasonably necessary to ameliorate the immediate threat?
(3) Was the force used more than reasonably necessary under the circumstances (i.e., was it excessive)?
. . . . Regarding the third Estate of Hill question, whether the force used was reasonable, the parties disagree whether the manner in which Roth was cuffed was reasonable. However, there is no testimony or evidence that cuffing her in either manner was not reasonable. There is no testimony from the EMT responders, for instance, that the straps would have adequately secured Roth had the cuff been removed, or that the cuffs interfered with Roth's medical treatment or were unnecessary to allow the EMTs to render aid. Accordingly, on this record, the district court properly determined that Viviano's actions were objectively reasonable as a matter of law and, applying Estate of Hill, we must AFFIRM the district court's grant of summary judgment to Viviano on Roth's Fourth Amendment claims on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Roth v. Viviano, 704 F. App'x 548, 556 (6th Cir. 2017) ("I concur in the result, but I write separately to explain that Officer Viviano is entitled to qualified immunity because the facts, taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiff Shannon Roth, demonstrate that he was acting as a medical responder and the right to be free of unreasonable seizure by a medical responder was not clearly established at the time of this incident.")

Mitchell v. Schlabach, 864 F.3d 416, 423-26 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The confrontation in this case was not a typical encounter between a police officer and a defiant suspect. Schlabach, the lone available officer at the time, shot Mitchell during a confrontation in the middle of an unpopulated national forest after Mitchell charged toward him in direct defiance of orders to drop to the ground. The extended, 100-mile-per-hour car chase in the rain that preceded the shooting would have heightened the heart rate, anxiety, and fear of any normal person, police officer or not. The available video evidence makes clear that Mitchell was close enough to pose a substantial threat to Schlabach's safety at the time he was shot. Even viewing the facts and video in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we hold that Schlabach did not violate Mitchell's right to be free from excessive force because his decision to shoot was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. To be clear, our decision in this case is largely driven by the available video evidence, which documents most of the relevant events from a helpful angle. If this case turned on Schlabach's after-the-fact testimony, summary judgment would likely have been inappropriate. Our holding today is based upon the factual context of a car chase involving a single officer, isolated from backup, who was charged by a suspect who had demonstrated a willingness to put lives at risk in order to evade arrest. This decision does not stand for the proposition that deadly force is reasonable or proper whenever a suspect charges an officer or defies an order. . . .While the previous discussion would be sufficient to justify our decision today, we also consider the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether Schlabach's actions were contrary to 'clearly established' law at the time he acted. . . We hold that they were not. . . . As the dissent correctly notes, it is settled law that an unarmed defendant has a right not to be shot dead when he does not pose a risk of danger to police or the public. However, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, we hold that the record evidence, including the video, show that Schlabach had probable cause to believe that Mitchell posed an immediate threat to his safety. The Plaintiff is unable to point to a case holding that it is unconstitutional for an officer to shoot a criminal suspect under similar circumstances. Since Schlabach did not violate any of Mitchell's 'clearly established' rights, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis also supports our decision to affirm the district court's award of summary judgment.")

Mitchell v. Schlabach, 864 F.3d 416, 426-32 (6th Cir. 2017) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("Before explaining my view of the merits, I wish to amplify the legal standard for analyzing video evidence at the summary-judgment stage. I agree with the majority that if one party's 'version of events is so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him, ... [courts] should ... view[ ] the facts in the light depicted by the videotape.' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 380–81 (2007). Unfortunately, as this case and Scott itself illustrate, 'the light depicted by the videotape' is not always obvious. . . .It is a difficult task to consider the viewpoints of individuals whose experience one has not lived. But Scott, oddly enough in light of the aforementioned study, demands no less. The Supreme Court instructed us that in order to consider the light depicted by the videotape, we must determine that one party's 'version of events is so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him.'. . One cannot say that every reasonable jury would be so utterly convinced by a videotape as to disbelieve one party's version of events without considering how every reasonable juror, based on his or her experience, may view a police officer's actions as more or less reasonable or a suspect's actions as more or less threatening. It is therefore with the humble understanding that I, like anyone else, 'lack full insight into how the mechanisms of value-motivated cognition shape [my] and others' perceptions of particular facts,'. . . that I view the videotape and other facts in this case. I conclude that the record does not utterly discredit Plaintiff's version of events. . . .I concur that the ten-minute, high-speed car chase that preceded Mitchell's death was a serious crime. . . However, I disagree that the second and third Mullins factors weigh in favor of Schlabach when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. Therefore, and under the totality of the circumstances, I believe that Plaintiff has shown a constitutional violation at this stage of the case. . . .Schlabach did not state that he believed Mitchell to be armed with a handgun, a knife, or some other weapon. To infer such belief would be taking the facts in the light most favorable to Schlabach rather than Plaintiff. It is a remarkable admission for an officer to shoot someone whom he knew to be unarmed. Such an admission seriously undermines the majority's holding that Mitchell posed a serious threat to Schlabach. Beyond Schlabach's knowledge that Mitchell was unarmed, the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff display a general lack of dangerousness on the part of Timothy Mitchell. First, a reasonable juror watching the dash-cam video could conclude that Mitchell walked toward Schlabach in a nondangerous manner. We have previously held that when a suspect walks toward an officer with his hands at his side, it is unreasonable for the officer, on this basis alone, to shoot the suspect. . . .Although the record does not indicate the exact distance between Schlabach and Mitchell when Mitchell was shot, a reasonable juror could conclude that Mitchell was far enough away that he did not pose an immediate threat to Schlabach. This point is perhaps best articulated by W. Ken Katsaris, a law-enforcement officer and instructor with over thirty years of extensive experience, who stated, 'I did not see where Mitchell in any way could conceivably be an immediate threat to the safety of the officer or others. Mitchell was obviously not armed, not threatening Schlabach, and appears to want to avoid the aggressive approach of Schlabach.'. .On this point, the majority once again draws inferences in favor of Schlabach rather than Plaintiff. Recognizing that 'the video does not allow for a precise determination of the distance between Mitchell and Schlabach at the time of the first shot,' the majority nevertheless concludes that 'there is no question that Mitchell showed no signs of stopping and that one more step would have placed Mitchell in a position to attack Schlabach with his fists.'. . However, because the video does not reveal the distance between Mitchell and Schlabach, a permissible inference to draw is that the two were 21 feet apart, . . . rather than 'one more step' away. And whether Mitchell was 'charg[ing],'. . . or took an 'aggressive approach,'. . . such that he 'showed no signs of stopping,'. . . are the sort of descriptive conclusions that we ordinarily leave to a jury. I cannot say that there is not a single reasonable juror who would characterize Mitchell's gait as a 'walk' rather than a 'charge' or 'calm' rather than 'aggressive.' Katsaris's testimony only bolsters my view that a jury could differ with the majority's characterizations of Mitchell's demeanor and gait. . . .Timothy Mitchell was walking toward Schlabach when he was shot. After watching the dash-cam video, reasonable jurors could conclude that Mitchell was not walking 'aggressively' with '[c]lenched fists' and 'wide eyes,'. . . but rather that he was walking calmly toward Schlabach. . . .Although the first Mullins factor favors Schlabach, the second and third factors favor Mitchell. Particularly in a case such as this, where there are numerous statements and pieces of video footage that cast doubt on whether the suspect posed an immediate threat to the officer or others, summary judgment should not dispose of the case. . . Therefore, I believe that Plaintiff has put forth sufficient evidence that, when viewed in the light most favorable to him, demonstrate a violation of Timothy Mitchell's constitutional rights. . . .I fully recognize that ' "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . However, and keeping in mind the central inquiry of whether 'existing precedent ... placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,'. . there are nevertheless some 'obvious' cases in which general 'standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . This is one such obvious case. . . . [W]hen cast in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the facts of that fateful afternoon should have made it obvious to any reasonable officer that Timothy Mitchell, whom Schlabach believed to be unarmed and who was not otherwise dangerous, did not deserve to be met with deadly force. I do not believe that qualified immunity shields Schlabach from liability under § 1983. Therefore, I would reverse the district court's judgment and remand the case for further proceedings.")

Carden v. City of Knoxville, 699 F. App'x 495, 498-99(6th Cir. 2017) ("We are therefore bound to accept the district court's finding here that a reasonable jury could conclude that Carden no longer presented a threat once he had turned and begun to flee, and that Gerlach had no objective reason to believe otherwise. To the extent that Gerlach's arguments call any of those facts or inferences into question, such as in his argument that Carden posed a possible deadly threat at the time of the shooting, we must disregard them. . . However, we still retain jurisdiction to resolve the legal question presented in Gerlach's appeal. . . That question, as both sides agree, is whether Gerlach violated Carden's right to be free of excessive force when Gerlach fired on him from behind while he fled, unarmed, from an arrest for possessing a suspected stolen vehicle or for assaulting a police officer. Gerlach contends that the case law at the time of the encounter did not clearly establish that his use of deadly force would have been unjustified, even under the circumstances found by the district court. About that, however, he is mistaken. As the district court explained, the law at the time of the encounter clearly established that deadly force would be excessive if used against an unarmed, fleeing felon who the officer lacked probable cause to believe posed a threat of serious physical harm. That much was made clear in Bouggess v. Mattingly, 482 F.3d 886 (6th Cir. 2007), decided nearly a decade before the fatal encounter in this case, where we upheld the denial of qualified immunity against an officer after he shot and killed a fleeing felon who had violently resisted arrest. . . There, as in this case, the decedent was suspected of a non-violent felony: there, dealing crack cocaine, . . . here, stealing a car. Like Carden, the decedent in that case after aggressively resisting arrest had turned and begun to flee, with no weapon drawn, when he was shot multiple times in the back by the officer. . . We held that those circumstances, though justifying the use of some force, did 'not justify deadly force, especially when the struggle ha[d] concluded and the suspect [was] in flight.'. . Indeed, later cases have only made clearer that the police may not fire on a non-dangerous suspect fleeing from arrest. . . That is exactly what the district court determined that a jury could find in this case, and the cases on the books at the time clearly indicated its unconstitutionality. . . .[E]ven if Gerlach had probable cause to fear for his safety during his struggle with Carden, it could well be that he lacked the same cause after the struggle had ended and Carden, still unarmed, had turned and begun to flee. Here the district court found that Gerlach could not reasonably have believed he was in danger once Carden had turned to run, and we may not second-guess that finding on interlocutory review . . . . Bouggess and its progeny are therefore clearly on point, and they just as clearly establish that the circumstances found by the district court did not justify the use of deadly force against Carden.")

Alexander v. County of Wayne, 689 F. App'x 441, 442 n.1 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Our dissenting colleague faults Officer Merrow for his actions preceding the shooting. As the district court recognized, however, this court does not scrutinize whether it was reasonable for the officer 'to create the circumstances' that led to the use of force. . . Instead, we focus on whether the officer's actions were objectively reasonable under the totality of the circumstances he faced 'at the time [he] made [his] split-second judgment[ ] immediately prior to using deadly force.' Chappell v. City of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 909 (6th Cir. 2009).")

Alexander v. County of Wayne, 689 F. App'x 441, 442-50 (6th Cir. 2017) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("Even though it has been over half a century since Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his powerful 'I Have A Dream' speech, we continue to have an epidemic of unjustified and race-related police shootings in the United States. For instance, the New York Times reported that, '[a]ccording to the F.B.I.'s Supplementary Homicide Report, 31.8 percent of people shot by the police were African-American, a proportion more than two and a half times the 13.2 percent of African-Americans in the general population.' Sendhil Mullainathan, Police Killings: What the Data Says, N.Y. Times, October 18, 2015, at BU6. Similarly, ProPublica reported that '[y]oung black males in recent years were at a far greater risk of being shot dead by police than their white counterparts—21 times greater, according to a ProPublica analysis of federally collected data on fatal police shootings' from 2010 to 2012. Ryan Gabrielson, Ryann Grochowski Jones, and Eric Sagara, Deadly Force, in Black and White, ProPublica (April 21, 2017, 3:55 PM), https://www.propublica.org/article/deadly-force-in-black-and-white. It is against this backdrop that we consider how the shooting of James Alexander, Jr., a young African-American man, may have been just another example out of countless others that demonstrate the pervasive and systemic racism so often evident in interactions between the police and people of color. As discussed in detail below, rather than placing this case in its proper context, the majority and the district court have treated this case so cavalierly that any concept of justice has been tossed aside. A key issue in this case is whether it was objectively reasonable for Officer Merrow to needlessly escalate the situation by grabbing onto the steering wheel of Alexander's vehicle and attaching his body to the side of the moving vehicle where nothing more was at stake than a minor ticket citation. The majority, in adopting the district court's opinion, frames the issue as whether it was reasonable for Merrow to use deadly force against Alexander while he was being 'dragged alongside Alexander's vehicle.'. . By doing so, the majority completely fails to take into account the totality of the circumstances that the shooting involved. Taking those circumstances into account, there is no acceptable justification for affording Merrow qualified immunity. Before proceeding with the analysis, it will be useful to briefly recount the facts. . . .Due to the self-serving nature of Merrow's testimony, the selective statements cherry-picked from the witnesses, and Alexander's inability to contradict this evidence, it is our duty as judicial officers to proceed with caution when weighing the evidence in a case like this. In fact, we are required on a motion for summary judgment to consider the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and to make all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor. As seen throughout the majority opinion and the district court's opinion, the evidence is not remotely considered in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. . . .One of the serious deficiencies with the majority opinion is its failure to consider the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff and make all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor. Merrow contends that he was in 'imminent danger' of being run over by Alexander's vehicle. The majority agreed with Merrow and accepted his dubious contention that Merrow had an objectively reasonable belief that Alexander posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm to Merrow or others when he shot Alexander. Contrary to the majority opinion, the issue in this case is whether Merrow actively and unnecessarily placed himself in a dangerous position in order to effectuate an arrest by grabbing and holding onto the steering wheel of Alexander's moving vehicle when Merrow's prior interactions with Alexander suggested that the driver would not have endangered others if he was able to drive away. It is notable that neither Merrow nor any of the witnesses at the scene claimed that Alexander engaged in any assaultive or threatening behavior toward Merrow. Indeed, Merrow's partner at the scene, Tanner, was not even concerned enough about what was occurring to get out of the police vehicle. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, and under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable jury could find that Merrow's use of deadly force violated Alexander's Fourth Amendment rights. The facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, demonstrate that Merrow 'actively "put himself in a dangerous position in order to effectuate an arrest"' by grabbing the steering wheel of the car in order to try to prevent Alexander from leaving. . . This action by the officer, in and of itself, was objectively unreasonable. No reasonable person, let alone a police officer, would grab hold of a steering wheel and continue to hold onto it as the car began to move, when nothing more was at stake than a minor ticket infraction. Merrow's explanation was that he wanted to steer the vehicle into a parked vehicle ahead in order to prevent Alexander from fleeing. Incredibly, Merrow claims he believed that ramming the moving vehicle into a parked car was safer than simply permitting Alexander to leave the scene and have him arrested later based upon information that Merrow had already obtained from Alexander in writing the citation. The majority makes the outlandish claim that the officer feared for his life, and that is why it was reasonable for him to shoot Alexander. However, it is difficult to rationalize the officer's explanation when one examines the officer's own words. The notion that shooting Alexander reduced any threat of imminent danger is completely ridiculous for many reasons. At the moment the shots were fired, it was objectively unreasonable for Merrow to shoot Alexander. For one thing, Merrow should never have attached himself to the side of a moving vehicle—it was not as though Merrow was attempting to detain or arrest a person whom he had reason to believe to be a dangerous felon. Secondly, Alexander's foot or body, after being shot, could have acted as a deadweight on the gas pedal and the car could have sped off into incoming traffic with no one alive behind the wheel. This Court's previous opinions in Godawa and Cupp are informative and almost directly on point. . . . Like the officers in Godawa and Cupp, Merrow actively put himself in a dangerous position by gripping onto the steering wheel and not letting go once the car began to move. Merrow presented no evidence that Alexander was violent, that he had a gun or drugs in the car, or that he was going to drive recklessly on the road and endanger other drivers. The witness testimony did not suggest, prior to the officer grabbing the wheel, that Alexander was about to endanger individuals around the area. At most, one of the witnesses vaguely or ambiguously suggested that Alexander appeared to be driving toward a parked van or small truck. However, Merrow admitted that he was attempting to steer the car into a parked vehicle, so the fact that a witness thought that Alexander appeared to be driving towards a parked van should not count against Alexander. Importantly, the interaction between Merrow and Alexander prior to the shooting was apparently civil and non-confrontational, and gave Merrow no reason to believe that Alexander would recklessly endanger others with his vehicle. Alexander was honest with Merrow about why he was at the house, and was not confrontational with Merrow when Merrow first told him to step out of the vehicle. When Alexander realized that his vehicle was going to be impounded, he begged Merrow to refrain from impounding his vehicle, and told Merrow that his wife would divorce him if he lost his car. Additionally, Merrow had all of Alexander's information when he began to flee, Merrow's partner was in their police vehicle, and another officer in a second police vehicle was also at the scene. It would have been easier, and safer, for the other officers to pursue Alexander in their vehicles, or to arrest him later at his residence. Furthermore, prior to Alexander's attempt to drive away, Merrow only suspected Alexander of violating a local ordinance that prohibited loitering around alleged drug houses—an offense that is punishable by a citation and monetary fine instead of impoundment, as Plaintiff's lawyer pointed out at oral argument. It should also be noted that Merrow did not suspect Alexander of possessing drugs, or weapons, or any objects perceived as dangerous. Even assuming Alexander committed an additional offense by fleeing the scene, this offense alone does not justify Merrow's use of deadly force. . . Similar to Cupp and Godawa, the district court failed to view the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. Applying the Graham factors to Plaintiff's version of the facts, it is obvious that Merrow's use of force in this case was objectively unreasonable. Although Alexander was fleeing from police, he was suspected of a minor offense and was non-confrontational with Merrow prior to fleeing. More importantly, Merrow actively and inappropriately placed himself in a dangerous position even though Alexander posed no immediate threat to Merrow or any member of the public. In fact, Merrow was not too concerned about his safety if he was willing to attach his body to the outside of a moving vehicle. The problem with the outcome adopted by the district court and the majority is that it authorizes and encourages the irresponsible behavior demonstrated by Merrow. We should not approve of and support an officer's behavior when it is abusive, unreasonable, and indeed, senseless. Although this case differs from Godawa and Cupp in that the officers in those cases had not attached their bodies to the vehicles in the same manner as Merrow, the principle from those cases is applicable here—that an officer may not put himself or herself in a dangerous position when there is no need to do so in the first place, if the circumstances do not justify or warrant him or her in doing so, and then use that as an excuse to shoot the suspect. In other words, an officer should not be protected by qualified immunity when the victim poses no immediate danger to the officer or the public. Under the circumstances of this case, Merrow is not deserving of the protection granted by the qualified immunity doctrine. One can only conclude that the officer placed no value on the life of the deceased. The officer in this case acted in an objectively unreasonable manner, and needlessly cost a person his life. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Thomas v. City of Columbus, 854 F.3d 361, 365-67 (6th Cir. 2017) ("In this circuit, we consider the officer's reasonableness under the circumstances he faced at the time he decided to use force. See Livermore v. Lubelan, 476 F.3d 397, 406 (6th Cir. 2007) (describing the so-called 'segmented analysis' this circuit uses to analyze use-of-force claims). We do not scrutinize whether it was reasonable for the officer 'to create the circumstances.'. . Even if an officer approaches a scene recklessly, this will not necessarily render a later decision to protect himself unreasonable. . . Thus, we cannot, as Mr. Thomas urges, find a constitutional violation based on how Officer Kaufman approached the crime scene. Arguably, Officer Kaufman's decisions to rush toward the apartment without backup violated Columbus Police Department procedures. Arguably, his violations increased the likelihood that Officer Kaufman might have to use force. But those decisions were not seizures. Their reasonableness is not at issue. Instead, we must consider the circumstances that Officer Kaufman faced in the moment he decided to use force. Officer Kaufman had responded to a dangerous call in a high-crime area. He was alone. He ran towards the breezeway between two vehicles and then stopped at the parking lot's edge. Meanwhile, two people exited an apartment and then ran towards him, the first with a gun. About 40 feet initially separated Officer Kaufman from that person, and the distance only shrank as the person closed in on him. At this range, a suspect could raise and fire a gun with little or no time for an officer to react. Given these facts, a reasonable officer would perceive a significant threat to his life in that moment. Thus, Officer Kaufman's decision to fire his gun—even if Destin never raised his—was objectively reasonable. . . . To be clear, we do not hold that an officer may shoot a suspect merely because he has a gun in his hand. Whether a suspect has a weapon constitutes just one consideration in assessing the totality of the circumstances. . . Sometimes, the time or space available to an officer may mean that the reasonable thing to do is to monitor the suspect, issue a warning, or take cover. . . But Officer Kaufman acted objectively reasonably when he used deadly force here—even if facts beyond his knowledge meant that he actually faced no threat. . . .Officer Kaufman faced a tense, uncertain situation. Someone ran towards him with a gun after exiting a burglary about 40 feet away. Officer Kaufman fired when the person with the gun closed the distance to around 10 feet. A reasonable officer would find a significant threat to his safety under these circumstances. Under the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard, he could respond with deadly force. Thus, we affirm.")

Nyilas v. Steinaway, 686 F. App'x 355, 356 n.2 (6th Cir. 2017) ("We note that this case, although less egregious than the recent case of Moore v. City of Memphis, ___ F.3d ___, 2017 WL 1314932 (6th Cir. Apr. 10, 2017), presents another example of the all-too-ready use of SWAT tactics in circumstances in which the need to forcibly enter the home was less than clear. While the officers in this case did not violate clearly established rules of constitutional law, it is entirely likely that they could have achieved their goals using much less intrusive and dangerous means.")

Moore v. City of Memphis, 853 F.3d 866, 870-72 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the district court separated the Memphis Police Department's encounter with Moore into three segments: the Department's decision to use TACT to serve the warrant; TACT's use of a dynamic entry; and Penny's use of deadly force. Ultimately, however, the district court did not specifically analyze the reasonableness of the decision to deploy TACT; instead, the court found that the reasonableness of that decision merged with the reasonableness of the dynamic entry itself. . . .As an initial matter, the plaintiffs argue that the district court should have analyzed the police department's decision to use TACT separately from the dynamic entry that resulted from that decision. We disagree: the decision to use TACT was not itself an application of force under the Fourth Amendment. What the TACT team did when they got to Moore's house, however, was an application of force. So we turn to the question whether the so-called dynamic entry was unreasonable. . . . Here, the officers had several reasons to think that knocking and announcing would be dangerous, to wit: when Moore answered the door for officers during their initial visit to his home, he gestured with his hand behind his back as if he had a weapon; Moore's neighbor, Hillis, told Lynch that Moore had a gun; and (according to Hillis) Moore said he would 'shoot first and ask questions later' if the officers came back, and would kill Lynch in particular. Those reasons were enough to allow the officers to execute a no-knock entry. . . . The plaintiffs also challenge the officers' use of flash-bangs, both when they entered the house and just before Penny entered Moore's room. To determine whether an officer's use of flash-bangs was reasonable, we balance the officer's interest in using them against the suspect's interest in forbearance. . . Here, as the officers entered Moore's home, they had reason to believe that Moore would pose an immediate threat to their safety. Meanwhile, nothing in the record suggests that flash-bangs themselves posed a danger to Moore: he had no health conditions that made him vulnerable to loud noises or blinding light, and the house contained no accelerants or other substances that could easily ignite. . . The officers' initial use of flash-bangs was therefore reasonable. As for the second use, by then Moore had refused to comply with the officers' orders after they entered his home; instead he retreated into his bedroom. Officer Penny feared that Moore would barricade himself there, which could endanger the officers. Suffice it to say that, on this record, we see no basis to second-guess that judgment. . . . That leaves Officer Penny's decision to shoot Moore. . . . The plaintiffs argue that a genuine dispute exists as to whether Moore pointed a gun at Officer Penny; in their view, Penny might have seen the phone in Moore's hand and mistakenly thought it was a gun. Be that as it may, however, the relevant question is not whether Moore in fact had a gun in his hand, but whether Penny reasonably thought that Moore did. And on this record a jury could not find otherwise. Before Penny entered Moore's bedroom, as noted above, Penny had good reason to think that Moore was armed. True, when Penny entered the room, smoke from the flash-bang might have obscured the object in Moore's hand. But the 911 recording makes clear that Penny thought it was a gun: he yelled 'Hands, Don! Hands, hands, hands!' immediately before he shot Moore. Penny's decision to shoot under these circumstances was the archetype of a split-second decision to which we must defer. . . As a matter of law, therefore, the defendants' use of force was not excessive under the Fourth Amendment. But that does not mean the dynamic entry, in particular, was wise. The warrant here concerned evidence only of a misdemeanor; and yet the defendants chose a course of action that, though constitutional, unavoidably jeopardized the officers' lives along with Moore's. In the end Moore was shot, though it just as easily could have been Penny—as the defendants themselves emphasize here. Meanwhile, the officers plainly had available to them other options that did not involve an immediate physical confrontation. The officers would have done well to consider them more seriously than they apparently did.")

Moore v. City of Memphis, 853 F.3d 866, 872 (6th Cir. 2017) (6th Cir. 2017) (Batchelder, J., concurring) ("Although I concur fully in my colleagues' reasoned opinion, I write separately to emphasize that, while the Memphis Police Department did not violate any clearly established rule of constitutional law, its decision to use a tactical unit and the way it used that unit are, in these circumstances which stem from a suspected animal cruelty misdemeanor offense, appalling. The fact is that the police department's conduct, while not constitutionally impermissible, was certainly disproportionate. Had cooler and more rational heads prevailed, Moore's life likely would have been spared and Memphis Animal Services would still have been able to investigate the animal cruelty complaints it had received. 'The care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction, is the first and only legitimate object of good government.' Thomas Jefferson to the Republican Citizens of Washington County, Maryland (March 31, 1809), reprinted in 1 The Papers of Thomas Jefferson 98–99 (J. Jefferson Looney ed., 2004). The Memphis Police Department would do well to think about this admonition.")

Estate of Hill v. Miracle, 853 F.3d 306, 313-15 (6th Cir. 2017) ("[A]pplying the Graham factors to the situation that Miracle faced is equivalent to a baseball player entering the batter's box with two strikes already against him. In other words, because Hill had not committed a crime and was not resisting arrest, two of the three Graham factors automatically weighed against Miracle. The key problem is that the district court tried to apply the Graham factors to a completely different factual situation—a medical emergency—where there was no crime, no resisting of arrest, and no direct threat to the law-enforcement officer. In doing so, the court failed to see the forest (the overall standard of objective reasonableness) for the trees (the three factors to use as an aid in assessing objective reasonableness in the typical situation). We fully sympathize with the district court's dilemma, however, because no appellate court has previously provided any guidance on how to assess objective reasonableness in the present atypical situation of a medical emergency. In fact, most of the cases dealing with excessive force and taser use simply hold that an officer does not use excessive force by tasing a person who is actively resisting arrest, but does use excessive force if that person is not resisting arrest. . . . Rather than continuing to struggle with this dilemma, we suggest that a more tailored set of factors be considered in the medical-emergency context, always aimed towards the ultimate goal of determining 'whether the officers' actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them.'. . Where a situation does not fit within the Graham test because the person in question has not committed a crime, is not resisting arrest, and is not directly threatening the officer, the court should ask:

(1) Was the person experiencing a medical emergency that rendered him incapable of making a rational decision under circumstances that posed an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or others?

(2) Was some degree of force reasonably necessary to ameliorate the immediate threat?

(3) Was the force used more than reasonably necessary under the circumstances (i.e., was it excessive)?

If the answers to the first two questions are 'yes,' and the answer to the third question is 'no,' then the officer is entitled to qualified immunity.

These questions and answers serve as a guide to assist the court in resolving the ultimate issue of 'whether the officers' actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them.'. . The factors that we establish and apply today are, like the Graham factors, non-exhaustive . . . and not necessarily dispositive in every case. Nonetheless, these additional considerations aid the ultimate inquiry of 'whether the totality of the circumstances justified a particular sort of ... seizure,'. . . and should be considered and ruled upon by the court for claims of excessive force arising in this context. Applying the above factors to the present case, we conclude that, based on the facts as viewed in the light most favorable to Hill, Miracle did not use excessive force against Hill when Miracle deployed his taser in drive-stun mode. As to the first factor, Hill was experiencing a medical emergency and was incapable of making a rational decision due to his hypoglycemic episode. In resisting the paramedics' attempts to save his life, Hill repeatedly kicked his feet and swung his fists in their direction. The paramedics were therefore put in immediate physical danger by Hill's combative actions. In addition, the testimony from Streeter indicates that both the paramedics and Miracle were at risk due to the blood spraying from Hill's arm. . . . And even if we were to assume that the safety risk from Hill's blood did not justify Miracle's use of a taser, Hill's mental state and combative actions posed an immediate threat to himself. Hill's extremely low blood-sugar level was in the hypoglycemic range and, if left untreated, would likely have led to a prolonged seizure and death. Like in Caie, therefore, Hill's mental and physical state rendered him 'at a minimum, ... a threat to his own safety.'. . Turning to the second factor, some degree of force was reasonably necessary to ameliorate the immediate threat to the paramedics and to Hill. Because of his hypoglycemic episode, Hill was violently resisting the paramedics' attempts to render him life-saving assistance. The four paramedics were unable to gain physical control over Hill, who had already ripped an IV catheter out of his arm. Hill argues, and the district court agreed, that 'any danger could have been eliminated by simply stepping away from [Hill].'. . This proposed action, however, fails to take into account the fact that Hill needed immediate medical assistance. So stepping away from Hill might have eliminated the safety risk to the paramedics and to Miracle, but it would have had potentially fatal consequences for Hill. Under these circumstances, we conclude that some degree of force on the part of Miracle was reasonably necessary to protect the paramedics and, more importantly, to save Hill's life. We turn now to the final factor—whether or not Miracle's single use of a taser in drive-stun mode was excessive under the circumstances. Hill first argues that Miracle should have tried to handcuff or restrain Hill before deploying the taser, and that failing to do so was violative of Hill's Fourth Amendment rights. In support of this argument, Hill points out that the officers in Caie attempted to handcuff Caie and encountered resistance before tasing him. But in the present situation where four paramedics were unable to restrain Hill, we are hard-pressed to fault Miracle for not joining the fray. Hill also argues that the use of a taser in drive-stun mode is 'not recommended' and therefore excessive. He fails to acknowledge, however, that this mode is discouraged because of the difficulty in keeping the taser in contact with a person's skin, not because such use constitutes excessive force. Miracle in fact testified that he used his taser in drive-stun mode because this was the best option to 'minimize [the] damage' in light of Hill's medical emergency. We are not holding that a law-enforcement officer is always justified in using a taser to gain control over a person suffering from a medical emergency. But under the circumstances, Miracle's use of force was objectively reasonable. Four paramedics were unable to physically restrain Hill, whose health was rapidly deteriorating and who was unresponsive to Miracle's command to 'relax.' We conclude that a reasonable officer on the scene, without 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight,' would be justified in taking the same actions as Miracle.") Woodcock v. City of Bowling Green, 679 F. App'x 419, 424-25 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the incident lacked the essential elements that permitted the use of force in Simmonds and Pollard.

Harrison displayed none of the aggression that the suspects did in Simmonds and Pollard. Casada may have thought that Harrison had a gun, but Harrison never gave Casada reason to think that he would use it imminently. The suspects in Simmonds and Pollard pointed objects at the officers; Harrison never moved his left arm. Casada argues that he faced a split-second decision, but the record shows that Casada and Kay agreed that Casada would shoot if Harrison moved past the point illuminated by the searchlight. Casada also did not shoot Harrison immediately after hearing his final declaration. He waited just over a minute, and asked Kay to run around the police car to move the searchlight. Harrison's shooting lacked the exigency, tension, or rapid evolution present in Simmonds and Pollard. When Casada fired the shot, he had no reason to believe that Harrison posed an imminent threat of serious harm to anyone. Accordingly, his use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable and violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Lewis v. Charter Township of Flint, 660 F. App'x 339, 343-47 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Where a person attempts to flee in a vehicle, 'police officers are "justified in using deadly force against a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car," but "may not use deadly force once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety."'" Godawa v. Byrd, 798 F.3d 457, 464 (6th Cir. 2015) (quoting Cass v. City of Dayton, 770 F.3d 368, 375 (6th Cir. 2014)). Thus, 'where the car no longer "presents an imminent danger," an officer is not entitled to use deadly force to stop a fleeing suspect.' Id. (quoting Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 775 (6th Cir. 2005)). The dash-cam video does not conclusively show that a reasonable officer would have believed Lewis posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm to Needham or others in the vicinity. Rather, viewed in the light most favorable to the Estate, it shows that Lewis—who was not suspected of any violent crime—was merely trying to flee a traffic stop in a vehicle, which alone is not sufficient to justify the use of deadly force. . . Further, the video does not clearly show that Lewis 'targeted' Needham when he accelerated the vehicle and attempted to flee. Although Lewis's intent does not matter, the facts known to Needham at the time do. . . Because Needham ran in front of the vehicle after Lewis had started the ignition and less than a second before he accelerated forward, it is not clear from the video that a reasonable officer would have perceived that Lewis was 'targeting' him. Moreover, the video strongly suggests—and Needham appears to concede—that Needham fired into the driver's side window. This fact and Needham's position at the side of the car suggest he was clear of the vehicle and not in danger when he fired his weapon. Needham contends he fired through the driver's side window only because at the time, he was 'trying to dodge the vehicle.'. . Although that may be the case, the conclusion Needham asks the court to draw would require us to view the video in the light most favorable to Needham. However, a reasonable jury could reach a different conclusion, especially since the video appears to show Needham lowering his weapon as he jumps out of the vehicle's path, and then raising it again as the vehicle drives by him. . . .At this juncture, the record—consisting only of the dash-cam video—presents a scenario where, as in Cupp, it would be possible for a jury to conclude that the officer shot at the decedent in self-defense, but a reasonable jury could also conclude that the decedent 'was merely trying to flee ... and [the officer] purposefully shot [him] under circumstances of no threat to [the officer] or others.'. . That there was no video available in Cupp does not render it inapplicable because there are factual questions in the instant case bearing on the analysis that are not clearly depicted in the video. . . .Viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, a jury could conclude from the video that a reasonable officer would not have believed he or anyone else was ever in danger. Moreover, 'the fact that a situation is rapidly evolving "does not, by itself, permit [an officer] to use deadly force,"'. . . and although the events here occurred within a matter of seconds, the video suggests Needham was already out of the way, and indeed had already lowered his gun, when he fired into the driver's side window. . . .Thus, the dash-cam video, standing alone, does not establish that Needham is entitled to summary judgment on the basis that that his actions were objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . .There is longstanding precedent holding that it is unreasonable for an officer to use deadly force against a suspect merely because he is fleeing arrest; rather, such force is only reasonable if the fleeing suspect presents an imminent danger to the officer or others in the vicinity. . . This is the case even where the suspect flees in a vehicle. . . Relying on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305 (2015) (per curiam), Needham contends that existing precedent did not place 'the conclusion that [he] acted unreasonably in these circumstances "beyond debate."'. . . In Mullenix, the Court held that the broad propositions articulated in Garner and Graham—that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose an imminent threat—were insufficiently specific to clearly establish whether it was objectively unreasonable for the officer in question to shoot at the fleeing suspect's vehicle from an overpass, notwithstanding that other officers had set up spikes nearby, and the officer had reportedly been told to 'stand by.'. . There, however, the officer had far more information about the imminent threat posed by the fleeing suspect, who led officers 'on an 18-minute chase at speeds between 85 and 110 miles per hour,'. . . was reportedly intoxicated, 'twice during his flight had threatened to shoot police officers, and who was moments away from encountering an officer,'. . . . Thus, in that case, there was no question that a reasonable officer could have perceived an imminent threat of danger. However, where, as here, the facts viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff permit a finding that a reasonable officer would not have perceived any imminent threat to himself or others, the broader propositions of Graham and Garner suffice to clearly establish the right at issue. . . Moreover, this circuit's decision in Cupp addressed similar factual circumstances, thereby clearly establishing the right at issue in this case. . . Further, although 'qualified immunity protects actions in the "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,"'. . . '[t]here need not be a case with the exact same fact pattern or even "fundamentally similar" or "materially similar" facts,' in order to find an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Rather, 'the sine qua non of the "clearly established" inquiry is "fair warning."'. . . Officers have fair warning that they may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect where that person presents no imminent danger to the officer or others in the area. Because the video does not conclusively show whether that was the case here, Needham is not entitled to qualified immunity based on the video alone.")

Lewis v. Charter Township of Flint, 660 F. App'x 339, 347-49 (6th Cir. 2016) (Batchelder, J., dissenting) ("At the heart of the majority's analysis is its conclusion that, 'Viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, a jury could conclude from the video that a reasonable officer would not have believed [that Officer Needham] or anyone else was ever in danger.'. . No one was ever in danger? That is not the video I have reviewed.To begin with, it is simply not true that, as majority puts it,

'the video does not clearly show that Lewis "targeted" Needham when he accelerated the vehicle and attempted to flee.'. . What it actually shows is that, after he perceived that Lewis was clambering over the seat back from the back seat into the driver's seat, Officer Needham began to run in front of the car to stop Lewis from escaping, drawing his weapon. At the moment Lewis began driving forward, the road ahead of him was clear of obstacles and traffic with the exception of the presence of Officer Needham. Then, the video shows with a clarity that no reasonable juror could ignore that, as Lewis was accelerating, Needham was moving out of the car's path, eventually exiting it, at which point Lewis swerved toward him. If swerving a car at someone is not 'targeting,' I do not know what is. . . . [E]ven if it were true that Williams is not on point, and even if a reasonable jury could conclude that any threat to those in the vicinity had dissipated by the time Officer Needham entered the comparative safety of being beside the swerving car rather than in its immediate path, the fact remains that he opened fire less than one second after he had escaped from what can only be described as mortal peril. There is thus no basis for the majority's conclusion that Officer Needham violated the Constitution because, even accepting this construction of the facts, the decision to shoot was not unreasonable—it would be a quintessential example of 'a dangerous situation [that] evolved quickly to a safe one before the police officer had a chance to realize the change.'. . The majority stresses the fact that Needham lowered his gun as having some significance on this point. But they ignore the context: the video, again with indisputable clarity, reveals that Needham lowered his weapon and began moving out of the car's path as soon as Lewis began driving away and that he raised it again only after Lewis began to swerve toward him. Unlike Cupp and Godawa, which both involved material disputes about what exactly happened at the critical moments, . . . there is nothing murky or indeterminate about the video that could be construed in the plaintiff's favor here. Unlike Cupp, this is not a case where a reasonable jury could conclude that the officer was 'running towards the ... car' at the time he opened fire. . . Nor would anyone conclude that Officer Needham 'was never in the line of flight' and, hence, was 'never in any danger.'. . And unlike in Godawa, there is nothing in the record suggesting that Needham 'initiated the contact' between himself and the car, that the car 'did not drive in a manner that endangered [his] life,' or that he 'was effectively chasing' the car at the time he opened fire. . . These distinctions matter, and we are wrong to ignore them. Contrary to the majority's apparent preference here, the fact that an officer put himself in harm's way does not mean that his actions were therefore objectively unreasonable. . . Indeed, all else being equal, the decision to stand with gun drawn in front of a stationary vehicle whose driver appears to be getting ready to flee is not a constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. . . Officer Needham's split-second decision to shoot did not violate Lewis's right to be free from excessive force. He—along with all except those who are 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate the law'—is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . In refusing to grant such immunity here, the majority adds confusion not only to law of this circuit, but also to the difficult task faced by law enforcement in applying what we say is clearly established law. How exactly we expect them to conform their actions to the rule purportedly applied in this case is beyond me. I suppose they will conclude that they must stand idly by, obstructing would-be escapees with nothing more than entreaties to stop. That is not the law, nor should it be. The district court's order denying summary judgment in Officer Needham's favor should therefore be reversed.")

Jennings v. Fuller, 659 F. App'x 867, 871 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[A]s the officers point out, we analyze excessive force claims temporal segment by temporal segment. See Claybrook v. Birchwell, 274 F.3d 1098, 1104 (6th Cir. 2001). Thus, the fact that the initial takedown was clearly unconstitutional does not mean that all the officers' subsequent actions are ipso facto not protected by qualified immunity. In another circumstance, the officers might have a winning point. But after carefully reviewing the video evidence, we conclude that we cannot neatly separate the objectively reasonable wheat from the clearly unconstitutional chaff—the officers' actions and decisions fit together into a single, fluid incident that began and ended with what a reasonable jury could easily conclude were violations of Jennings's clearly established constitutional rights. A jury, not a court, will be better situated to disentangle what was and what was not excessive force. We therefore affirm the district court's decision to deny the officers' request for qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings.")

Getz v. Swoap, 833 F.3d 646, 653-56 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e have never held that an officer's failure to check for tightness or double lock handcuffs at the moment of arrest is, per se, excessive force. The analysis is, as always, fact specific and based on the totality of the circumstances. . .We hold that, given the arrestee's resistance and general noncompliance, Swoap did not violate the Fourth Amendment when he applied handcuffs without checking for tightness and double locking at the moment of arrest. Qualified immunity applies to this claim. . . . The analysis differs once an arrestee has complained that the handcuffs are too tight. In general '[t]he Fourth Amendment prohibits unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing during the course of a seizure.'. . In order for a handcuffing claim to survive summary judgment, a plaintiff must offer sufficient evidence to identify a genuine issue of material fact that (1) he complained the handcuffs were too tight; (2) the officer ignored those complaints; and (3) the plaintiff experienced 'some physical injury' resulting from the handcuffing. . . .Our excessive-force-handcuffing cases almost exclusively involve plaintiffs who were compliant and gave officers no reason to delay responding to their complaints, and we have always noted such compliance. . . .Even cases in which a noncompliant arrestee resists or flees fail to provide much guidance to officers in defining the contours of the right to be free from excessively tight handcuffing. In many of those cases we found no violation either because officers immediately responded when the arrestee complained, see, e.g., Burchett, 310 F.3d at 945, or because the arrestee failed to complain at all, see, e.g., Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 576 (6th Cir. 2005). Because these claims would have failed even if the plaintiff were compliant, we did not opine as to what effect noncompliance would have on the analysis. To the extent we have addressed cases in which an arrestee disobeys an officer, we have noted that in excessive force cases the fact of noncompliance amounts to a 'critical difference' and accordingly condoned greater use of force than we would have had the arrestee been compliant. . . .Here, it is undisputed that Getz attempted to flee, resisted arrest, belligerently continued to disobey orders after his arrest, and continued to address Swoap with abusive language. Our cases indicate that Swoap was entitled to some additional leeway in his approach to Getz as an arrestee. We hold that a reasonably competent officer could conclude that Swoap's actions were lawful. He is therefore immune from suit. . . .Recent decisions such as Baynes v.

Cleland are not to the contrary. . . In that case we attempted to clarify the line between factual questions for the jury (the reasonableness of an officer's actions) and the question whether a right is clearly established. Baynes reversed a district court's grant of summary judgment based on qualified immunity, holding that 'the district court turned the factual determinations best left to the jury into factors militating in favor of qualified immunity.'. . That is not the case here. Our focus here is not on the facts, but on the dearth of law putting an officer on notice that his treatment of a belligerent and noncompliant arrestee is unlawful. . . . Even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, it is clear that Getz was in handcuffs and compliant for a very short period of time before the handcuffs were removed. We conclude that, considering Getz's noncompliance, none of our precedents would have put Swoap on notice that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Swoap is entitled to qualified immunity for the maintenance of Getz's handcuffs.")

Thompson v. City of Lebanon, 831 F.3d 366, 371-72 (6th Cir. 2016) ("A substantial portion of the officers' brief focuses on the insufficiency of the evidence before the district court to create a material issue of fact. They claim that the evidence showed that Officer McKinley's shot was accidental, and that no evidence showed that Thompson submitted to the officers' authority. They challenge the district court's observation that Thompson may not have been conscious. We lack jurisdiction to review these arguments. Nevertheless the officers raise three legal issues which we can decide on the basis of the plaintiff's version of the facts as recognized by the district court. On each issue, we affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment. The first legal issue is whether Officer McKinley seized Thompson. . . .On these facts Officer McKinley's shot, leading as it did to Officer McDannald's shots, 'had the intended effect of contributing to [Thompson's] immediate restraint,' and under Floyd this was a seizure. . . It does not matter that the plaintiff has admitted that Officer McKinley's bullet did not hit Thompson. . . The district court correctly applied Floyd to the plaintiff's version of the facts, and we affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on this issue. The second legal issue is whether Officer McKinley's actions—as described by the plaintiff's evidence—were objectively unreasonable, and whether the law clearly established that unreasonableness at the time of the incident. Again, on the plaintiff's version of the facts, the answer to both questions is 'yes.' The officers concede that 'Thompson made no efforts to flee the vehicle, and that[ ] the total time during which McKinley exited his vehicle, ran towards the crash site, descended the embankment, gave Thompson two commands, and wielded and discharged his weapon was less than fifteen seconds.'. . And as we have already noted, the plaintiff presented evidence that Officer McKinley fired his weapon intentionally. It is clearly established that using deadly force against a suspect who does not pose a threat to anyone and is not committing a crime or attempting to evade arrest violates the suspect's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The third and final legal issue presented on appeal is whether Officer McDannald's actions were objectively unreasonable, and whether the law was clearly established. Again, looking at the plaintiff's version of the facts, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity. If a jury were to believe the plaintiff's version of the events, it could find that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that firing thirteen rounds into Thompson's vehicle and person violated his Fourth Amendment rights 'when Thompson had been seen to do nothing more than flee from police during the vehicular pursuit for potential driving under the influence.'")

Rucinski v. County of Oakland, 655 F. App'x 338, 342-43 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Rucinski asks us to ignore our 'segmented approach' to analyzing Fourth Amendment excessive force claims, whereby we are required to evaluate the reasonableness of officers' use of force by focusing on the moments immediately preceding that use of force, Livermore ex rel. Rohm v. Lubelan, 476 F.3d 397, 406 (6th Cir. 2007), and not on the adequacy of planning or the length of time spent thinking through the problem at hand. Rucinski asks us to consider instead whether the deputies' lack of full investigation, poor planning, and alleged bad tactics in initiating contact with Rucinski either provoked Rucinski or created the circumstances that led to Beltz and McCann's use of force. Rucinski argues that we should abandon the 'segmented approach' because it improperly operates to protect officers that proactively create a need for force that would not have otherwise existed, and reminds us that other circuits have adopted approaches that scrutinize whether officers created a provocation or other circumstances that led to officers' subsequent use of deadly force. . . .Although this may present a close question and send more excessive force cases to the jury for trial, see, e.g., Young v. City of Providence ex rel. Napolitano, 404 F.3d 4, 22 (1st Cir. 2005) (stating that jury properly considered "events leading up to the shooting" in an excessive force case), we may not disregard this Court's long-standing practice of analyzing excessive force claims in segments. See, e.g., Lubelan, 476 F.3d at 406 ("The proper approach under Sixth Circuit precedent is to view excessive force claims in segments."); Dickerson v. McClellan, 101 F.3d 1151, 1162 (6th Cir. 1996) (using the segmented approach to analyze an excessive force claim). And in any event, even if we were able to consider whether the deputies, through their lack of planning and alleged bad tactics in initiating contact with Rucinski, created circumstances that led to McCann's use of deadly force, the Supreme Court has recently weighed in on this very issue, stating that plaintiffs 'cannot establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.' City & Cnty. of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1777 (2015) (internal quotation marks omitted) (applying without adopting the Ninth Circuit law in Billington, 292 F.3d at 1190).")

[On segmenting approach, see also Scozzari v. City of Clare, 653 F. App'x 412, 419-21 (6th Cir. 2016) ("In our circuit, we 'view excessive force claims in segments.'. . Time-frame 'is a crucial aspect' of segmentation. . . 'We measure the reasonableness of the use of deadly force at a particular time based on an objective assessment of the danger a suspect poses at that moment.' Mullins v. Cyranek, 805 F.3d 760, 766 (6th Cir. 2015) . . . Consequently, '[w]here the events preceding the shooting occurred in close temporal proximity to the shooting, those events have been considered in analyzing whether excessive force was used.'. .In Dickerson v. McClellan for instance, the decedent's estate brought two § 1983 claims, one for the officers' violation of the knock-and-announce rule, and another for their use of excessive force once inside the home. . . Like plaintiff Scozzari, the Dickerson plaintiffs claimed 'the officers should be held accountable for creating the need to use excessive force by their unreasonable unannounced entry.'. . We disagreed. 'Although both claims are premised on Fourth Amendment violations, the violation of the knock and announce rule is conceptually distinct from the excessive force claim.'. . . Plaintiff's proposed instruction—that the jury consider whether defendants' 'actions unreasonably add[ed] to, or increase[d], the risk that force might be used'—runs contrary to Dickerson and the cases that follow it. . . .The district court's instructions properly focused on that question. First, the court 'identif[ied] the "seizure" at issue,'—i.e., the apprehension of Scozzari. . . Then, as dictated in Livermore . . . and Dickerson, . . . the court asked the jury to examine whether 'the force used to effect that seizure'—in this case, lethal force—was 'objectively unreasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances that existed,' 'at the door of Cabin 17 on September the 18th, 2007, ... and not the events that preceded that circumstance.'. . . The alleged excessive force plaintiff claims defendants used in this case was lethal force, and only lethal force. Plaintiff failed to raise claims concerning any excessive force used prior to the shooting until Scozzari II. Thus, in response to the jury's questions, the district court correctly instructed that '[w]hile you may consider the events that occurred in close proximity' to the deadly force, 'the question framed for you'—as plaintiff chose to frame it—'only relates to the officers' decision to use lethal force.'. . . Plaintiff contends that the court's instructions are out of step with Claybrook v. Birchwell, 274 F.3d 1098 (6th Cir. 2001), a case involving officers who mistook the armed decedent for a robber and shot him while he escorted his daughter-in-law outside of the store where she worked. . . . Dickerson, the court explained, required separation of the first segment, despite the fact that the officers approached Claybrook 'in clear contravention of Metro Nashville Police Department policy.'. . The second and third segments, by contrast, had to be considered together because 'the plaintiffs brought suit to contest all use of deadly force against their deceased father, not only the shot that took his life.'. . Regardless of whether the second round of fire was justified after Claybrook ran behind the steps and took aim at the officers, 'the defendants cannot ignore the fact that the shots were fired at Claybrook twice on the night in question.'. . How plaintiff believes Claybrook advances his claim to a new trial is unclear. Rather, we agree with the district court's assessment: 'As applied here, Claybrook only reinforces the legal authority for segmenting the incidents occurring at the door of Cabin 17 from those that took place before. The Officers' approach to the cabin and their attempt to open the door were not applications of deadly force, and so Claybrook does not require their consideration when determining whether the eventual application of deadly force was reasonable.' The events in this case are also more easily divided than those in Claybrook because plaintiff divided them. Here, in Scozzari I, plaintiff disputes only defendants' use of lethal force against Scozzari. He failed to raise claims relating to their use of non-lethal force until the later-filed Scozzari II. Directing the jury to consider 'the circumstances at the door of Cabin 17' where defendants actually initiated the use of deadly force, 'and not the events that preceded that circumstance,' is therefore consistent with Claybrook and the manner in which plaintiff presented his claims. We are hard pressed to find fault with the district court's reminder that 'the question framed for you only relates to the officers' decision to use lethal force,' when plaintiff did the framing. Finally, plaintiff relies on our observation in Kirby v. Duva, that '[w]here a police officer unreasonably places himself in harm's way, his use of deadly force may be deemed excessive.' 530 F.3d 475, 482 (6th Cir. 2008). He takes this statement out of context. While reviewing the district court's denial of qualified immunity, the Kirby court reached this conclusion after pointing out that 'no one was ever in danger under the facts as presented by [the] plaintiffs.'. . Indeed, immediately before the above statement, the court remarked that '[e]ven in this final position ... [the defendant officer] was still two feet to the [vehicle's] side, and thus not in its path.'. . Kirby stands only for the proposition that an officer should refrain from applying deadly force in the absence of a risk of harm to himself or others—it does not raise a question over the district court's segmentation."); Hood v. Bare, No. 2:17-CV-471, 2021 WL 5014532, at *2 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 28, 2021) ("Plaintiff moves to exclude as irrelevant the background, experience, and training of Officers Bare and Rosen. . . Defendants claim this evidence will 'establish the reasons and manner' in which the Officers fired their guns at Green' and show why the Officers believed Green posed a serious threat of physical harm at all times they were shooting at Green. . . The Court finds the Officers' background, experience, and training provides context and is relevant to whether they acted reasonably and stopped shooting at Green after he was no longer a physical threat. Courts in the Sixth Circuit do not categorically exclude this evidence in § 1983 claims. . . The Officers' training may be considered by the jury so long as the training policies are not 'understood to define the constitutional boundaries by which an officer's conduct is to be judged.'. .Instead, the 'reasonableness' of the Officers' use of force under the Fourth Amendment involves looking to the 'facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . The question is 'whether the totality of the circumstances justifie[s] a particular sort of…seizure.'. . Plaintiff's motion to exclude the Officers' trainings, background, and experience is DENIED to the extent the evidence is used for a proper purpose as explained above. . . . Plaintiff moves to exclude evidence of anything occurring before the 'Last Shots' as irrelevant and misleading. This includes evidence of the police first encountering Green, how the shooting between Green, Bare, and Rosen began, and the first portion of the shooting, referred to as the 'Initial Shots.' This evidence supported the decision of the Sixth Circuit that found that the Initial Shots did not constitute excessive force in violation of Mr. Green's constitutional rights. The Court will provide a limiting instruction to the jury as to the purpose for which this evidence may be utilized. That is, the evidence is important to give the jury context of the 'Last Shots.' Jurors 'who hear a story...may be puzzled at the missing chapters.'")]

Kelly v. Sines, 647 F. App'x 572, 576-77 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Kelly argues that Sines acted unreasonably by tasing him because he was restrained by his seatbelt during the entire incident. But when Sines fired his taser, it was not at all clear that Kelly was still wearing his seatbelt. After Sines removed Kelly from the truck, Kelly immediately sprang up to his feet on the pavement of the road outside of the truck, and a reasonable officer making a split-second judgment could have concluded, mistakenly, that Kelly's seatbelt was unfastened. It was only after Sines tried to pull Kelly to the ground for the second time that he appeared to realize that Kelly was still being restrained by his seatbelt. Kelly also argues that when he stood up outside the truck, he was attempting to comply with Sines's orders. However, even if we assume that Kelly had no intention of harming or resisting Sines, Sines had no idea what Kelly's subjective intentions were at the time Kelly stood up. Perhaps Kelly stood up because he wanted to untangle his seatbelt, but perhaps he wanted to attack Sines. A reasonable officer acting in the heat of the moment would not have known what Kelly was going to do next, given his erratic behavior inside the truck. As such, it was not unreasonable for Sines to use a taser to subdue Kelly. . . Kelly's final argument with respect to Sines is that Sines's second firing of his taser was unjustified. . . After Sines first used his taser on Kelly, he told Kelly three times to get on the ground, before saying, 'I'll do it again!' Kelly did not get on the ground, and at no point did Kelly give any indication that he was trying to—or was unable to—comply with Sines's orders. Given Kelly's noncompliance, and the fact that Sines was standing in the middle of a lane on the highway, a reasonable officer making a split-second decision could have thought that Kelly posed enough of a threat to warrant a second use of the taser. In light of the rapidly unfolding and potentially dangerous situation, Sines's second firing of his taser was not unreasonable. In hindsight, Deputy Sines's actions seem excessive, given that Kelly was restrained by his seatbelt during the entire incident. But the Fourth Amendment does not require us to scrutinize officers' actions 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . While Sines's split-second judgment may have proved wrong, his mistake was one that a reasonable officer could have made, given the 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' circumstances. . . As such, his conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and he is entitled to qualified immunity.") Rush v. City of Lansing, 644 F. App'x 415, 422-25 (6th Cir. 2016) ("In the time since the district court issued its decision, we decided two cases clarifying Sixth Circuit law with regard to the reasonableness of deadly force. See, e.g., Mullins, 805 F.3d 760; Pollard, 780 F.3d 395. Mullins, in particular, is persuasive here, as we held that it was not unreasonable for an officer to fire two shots in the five seconds after a suspect was no longer a threat. . . . Turning to this case, once the relevant facts are determined and all reasonable inferences are drawn in favor of the plaintiff, 'the question whether the [officer]'s actions were objectively unreasonable is a "pure question of law."'. . The district court based its conclusion that Clay no longer posed a threat, and that therefore Officer Rendon's actions were objectively unreasonable, on a number of facts. Clay was 'very small,' approximately 5′4″ and 125 pounds, and was seventeen years old. She was on her knees and about a foot out of arm's reach. She had just been shot in the stomach, and the police outnumbered her three-to-one. Following the first shot, Clay moved either forward or backward, but made no further moves to stab or injure any of the officers. But that is not all the record shows. The officers were in a confined space (a small room in a dark bank) with Clay. The second shot occurred just after Clay unquestionably did pose a threat by slashing at Rendon with a knife, and the second shot occurred very shortly after the first. Whether Clay slumped forward or backward following the first shot, there was no clear or unmistakable surrender, or any other action that would compellingly show that the threat had abated. Moreover, Clay's assault with the knife—a knife she produced unexpectedly from inside her coat—occurred after the officers had subdued and apparently disarmed her of her scissors from her first assault, and was accompanied by her misleading pleas of 'I'm sorry, I'm sorry.' Taking all of the record facts into account, Rendon was justified in remaining apprehensive of further deception and threat from Clay. Thus, it was not unreasonable for Officer Rendon to continue using deadly force. . . . Based on the record evidence, it was not unreasonable for Rendon to perceive Clay as still posing a threat when he fired the second shot, even if he was ultimately mistaken in making a split-second assessment. We therefore hold that Rendon's use of deadly force was not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances and that no constitutional violation occurred. . . .Moreover, the right here was not clearly established in light of the many cases, including cases in our circuit, where courts have held that it was not unreasonable for officers to continue using deadly force—even mistakenly—when the officer had been faced with a severe threat in a rapidly-changing situation seconds before and the circumstances did not indicate that the threat had abated. . . Absent controlling authority, we require 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to constitute clearly established law. . . We lack controlling authority here, and any robust consensus of cases is manufactured at too high a level of generality. Accordingly, we hold that Rendon did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.")

Rush v. City of Lansing, 644 F. App'x 415, 425-27 (6th Cir. 2016) (Stranch, J., dissenting) ("Derrinesha Clay was 17 years old at the time of her death. The district court found that when police officers first discovered Clay—'a very small woman at approximately 125 pounds and 5′4″ in height'—hiding in a storage closet and holding a pair of scissors, Clay 'was frantic, shaking, and saying "I'm sorry, I'm sorry."'. . The court further found that when Officer Brian Rendon later fired a bullet into Clay's head, killing her, Clay was 'on her knees more than [an] arm's length from Defendant Rendon. She had just been shot in the stomach. She was outnumbered three-to-one by the police.'. . And, '[a]ccording to two police officers,' she 'made no sudden moves to stab or otherwise injure an officer or herself.'. . Officer Rendon testified, by contrast, that after he shot Clay in the stomach she lunged at him with a knife which is why he shot her a second time. . . .I am therefore inclined to agree with the district court in the present case that, construing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, as we must, any reasonable officer would have known that shooting Clay in the head when she did not pose an immediate threat and was not actively resisting violated her right to be free from excessive force. Finally, our circuit recognizes that in the 'typical' qualified immunity case, 'we defer to the district court's factual determinations' and 'ideally ... look no further than the district court's opinion for the facts and inferences cited expressly therein.'. . Derrinesha Clay is not alive to contest the timing of the two shots Officer Rendon fired into her body. And the district court declined to draw any inferences in Officer Rendon's favor based on his and his fellow officers' testimony that the two gunshots were very close together, determining instead that there existed disputes of material fact among the officers regarding Clay's actions in the time intervening between the shots. The district court's approach adheres to our precedent, which holds that when determining qualified immunity in cases where the witness most likely to contradict a defendant officer's story is the person shot dead, we ' "may not simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer."'. . Instead, we ' "must look at the circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story[.]"'. . Some of the evidence tending to discredit Officer Rendon's account of Clay's threatening behavior comes from his fellow police officers present at the scene. On this record, I would defer to the district court's determination that summary judgment is inappropriate in this case.")

Coitrone v. Murray, 642 F. App'x 517, 520-22 & n.2 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The district court properly determined that Coomes's use of force did not violate Coitrone's Fourth Amendment rights. Assuming that Coomes intentionally struck Coitrone's motorcycle, Coomes's use of force was objectively reasonable because the governmental interest in ending the immediate and substantial risk that Coitrone's flight posed to the public outweighed the substantial intrusion that Coomes's use of force imposed upon Coitrone's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Even though 'intentionally ramming a motorcycle with a police cruiser involves the application of potentially deadly force,'. . . and the intrusion imposed on Coitrone's Fourth Amendment interests was substantial, the governmental interest in ending Coitrone's flight outweighed this intrusion because the undisputed facts establish that his flight posed a substantial and immediate danger to the public. In Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court held that law enforcement's use of force that poses 'a high likelihood of serious injury or death' to a fleeing individual is reasonable when that force is used in an attempt to terminate a chase that poses 'a substantial and immediate risk of serious physical injury to others.'. . .The undisputed facts establish that Coitrone, similar to the plaintiff in Scott, drove recklessly during the pursuit by driving his motorcycle as fast as 65 to 70 miles per hour, exceeding the speed limit by as much as 25 miles per hour, crossing the double-yellow line, and driving in the left lane of a two-lane road in order to pass vehicles traveling in the right lane. The undisputed facts also establish that Coitrone's reckless driving, like the actions of the plaintiff in Scott, posed an immediate and substantial danger to the safety of innocent bystanders because portions of the chase occurred in areas in which other drivers and pedestrians were present. Accordingly, the undisputed facts establish that Coomes's use of potentially deadly force against Coitrone was objectively reasonable because Coitrone, like the plaintiff in Scott, initiated a chase that posed a 'substantial and immediate risk of serious physical injury to others.'. . . Coitrone contends that he did not pose an immediate threat to others because at the time that the collision occurred 'heavy traffic ... made any further flight by Coitrone obviously impossible and required Coitrone to begin slowing to a stop.' This assertion fails because unlike the collision in Walker, which occurred in the middle of the night on an empty field, the collision here occurred on a Sunday morning near a church at which pedestrians and other drivers were present. Further, prior to the collision, Coitrone had exhibited a willingness to endanger others by driving recklessly in order to evade the police. A reasonable officer in Coomes's position would therefore be justified in believing that Coitrone might seriously injure these innocent bystanders by continuing to drive recklessly even though Coitrone had slowed down before he was struck. Accordingly, Coitrone's reliance on Walker is misplaced because Coitrone, unlike the motorcyclist in Walker, posed a substantial and immediate danger to innocent bystanders at the time of the collision. Coitrone also claims that Coomes's alleged violations of KSP policy during the pursuit establish that Coomes's use of force was objectively unreasonable. This argument fails because even if Coomes violated KSP policy during the pursuit, Coomes's violations of KSP policy would not establish that his use of force was unconstitutional. . . .Because Coomes did not violate Coitrone's constitutional rights, we do not reach the issue of whether Coomes is protected from liability by the doctrine of qualified immunity, except to note the Supreme Court's recent observation that the 'Court has thus never found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone to be a basis for denying qualified immunity.' Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S.Ct. 305, 310 (2015).")

Kent v. Oakland Cty., 810 F.3d 384, 392-97 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Citing Eldridge v. City of Warren, 533 F. App'x 529 (6th Cir.2013), the deputies insist that Kent was actively resisting arrest because he refused to comply with their commands to calm down and demonstrated 'verbal hostility.'. . After comparing and contrasting taser cases from this circuit, the Eldridge court noted that active resistance could be characterized as 'noncompliance' that is coupled with 'some outward manifestation—either verbal or physical—on the part of the suspect [that] suggest[s] volitional and conscious defiance.'. . . Kent never attempted to flee officers, and he never attempted to prevent officers from handcuffing him. Rather, much like the claimant in Goodwin, who, like Kent, refused to comply with an officer's command and verbally indicated as much, Kent's conduct does not resemble the 'continued resistance and hostility' often present in our active resistance cases[.] . . . Here, the deputies knew they were responding to a natural death investigation and were aware that Kent's father had just passed away some fifteen minutes before they arrived. . . They were also well aware—perhaps most importantly—that the entire incident occurred in Kent's home, one of the most sacred of spaces under the Fourth Amendment's protections. . . Of course, officers are not precluded from using reasonable force in that setting, and it can sometimes be justified in the face of active resistance or an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others. . . Those circumstances, however, were largely absent when Kent was tased in his guest bedroom. Carefully balancing the unique facts presented in this totality-of-the-circumstances analysis, we conclude that 'the nature and quality of the intrusion on [Kent's] Fourth Amendment interest[s]' outweighs 'the countervailing governmental interests at stake.'. . Deputy Lopez's use of a taser was objectively unreasonable here. . . .[W]e turn to whether, in September 2013, it was clearly established that it was excessive force to tase an individual who refused to comply with officers' commands to calm down and yelled at emergency responders, but was never told he was under arrest, never demonstrated physical violence, and had his arms in the air and his back to the wall when tased. Under recent precedent assessing the state of the law in 2010, we must answer that question in the affirmative. It is clearly established in this Circuit that 'the use of a Taser on a non-resistant suspect' constitutes excessive force. . . Conversely, it is also clearly established that tasing a suspect who 'actively resists arrest and refuses to be handcuffed' does not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Relying again on Eldridge's statement that active resistance involves 'noncompliance ... paired with [ ] signs of verbal hostility,' Eldridge, 533 F. App'x at 535, the deputies argue it was clearly established that Kent's failure to comply with commands to calm down amounted to 'physical defiance' and his shouts at the deputies and EMTs amounted to 'verbal belligerence,' such that he was 'actively resisting arrest.' But in Goodwin, we recently rejected that very argument. Instead, we held that, as of June of 2010, it was clearly established that the use of a taser in response to very similar behavior—refusing to comply with commands to leave an apartment and saying as much to officers, when the claimant was never told he was under arrest and posed little safety threat to officers—constituted excessive force. . . If the claimant in Goodwin had a clearly established right to be free from the use of a taser in 2010, then it must be said that Kent had the same clearly established right in September 2013. . . .Accepting Kent's version of the facts and based on the law before us, we must conclude that Kent—a man who yelled at officers and refused to comply with commands to calm down, but was never told that he was under arrest, never demonstrated physical violence, and had his arms in the air and his back to the wall when tased—had a right to be free from the use of a taser under these circumstances, and in September 2013, ' "t]he contours of [that] right [were] sufficiently clear"' to the deputies. In his thoughtful dissent, Judge Suhrheinrich suggests that we should look to guidance in the Eleventh Circuit with respect to the facts that give rise to a constitutional deprivation. But surely it demands too much from law enforcement personnel to be aware of the 'clearly established' holdings of other circuits. Where Sixth Circuit law is clear, it controls. [citing Higgason]")

Kent v. Oakland Cty., 810 F.3d 384, 398-402 (6th Cir. 2016) (Suhrheinrich, J., dissenting) ("Because I believe the majority analyzes the deputies' conduct through the lens of hindsight in denying them qualified immunity, I dissent. . . . Neither Caie nor Goodwin . . . establishes that Kent's aggressive and arguably threatening behavior posed mere passive resistance. Although Kent was not intoxicated, did not threaten the officers or EMTs with physical harm, and did not run from the police like the plaintiff in Caie, his behavior was equally volatile. He obstructed emergency medical treatment, disobeyed the officers' orders when they attempted to allow the EMTs to perform their duties, placed the EMTs in fear of violence, and goaded the police officers into using physical force. . . Reacting to the perceived medical emergency and the threat of physical interference with medical personnel, Deputy Lopez reasonably used a single five-second Taser cycle to deescalate Kent's aggression and restore order[.] . . . An Eleventh Circuit case presents a closer factual scenario to this case than either Caie or Goodwin and confirms that Deputy Lopez's decision to tase Kent did not violate the Constitution. [discussing Draper v. Reynolds] Here too, Kent was hostile and uncooperative, accused both the EMTs and officers of 'assault[ing]' his father, ignored repeated commands to calm down and exit the room, and yelled at everyone around him. As Draper indicates, just because Kent was not told he was under arrest, never expressly threatened to use violence, and never physically resisted the officers does not mean he could disobey and verbally antagonize the officers with impunity. Notably, the majority does not suggest what Deputy Lopez should have done instead of tasing Kent. A key reason judges should give deference to officers' judgment in difficult scenarios like this one is the inability of courts to recommend an alternative course of action for police officers. . . . Kent's irate overreaction created a stressful, difficult situation that forced Deputy Lopez to make a split-second, perhaps imperfect, but nevertheless reasonable judgment to subdue Kent by tasing. Kent should not be allowed to recover now because he believes Deputy Lopez's judgment was mistaken. Because I find Deputy Lopez's use of the Taser to subdue Kent did not violate the Constitution under the version of facts most favorable to Kent, I would reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Deputies Lopez and Maher.")

Foster v. Patrick, 806 F.3d 883, 887-90 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The ultimate question is whether Patrick had an objectively reasonable belief that Foster posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm to him or others when he shot Foster. . .If the answer is no, then the use of deadly force violated Foster's Fourth Amendment right. . . According to Leonard, Foster had assaulted a police officer without using a weapon; the struggle between Patrick and Foster had terminated; and Foster was fleeing at the time Patrick shot her. '[W]hile such action by a suspect justifies force, it does not justify deadly force, especially when the struggle has concluded and the suspect is in flight.'. . The facts viewed in the light most favorable to Leonard demonstrate that Patrick may have shot Foster before she stole the police cruiser. However, even assuming Foster committed a second crime by stealing the cruiser before she was shot, this action alone does not justify Patrick's use of deadly force. See Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 773 (6th Cir.2005) ("Although there was some danger to the public from [the suspect's] driving off in a stolen police car, the danger presented by [the suspect] was not so grave as to justify the use of deadly force."). Even without the benefit of hindsight, a jury could reasonably conclude that neither Patrick nor anyone else was in danger when he shot thirteen or fourteen rounds at Foster—eight of which actually struck Foster. . . . Even assuming that Foster assaulted Patrick, Foster had ceased that conduct and was attempting to flee when Patrick shot her. No one was in Foster's line of flight when she fled in the police cruiser. Finally, Patrick argues that Foster had access to two deadly weapons inside the police cruiser: a loaded shotgun above the driver's seat and a loaded rifle in the trunk. But nothing from the facts suggests that Foster knew about the weapons in the police cruiser or attempted to gain access to either of them. Furthermore, this court has previously acknowledged the danger presented when a suspect 'driv[es] off in a stolen police car,' but has concluded that such danger, without more, is 'not so grave as to justify the use of deadly force.' Cupp, 430 F.3d at 773. Moreover, 'the officer must have reason to believe that the car presents an imminent danger.' Id. at 775. Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Leonard, Patrick did not have reason to believe that Foster would use the police cruiser or the weapons in compartments inside the cruiser to injure anyone. . . . [H]ere, unlike in Plumhoff, this circuit's precedent establishes with sufficient particularity that under the facts herein, Patrick could not shoot Foster as a suspected felon who was unarmed. Furthermore, there is a factual dispute about how violent the encounter between Patrick and Foster was prior to Foster's flight and Patrick's decision to shoot Foster. Finally, '[n]o subsequent controlling precedent has diminished the clarity of Cupp's holding or its applicability to the present case.' Godawa, 798 F.3d at 468. Because the violent encounter between Foster and Patrick had concluded and Foster was merely fleeing in a police cruiser without any indication that she would harm Patrick or anyone else with the cruiser when she was shot, Cupp and Bouggess clearly establish Foster's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .In sum, genuine disputes of material fact exist regarding the events that occurred when Patrick shot Foster. Under Leonard's version of the facts, a reasonable juror could conclude that Patrick's use of deadly force violated Foster's clearly established constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, the district court properly denied summary judgment.")

Mullins v. Cyranek, 805 F.3d 760, 766-69 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The question of whether it was reasonable for Cyranek to believe that Mullins posed a significant threat at the time Mullins was shot is the crux of this appeal. In excessive force cases, the threat factor is 'a minimum requirement for the use of deadly force,' meaning deadly force 'may be used only if the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of severe physical harm.'. . On appeal, Cyranek concedes that he shot Mullins only after Mullins threw his gun, but he maintains that the confrontation unfolded in such rapid succession that he did not have a chance to realize that a potentially dangerous situation had evolved into a safe one. . . . Here, it is undisputed that within a five-second span, Mullins removed a previously concealed firearm without any direction from Cyranek to do so, threw the weapon over Cyranek's shoulder after being commanded to drop it, and was then shot at twice and struck once by Cyranek. Importantly, all of these events transpired in the early evening hours in a breezeway leading onto Fountain Square, a populated city square with shops, restaurants, hotels, and offices in downtown Cincinnati. . . . While Cyranek's decision to shoot Mullins after he threw his weapon may appear unreasonable in the 'sanitized world of our imagination,'. . . Cyranek was faced with a rapidly escalating situation, and his decision to use deadly force in the face of a severe threat to himself and the public was reasonable. . . The fact that Mullins was actually unarmed when he was shot is irrelevant to the reasonableness inquiry in this case. . . Because only a few seconds passed between when Mullins brandished his firearm and when Cyranek shot Mullins, a reasonable officer in the same situation could have fired with the belief that Mullins still had the gun in his hand. . . While hindsight reveals that Mullins was no longer a threat when he was shot, we do not think it is prudent to deny police officers qualified immunity in situations where they are faced with a threat of severe physical injury or death and must make split-second decisions, albeit ultimately mistaken decisions, about the amount of force necessary to subdue such a threat. . . Our reasoning applies equally to both of the shots fired by Cyranek. We have previously held that '[w]hen an officer faces a situation in which he could justifiably shoot, he does not retain the right to shoot at any time thereafter with impunity.'. . Here, however, Cyranek's second shot did not come at a time after which a reasonable officer would think the threat had passed. . . . Here, we find that at the time he fired both shots, it was reasonable for Cyranek to perceive Mullins as a serious threat to himself and others. That conclusion, coupled with the other reasonableness factors compels us to conclude that Cyranek's use of deadly force was reasonable under the circumstances. Our opinion should not be taken to condone the whole of Cyranek's behavior. Indeed, we find some of Cyranek's conduct problematic, particularly his failure to alert any other officers before physically confronting Mullins, and his decision, following the shooting, to alter the scene by moving Mullins's gun closer to his body. However, these misjudgments are not relevant to his qualified immunity defense. As noted above, we must analyze the reasonableness of an officer's use of deadly force based on an 'objective assessment of the danger a suspect poses at that moment.'. . We cannot say that during the critical moments just after Mullins drew his gun Cyranek's actions were unreasonable. At a minimum, we believe that reasonable officers could disagree about what force was necessary in this situation. And, thus, we find that no constitutional violation occurred and that Cyranek is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Al-Lamadani v. Lang, 624 F. App'x 405, 416-18 (6th Cir. 2015) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur with the majority on the unlawful-seizure and failure-to-train claims. As for the excessive-force claim, however, the lead opinion falls into the same trap as the opinion in Morrison v. Board of Trustees of Green Township, 583 F.3d 394 (6th Cir.2009): it conflates the two-step qualified immunity analysis. Because the Supreme Court has disavowed the former manner of handling these claims, in which a court's determination on the merits would dictate the result on qualified immunity, this court must follow the Supreme Court's mandates rather than its own. A failure to do so creates a constitutional requirement for police officers to investigate every handcuff-related complaint. Because the majority's analysis contradicts the Supreme Court's clear guidance on the issue, reaching the wrong result in the process, I respectfully dissent. The majority roots its holding in both Morrison and the long line of cases on which Morrison relied 'in which [this court] held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if the plaintiff has shown a factual dispute as to whether the plaintiff complained that the cuffs were too tight, the officer ignored the complaints, and the plaintiff was injured from the

cuffs.'. . . In Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), the Supreme Court mandated that courts must look at two distinct questions when determining whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity: first, 'whether a constitutional right would have been violated on the facts alleged' and second, 'whether the right was clearly established.'. . .Thus, to the extent that Morrison, despite its being decided after Saucier, conflates the merits and the qualified-immunity inquiries, it is inappropriate to rely on that case as dispositive. And it appears that this is exactly what Morrison did. The court affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity because it ruled that '[Morrison] has offered sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding each element of the handcuffing test.'. . This is precisely what the Supreme Court in Saucier held to be improper. Instead of Morrison, we should follow the Saucier-compliant precedent of O'Malley v. City of Flint, 652 F.3d 662 (6th Cir.2011). In that case, we noted that even when a plaintiff makes a sufficient showing to survive summary judgment on the underlying excessive-force claim, 'a defendant officer may still be entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity if it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that he was violating the plaintiff's rights.'. . We further noted that 'our precedents fail to notify officers that any response to a complaint of tight handcuffing other than an immediate one constitutes excessive force.'. . The majority held that Morrison and the cases on which Morrison relied 'clearly establish that a plaintiff can make a showing of a constitutional violation based on evidence of the plaintiff's complaint, the officer's refusal to respond, and the plaintiff's injury.'. . This does exactly what O'Malley called unreasonable: it obligates all officers in the future to stop and investigate each and every utterance of discomfort, or else face the specter of a jury trial on an excessive-force claim. Because qualified immunity is meant to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,'. . forcing every officer who does not investigate every utterance of discomfort—no matter how miniscule the complaint or how little time has passed—to go to trial is plainly inappropriate. Instead, we must look to whether 'the contours of a right are sufficiently clear' that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . .Here, we have a situation in which an officer handcuffed a man in his home for about fifteen minutes, the man complained just once that his handcuffs were too tight, and the handcuffs left a small red mark that bruised. The cases in which we have found qualified immunity inappropriate featured much more egregious facts. . . The cases in which we have found qualified immunity appropriate, on the other hand, were for shorter time periods or featured less noticeable injuries. . . While there are differences between our case and the cases in which qualified immunity was found appropriate—most notably that both Fettes and Lee featured a discrete time period for the handcuffing while the police car drove to the station, as opposed to our case where the handcuffing was seemingly indefinite in the moment—our case is much more factually similar to Fettes and Lee than it is to the Morrison line of cases. . . . Because the time period was so short, the injury so small, and the complaint so minimal, a contrary holding would clearly establish exactly what O'Malley feared: a requirement that every officer investigate every utterance of discomfort. If qualified immunity does not protect Officer Lang, it protects no police officer from a jury trial on an excessive-force claim premised on handcuffing. The underlying excessive-force claim and the qualified-immunity inquiry have two different analyses in view. The underlying excessive-force claim asks whether Officer Lang was objectively unreasonable in his use of handcuffs, such that he violated al-

Lamadani's constitutional rights. The district court denied summary judgment on that claim, holding that there was a genuine dispute of material fact as to the officer's reasonableness. The qualified immunity inquiry, however, asks a slightly, but significantly, different question. It asks whether every reasonable officer would have known that he was violating al-Lamadani's constitutional rights through the use of handcuffs in this factual situation. It cares about more than one officer's reasonableness; it looks to every officer's reasonableness. Because the majority conflated the two analyses, and because I believe that this situation falls at the very least in the 'hazy border' between excessive and acceptable force such that a reasonable officer would have thought himself not to be violating al-Lamadani's rights, I respectfully dissent from the majority's excessive-force ruling.")

Baynes v. Cleland, 799 F.3d 600, 611-16 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In Hope, the Supreme Court established that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the precise factual scenario need not have been found unconstitutional for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right—that is, for the right to be 'clearly established.'. . In fact, the Supreme Court determined that government officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. . . .To be sure, the Supreme Court also has also explained that generalizations and abstract propositions are insufficient to establish the law clearly. . . .Reading these cases together, the Supreme Court has made clear that the sine qua non of the 'clearly established' inquiry is 'fair warning.'. . While it is apparent that courts should not define clearly established law at a high level of generality, it is equally apparent that this does not mean that 'a case directly on point' is required. . . In fact, under Hope, a requirement that a prior case be 'fundamentally' or 'materially' similar to the present case would be too rigid an application of the clearly established inquiry. . . Rather, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, although the specific conduct need not have been found unconstitutional. . . Our task, then, is to determine whether the contours of the right at issue have been made sufficiently clear to give a reasonable official fair warning that the conduct at issue was unconstitutional. This test has been applied, both explicitly and implicitly, in our own jurisprudence. . . In applying this test, both pre- and post-Hope, we have found that freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a clearly established right for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .The extent of case law in this Circuit suffices to put a reasonable officer on notice that excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a constitutional violation under the Fourth Amendment. The cases in this Circuit place it beyond peradventure that such a right exists; thus, the law is sufficiently clear for the purpose of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. These cases define the right that is clearly established not at a high level of generality or on the basis of a broad historical proposition, . . . but rather, in a particularized context: excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing, a type of excessive force, is a type of Fourth Amendment violation, which, in turn, is a constitutional violation. This level of particularity in defining the constitutional right easily meets the standards set out by the Supreme Court, which requires that the contours of a right to be sufficiently clear under preexisting law. . . Although the court first found the constitutional right at issue clearly established in this Circuit, in its subsequent pursuit of what it called a 'more particularized inquiry,' it then determined that the law had not been clearly established, essentially because no prior case presented the exact factual circumstances present in this case. The factual nuances the district court noted to distinguish Baynes' case from this Court's extensive precedent on unduly tight handcuffing amount to precisely the kind of rigidity the Supreme Court foreclosed in Hope. Hope was unequivocal in mandating that precise factual similarity is not required . . . . In this case, under the guise of determining whether the law regarding excessively forceful handcuffing is clearly established, the district court essentially made a determination of whether it believed that Deputy Cleland's behavior was reasonable—in other words, whether the deputy should be liable for a claim of unduly tight or excessive handcuffing. But such a determination infringes on the province of the jury and is therefore improper. The trial court had already determined—appropriately so—that Baynes had adduced sufficient evidence to state a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. Indeed, Baynes had established already that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the deputies acted objectively reasonably. Then, a few pages later, the district court decided that, based on its view of the facts, there was an 'absence of ... egregious, abusive, or malicious conduct' that 'support[ed] the reasonableness of the deputy's conduct.' Such a determination is inappropriate under a 'clearly established' analysis. Once a plaintiff demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there has been a constitutional violation, by making out a claim of excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive summary judgment, weighing the evidence and determining whether an officer should be liable are tasks exclusively for the jury. In this case, however, the district court turned the factual determinations best left to the jury into factors militating in favor of qualified immunity. That is not the role of the district court in analyzing the second prong of a qualified immunity analysis; rather, it is to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the allegedly unconstitutional conduct. As discussed, supra, while a right may not be 'clearly established' at a 'high level of generality' or by broad historical assertions, neither must the specific conduct at issue have been found unconstitutional for a reasonable officer to be on notice that the conduct is unconstitutional. Rather, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer has fair warning. . . Such is the case in the Sixth Circuit with respect to the law surrounding excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment. Because, in the Sixth Circuit, the right to be free from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established law, no more specificity in defining this right is required. We recognize, however, that the district court's error was based in part on reliance on our unpublished decisions in Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528 (6th Cir.2010) and Lee v. City of Norwalk, Ohio, 529 F. App'x 778 (6th Cir.2013). We also note that the case of O'Malley v. City of Flint, 652 F.3d 662 (6th Cir.2011), would seem to disagree with our conclusion here.").

Godawa v. Byrd, 798 F.3d 457, 463-68 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Contrary to Defendant's claim, the video evidence in this case does not clearly contradict Plaintiffs' version of events, nor does it necessarily support Defendant's assertion that Godawa's vehicle 'target[ed]' him. . . Specifically, both videos can reasonably be interpreted as indicating that Defendant was not directly in front of the vehicle, but rather was located ahead of the vehicle to the right of the passenger side during the relevant timeframe, and that the car never 'targeted' Defendant. Moreover, based on the Finish Line surveillance footage and the nature of the movement depicted in the lapel video, it appears possible—and arguably likely—that Defendant was moving toward the car with his gun drawn in the moments before the apparent impact. A reasonable juror observing the video evidence could conclude that Defendant initiated the contact with Godawa's car in an apparent attempt to stop Godawa from fleeing the parking lot. With regard to the shooting, the Finish Line surveillance video may be reasonably interpreted as indicating that Defendant was effectively chasing Godawa's car before he fired the shot that killed Godawa and that he was not in harm's way at that critical moment. Accordingly, for the purposes of the following analysis, we assume that Defendant was not actively struck by Godawa's car, but initiated the impact with the vehicle in his efforts to keep Godawa from fleeing. Under this factual account, Godawa did not pose an immediate threat at the time Defendant discharged his weapon. . . .Where a suspect is attempting to flee in a vehicle, police officers are 'justified in using deadly force against a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car. But, as a general matter, an officer may not use deadly force once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety.'. . An officer may, however, 'continue to fire at a fleeing vehicle even when no one is in the vehicle's direct path when the officer's prior interactions with the driver suggest that the driver will continue to endanger others with his car.'. . Still, where the car no longer 'presents an imminent danger,' an officer is not entitled to use deadly force to stop a fleeing suspect. . . In evaluating whether Defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in the case at hand, our previous decision in Cupp is directly on point. . . . As in Cupp, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Godawa never attempted to hit Defendant with his car and did not drive in a manner that endangered Defendant's life. . . Rather, Defendant actively 'put himself in a dangerous position in order to effectuate an arrest' by running alongside the car and using his body to try to block the exit. . . Likewise, Defendant was not in front of the car, but instead was positioned near the rear passenger side, at the time that he fired his weapon. From that position, Defendant would have had no reason to fear being struck by the car as it continued to advance. Defendant emphasizes how fast the events transpired, noting that he had 'less than two seconds to process being physically assaulted by a vehicle.'. . Under Plaintiffs' version of the facts, however, Defendant was not in danger. And critically, the fact that a situation is rapidly evolving 'does not, by itself, permit [an officer] to use deadly force.'. . In reaching our holding in Cupp, we distinguished Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194 (2004). The present case is similarly distinguishable from Brosseau. In Brosseau, the Supreme Court reversed a denial of qualified immunity for a police officer who had shot a suspected felon while he was attempting to evade arrest and flee in a vehicle. . . The Court found that the suspect posed 'a major threat' to others, including officers located at the end of the street. . . Whereas Godawa was suspected of nothing more than drinking underage and having an open container in his car, the fleeing driver in Brosseau 'was a suspected felon with a no-bail warrant out for his arrest, with whom [the officer] had experienced a violent physical encounter prior to the shooting.'. . Additionally, the 'undisputed facts [in Brosseau] showed that the shooting officer believed the suspect had a gun and was fearful for officers in the immediate area.'. . In contrast, Godawa never displayed any violence in his interactions with Defendant and never engaged Defendant in a physical struggle. Critically, unlike the fleeing suspect in Brosseau, Godawa posed no discernable threat to the officers or to any other individuals at the time he was shot. Prior to Godawa's flight, Defendant only suspected him of having an open container in his car and underage drinking. Even so, the district court in this case determined that, in addition to the alcohol offenses, 'at the time the fatal shot was fired, the officer had probable cause to believe Godawa committed a number of violent and serious offenses, including attempted murder, first degree assault, wanton endangerment in the first degree, and fleeing and evading in the first degree.'. . Police officers are entitled to consider felonies committed by a fleeing suspect after the flight has commenced in determining the appropriateness of using deadly force. . . The district court, however, did not view the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs in reaching its conclusion, and instead based its determination on a factual account that assumed Godawa had actively struck Defendant with his car. With the exception of fleeing and evading arrest, none of the offenses listed by the district court are applicable once the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, as we are required to do. Defendant cites to the Supreme Court's decisions in Scott and Plumhoff to support the argument that his behavior was objectively reasonable. Neither case supports Defendant's position. Both Scott and Plumhoff addressed police officers' use of deadly force to stop fleeing suspects who were engaged in high speed chases and whose recklessness had endangered police and bystanders. . . .Scott and Plumhoff establish that, where a fleeing driver is imperiling the lives of officers or the public, it will generally be objectively reasonable for a police officer to employ deadly force to end the flight. However, these cases simply do not stand for the proposition that an officer may reasonably use deadly force against a fleeing motorist where no such peril or risk exists. Applying the Graham factors to the Plaintiffs' facts, we conclude that Defendant's use of force in this case was objectively unreasonable; although he was fleeing from police, Godawa was suspected of only minor offenses and posed no 'immediate threat' to Defendant or any member of the public. . . . In light of this Circuit's on-point precedent and critical differences between the facts of this case and the facts of the cases relied upon by Defendant, we conclude that a reasonable jury could find that Defendant's use of force violated Godawa's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The qualified immunity analysis does not end with the determination that, under the facts alleged, Defendant's use of force was objectively unreasonable. We must also determine whether the constitutional right being violated was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .It is clearly established law that the '[u]se of deadly force to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable.'. . Relying on Brosseau, the Plumhoff Court concluded that, as of 2004, 'it was not clearly established that it was unconstitutional to shoot a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger.'. . Accordingly, the Plumhoff Court determined that in order to defeat the defendant's qualified immunity and demonstrate a clearly established right, the plaintiff in Plumhoff would need to show either (1) that the officer's conduct was 'materially different from the conduct in Brosseau,' or (2) that between February 21, 1999, when the events in Brosseau took place, and the date of the events at issue in Plumhoff, 'there emerged either "controlling authority" or a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority," that would alter [the] analysis of the qualified immunity question.'. . The Court ultimately determined that the plaintiff could not meet either requirement and thus failed to demonstrate a relevant clearly established right. . . Applying the same requirements in this case leads to the opposite outcome. First, as was addressed above, this case relates to 'materially different' conduct than was at issue in Brosseau and subsequent cases including Scott. Namely, under Plaintiffs' factual account, Defendant had no reason to believe that Godawa presented 'an actual and imminent threat to the lives of [any officers or civilians]' at the time of the shooting. . . Second, this Court's decision in Cupp established controlling authority that affects the relevant qualified immunity analysis in this case. The Court in Brosseau explicitly recognized that determining whether a right is clearly established requires a 'particularized' analysis, and that 'this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.'. . Cupp addressed materially similar facts to the case at hand and established clear and controlling precedent that in a comparable situation to the circumstances facing Defendant, the use of deadly force violates the Fourth Amendment. No subsequent controlling precedent has diminished the clarity of Cupp's holding or its applicability to the present case. In sum, a genuine dispute of material fact exists regarding the circumstances of Defendant's impact with Godawa's vehicle. Under Plaintiffs' version of the facts, a reasonable juror could conclude that Defendant's use of deadly force violated Godawa's clearly established constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. Consequently, Defendant is not entitled to summary judgment, and the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Defendant.")

Savage v. City of Memphis, 620 F. App'x 425, 428-29 (6th Cir. 2015) ("[A]s the district court found below, 'this case presents one of those rare instances where the use of deadly force was reasonable.' Plaintiffs present no evidence to cast doubt on Archie's stated belief that Dowdy was armed and posed a threat to others. And while Dowdy was ultimately found to be unarmed, '[a]n officer should be entitled to qualified immunity if he made an objectively reasonable mistake as to the amount of force that was necessary under the circumstances with which he was faced.' Solomon v. Auburn Hills Police Dep't, 389 F.3d 167, 175 (6th Cir.2004). As the district court held, 'there is nothing in the record to suggest that Officer Archie's mistake was objectively unreasonable,' particularly in light of the carjacking report and the undisputed fact that Dowdy held one hand in front of him at his waist as he fled. And the expert's conclusory assertion that Archie acted unreasonably cannot create a genuine issue of material fact. . . Moreover, Archie would be entitled to qualified immunity even if a genuine issue of material fact remained as to whether he acted reasonably. Plaintiffs point to only one case, Garner, to show that Archie's actions violated a clearly established right. But Garner hurts rather than helps their case. There, a Memphis police officer shot a suspected burglar, Garner, as he tried to escape custody. . . The officer's testimony established that he used deadly force only to prevent Garner's flight, as he 'was "reasonably sure" and "figured" that Garner was unarmed.'. . This testimony, along with burglary's traditional classification 'as a "property" rather than a "violent" crime,' moved the Court to find the use of deadly force unreasonable under the circumstances. . . Here, by contrast, Archie had 'probable cause to believe that [Dowdy] ha[d] committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm'—namely, carjacking—and testified to the specific facts supporting his belief that Dowdy was armed and dangerous. . . Plaintiffs thus fail to carry their burden of showing that Archie is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Goodwin v. City of Painesville, 781 F.3d 314, 321-29 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The 'careful balancing of the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the

countervailing governmental interests at stake' called for in Graham indicates that a jury could reasonably find that Officer Soto violated Mr. Nall's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The prolonged tasering of Mr. Nall was severe: Officer Soto's training indicated that it lasted well into the risky period and that the probes were in a position that could cause breathing problems during extended application. Further, the application of the Graham factors to the facts taken in the light most favorable to the Nalls shows: (1) that Mr. Nall's crime was not serious, (2) there was little basis to believe Mr. Nall was a threat to the officers or others, (3) Mr. Nall's initial resistance was at most a passive refusal to comply with a single request to leave his residence, and (4) it was objectively apparent that Mr. Nall's failure to present his hands to be cuffed was due to Taser-induced involuntary convulsions. The Officers' challenges to the Nalls' facts have no place in the court's qualified immunity analysis on appeal. Plaintiffs' facts state a constitutional violation. . . . Once a court finds a constitutional violation, it must next consider whether 'the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.'. . A right is clearly established if '[t]he contours of that right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Here, the district court framed the constitutional question as 'whether an intoxicated misdemeanant, who had not been placed under arrest and who had neither fled nor resisted, had a right not to be tasered twice in his own home for a total of 26 seconds, as of 26 June 2010.' On appeal, the Officers argue both that Mr. Nall had no clearly established right to be free of the initial tasering, and that he had no clearly established right to be free of a tasering that lasted 26 seconds. Time frames—the initial tasering and then the continued use of force—define two distinct constitutional questions. . . .There is no clearly established right for a suspect who 'actively resists' and refuses to be handcuffed to be free from a Taser application. . . Whether Mr. Nall had a clearly established right not to be tasered after refusing to step out of his apartment hinges on whether this refusal and his subsequent return to his living room constituted 'active resistance,' or was merely 'noncompliance' or no resistance at all. . . .To arrest a person in his home, police officers need both probable cause and either a warrant or exigent circumstances. A holding that a simple refusal to exit one's own home—and surrender the heightened Fourth Amendment protections it provides—constituted active resistance of an officer's command sufficient to justify a tasering would undermine a central purpose of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Though it is the Nalls' version of the facts that govern our inquiry here, even if a jury were to credit the Officers' account of events concerning Mr. Nall's alleged initial resistance in the doorway, it could still determine that the extended tasering of Mr. Nall was gratuitous because it extended far past the point that he had ceased resisting. . . .Our determination in Landis that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity regarding the use of a Taser, . . . provided notice that application of a Taser to a suspect who has ceased virtually all resistance constitutes excessive force, even if the suspect had resisted violently earlier in the encounter. Landis also demonstrates that whether a suspect has ceased resisting does not simply turn on whether the suspect has already been placed in handcuffs. . . . In some contexts this would counsel against holding an officer to a standard where it is necessary to evaluate changes in a suspect's behavior over a period of seconds, but with a Taser seconds count. Officer Soto had been trained about the potentially grave consequences of prolonged application, especially to the chest area. Furthermore, by Plaintiffs' account the change in Mr. Nall's physical state was drastic and immediately apparent to Officer Soto. On these facts, it is reasonable to hold the officer accountable for noting changes in Mr. Nall's physical state over the 26–second tasering period. . . Because Mr. Nall had a clearly established constitutional right not to be tasered when he was at most offering passive resistance to an officer, and because he also had a clearly established constitutional right not to be gratuitously tasered after ceasing all resistance to the officers, we affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment with respect to Mr. Nall's excessive force claim against Officer Soto. . . . Plaintiffs have presented sufficient evidence about Mr. Nall's condition during the 21–second tasering to make it a jury question whether a reasonable officer in Officer Hughes's or Officer Collins's position would have seen that the force being applied to Mr. Nall was excessive and taken action to get Officer Soto to stop applying it. Because Turner demonstrates that Officers Collins and Hughes had a clearly-established duty to protect Mr. Nall dating back to at least 1997, and the facts indicate that both failed in this duty, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to both officers on this claim.")

Brown v. Lewis, 779 F.3d 401, 418-19 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Under Brown's version of the facts, she was entirely compliant throughout the stop, and she had not fled from the police. When the officers told her to put her hands up, she did so. When they ordered her out of the car, she began to move out of the car. However before she could even reach a foot to the ground, two officers grabbed her by the back of her sweatshirt and threw her down. They then ground a knee into her back while placing the handcuffs. As the district court noted, 'the Officers acknowledge that Brown was fully compliant with every one of their orders; they observed no weapons or hostages in her car, and her hands were in clear view throughout the encounter.'. . The officers were not certain that any crime had occurred and had several guns pointed directly at Brown if she did begin to resist. The force used here was not reasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances. . . .Cases in other circuits provide directly analogous examples, revealing that pulling a compliant detainee out of her car and throwing her to the ground in the process of handcuffing her is clearly established excessive force. . . .Qualified immunity does not protect these officers against Brown's excessive-force claim. Brown's testimony reflects a degree of force against a compliant subject that was clearly established as excessive well before the officers seized her. At trial, the jury will determine whether the officers threw Brown to the ground as she describes, which officers participated in handcuffing her, and whether any non-participating officers should be held liable for failing to intervene.") Greco v. Livingston Cnty., 774 F.3d 1061, 1064 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Clayton contends that he never seized Greco. The dog bit Greco only after he fell on a log, says Clayton, meaning it was an unintentional accident unprotected by the Fourth Amendment. . . That is where the 'light most favorable to the [plaintiff]' language kicks in: Even if the district court (or we) believed Clayton, the question remains whether a jury could reasonably decide that Clayton 'sicked the dog' on Greco. . . We agree with the district court that it could. Based on Greco and Stuart's testimony, a jury could reasonably conclude that Clayton found Greco and told her to put her hands on her head before the dog attacked, suggesting that the detention-by-canine was no slip-up. And even if Diago's initial bite had been an accident, the jury could consider Clayton's twenty-plus second delay in removing Diago an intentional seizure as well. That should be that. We have considered the argument Clayton raised before the district court and found it without merit.")

Cass v. City of Dayton, 770 F.3d 368, 374-77 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Cass asserts that the district court erred at both steps of the qualified immunity analysis—that the district court erred in concluding that Jordan's rights were not violated and that House did not violate clearly established law. We reach only Cass's first argument. . . Although Jordan was not the intended target of House's bullet, Cass's claim on his behalf is properly assessed under the Fourth Amendment. See Fisher v. City of Memphis, 234 F.3d 312, 318–19 (6th Cir.2000). . . . Since Garner, we have applied a consistent framework in assessing deadly-force claims involving vehicular flight. Although each case is tethered to its specific factual context, the critical question is typically whether the officer has 'reason to believe that the [fleeing] car presents an imminent danger' to 'officers and members of the public in the area.'. . . An officer is justified in using deadly force against 'a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car.'. . But, as a general matter, an officer may not use deadly force 'once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety.'. . An officer may, however, continue to fire at a fleeing vehicle even when no one is in the vehicle's direct path when 'the officer's prior interactions with the driver suggest that the driver will continue to endanger others with his car.'. . .Applying this framework, and cognizant that the ultimate question is one of objective reasonableness, we find that House did not use excessive force. As House approached the stopped Taurus, clearly signaling his status as a City police officer, Stargell accelerated. Despite House's evasive maneuver, House was struck in the leg as he rolled across the hood of the Taurus. Almost immediately after being hit, House heard St. Clair fire his weapon. Based on his assessment of the scene, he believed that St. Clair had fired in self-defense and that Johns and Murphy were also at risk of being struck by the vehicle. It was only at this point—after he himself had been hit by the Taurus and had heard St. Clair discharge his weapon in what House believed was self-defense—that he attempted to stop the Taurus by shooting at the driver. These facts are not contested in the record. Based on the fact that Stargell had demonstrated that 'he either was willing to injure an officer that got in the way of escape or was willing to persist in extremely reckless behavior that threatened the lives of all those around,'. . and based on House's professional assessment of what can only be described as a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, . . . House's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. . . .Quite apart from the fact that House reasonably believed St. Clair to be in the direct path of the Taurus, Cass's argument lacks merit. His argument hinges on the proposition that St. Clair in particular and none of the other officers more generally were in the Taurus's direct path when House used deadly force. But the inquiry is not nearly so narrow. The question is whether House reasonably believed that the lives and safety of both officers and members of the public 'in the area' were in imminent danger. . . . Although the Taurus had struck two officers, Cass suggests that the coast was clear for the car to proceed unmolested despite the presence of other officers to effect the arrest. This, of course, was not how the situation appeared in real time. Informed by his knowledge of the circumstances and of police tactics, House reasonably understood that Stargell, in his quest to escape, posed a continuing risk to the other officers present in the immediate vicinity, including Johns and Murphy. . . . Cass also makes much of the fact that House violated Dayton Police Department policy by placing himself in the Taurus's path. But '[t]he Supreme Court has been cautious to draw a distinction between behavior that violates a statutory or constitutional right and behavior that violates an administrative procedure of the agency for which the officials work.'. . House's alleged violations of City policy do not change our conclusion that he did not act objectively unreasonably under the circumstances.")

Shreve v. Franklin County, Ohio, 743 F.3d 126, 133, 134, 137, 138 (6th Cir. 2014) ("An excessive-force claim under the Eighth Amendment requires that the plaintiff show that force was not 'applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline,' but instead applied 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . But an excessive-force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment operates on a sliding scale. Generally, to constitute a Fourteenth Amendment violation, an official's conduct must 'shock[ ] the conscience.'. . When officials respond to 'a rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous predicament,'. . the Fourteenth Amendment's excessive-force standard is the same as the Eighth Amendment's. . . . The video recording in this case provides sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the situation in the cell afforded the deputies 'a reasonable opportunity to deliberate various alternatives prior to electing a course of action.'. . . But these same facts also compel the conclusion that the deputies did not act with 'deliberate indifference towards [Reed's] federally protected rights.'. . That they tried to handcuff him several times before using the Taser shows that they sought to minimize the Taser's use. The deputies also warned Reed that the Taser would hurt and that he did not want to be Tased, which showed that they were trying to avoid unnecessary harm. . . . We decline to put the onus on the deputies to assess at their risk the seriousness of Reed's seizure in order to determine whether it warranted immediate medical treatment. Their decision to use a Taser to subdue Reed before taking him to the hospital might have been unwise, but it was not unconstitutional.")

Shreve v. Franklin County, Ohio, 743 F.3d 126, 145, 148 (6th Cir. 2014) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("In concluding that Defendants did not violate Reed's constitutional rights, the majority impermissibly relies on its own subjective interpretation of the video as well as Defendants' one-sided account of the facts. This analysis is improper on summary judgment. In light of all of the evidence, including the video, a reasonable jury could undoubtedly find that the officers' use of force shocks the conscience because it was taken with deliberate indifference toward Reed's federally protected rights. . . . Based on the evidence presented, a reasonable jury could conclude that Reed was merely noncompliant, and was not actively resisting. Since the video supports both parties' proffered interpretations of Reed's behavior, there is a genuine issue of fact regarding whether or not Reed was resisting. We must resolve this factual dispute in Reed's favor for the purposes of our analysis of the issue on appeal. . . .A jury could reasonably conclude that the officers' use of a taser gun on a non-threatening, mentally ill individual in the immediate aftermath of a seizure shocks the conscience because it was taken with deliberate indifference toward Reed's right to be free from excessive force. At the very least, the evidence presented raises an issue of material fact as to whether the officers' behavior shocks the conscience, and summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity was therefore improper.")

Hocker v. Pikeville City Police Dept., 738 F.3d 150, 155 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Hocker adds that, by the time Baisden and Branham fired at his vehicle, neither one of them was in harm's way, eliminating any need to use lethal force against him. It is not that easy, particularly in the context of the lightning-quick evolution of this encounter. It is undisputed that neither officer knew where the other one was when they began firing. That one officer was safe does not mean the other one was. This reality by itself justified the officers' conduct. While it may be easy for Hocker to say that each officer was safe once the officer was no longer in the direct path of Hocker's vehicle, no reasonable officer would say that the night's peril had ended at that point. Hocker remained in the car, and for the prior ten minutes or so—from the officers' reasonable perspective—had put others, including most recently the officers, in harm's way with his car. What in that short time span would leave anyone with the impression that Hocker no longer presented a threat to their safety? He remained in the car, and the car engine remained on. Only Hocker's self-restraint stood in the way of further threats to their safety. From the officers' reasonable perspective, the peril remained. Hocker maintains that, whenever an officer fires at the driver's side of a moving (and potentially departing) vehicle, he acts unreasonably. But this is an invention. No case adopts such a per se rule. If there is a per se rule in this area, it is that the 'totality of the circumstances' governs every case. . . Hocker's three case citations say nothing to the contrary. One case never reached the reasonableness question. See Sigley v. City of Parma Heights, 437 F.3d 527, 536 (6th Cir .2006). In the other two cases, the court acknowledged that there are many factors at play when deciding the reasonableness of an officer's use of deadly force, including not just 'whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others,' but also 'the severity of the crime at issue,' 'whether [the suspect] is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight,' Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 774 (6th Cir.2005), and whether the officers 'had sufficient time ... to assess the situation before' using deadly force, Estate of Kirby v. Duva, 530 F.3d 475, 482 (6th Cir.2008). Just so here. For the reasons just given, the officers acted reasonably as a matter of law based on these considerations.")

Eldridge v. City of Warren, 533 F. App'x 529, 529-30, 533-35 (6th Cir. 2013) ("What constitutes 'active resistance' by a suspect that justifies a police officer's use of force? In their pursuit of qualified immunity, two police officers ask us to conclude that a lethargic driver who clutched his car's steering wheel and provided unhelpful responses to the officers' queries was engaged in 'active resistance.' We decline to do so, and AFFIRM the decision of the district court. . . .The true flashpoint of this controversy is the third Graham factor—whether Eldridge 'actively resisted' in a manner that warranted the use of a Taser. To Officers Moore and Horlocker, Eldridge was noncompliant and therefore actively resisting. They argue that their actions are protected under our precedent establishing that when an officer employs a Taser on a suspect who is actively resisting, such action does not constitute excessive force. We disagree. Taken in the light most favorable to Eldridge, a reasonable officer faced with the same circumstances could not have determined that Eldridge's actions bore the hallmarks of active resistance. Rather, these facts demonstrate that Eldridge was not actively resisting, and under our precedent it is unreasonable to tase a nonresisting suspect. . . .A review of the facts in the light most favorable to Eldridge indicates that the officers turned off the car and removed the keys from the ignition. For our purposes, then,

Eldridge was not in control of a running vehicle at the time of the purported excessive force. Similarly, it remains disputed whether Eldridge was gripping the steering wheel. Under Eldridge's version of the facts, as explained by the district court, he was merely sitting behind the steering wheel, a fact we must consider to be true on interlocutory appeal. . . . Whether the officers receive qualified immunity thus turns on whether failing to comply with an officer's commands, with nothing more, constitutes active resistance. What makes the officers' argument difficult to accept on this issue, however, is the meaning of 'active resistance' under our precedent. In cases where we concluded that an officer's use of force was justifiable because it was in response to active resistance, some outward manifestation—either verbal or physical—on the part of the suspect had suggested volitional and conscious defiance, neither of which is present here. . . .If there is a common thread to be found in our caselaw on this issue, it is that noncompliance alone does not indicate active resistance; there must be something more. It can be a verbal showing of hostility, as was the case in Caie. It can also be a deliberate act of defiance using one's own body, as in Hagans, or some other mechanism, such as the truck in Foos. Taken in the light most favorable to Eldridge, his noncompliance was not paired with any signs of verbal hostility or physical resistance, and therefore cannot be deemed active resistance. . . .We further note that the two officers' actions violated a clearly-established right: the right of a suspect to be free from the use of physical force when he is not resisting police efforts to apprehend him. . . . In addition, the law was clear at the time of the alleged violation. . . Our decision in Hagans clarified that this particular right was 'clearly established' before and after May 2007—and more importantly for our purposes, before June 2009.")

Eldridge v. City of Warren, 533 F. App'x 529, 536-37 (6th Cir. 2013) (Norris, J. dissenting) ("The majority paints a compelling picture of a softly spoken driver offering 'polite responses to the officers' questions about his physical incapacity to move from his stationary vehicle' who was nevertheless tased by defendant officers. In painting this picture, the majority avers, as it should, that it is construing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff. However, this case is unusual two respects: first, the entire sequence of events was caught on the police cruiser's dashboard camera; and, second, plaintiff concedes that he has no recollection of the events. When uncontroverted video evidence is available, we should view 'the facts in the light depicted by the video tape.'. . Because the majority relies upon facts contradicted by the clear video evidence, I respectfully dissent. . . .Having reviewed the video tape of the encounter between plaintiff and the officers numerous times, the events captured strike me as a fairly routine arrest of an uncooperative driver whom the officers had reason to suspect was under the influence of alcohol. . .In the course of their encounter he refused to comply with repeated, reasonable police commands and physically resisted the officers' efforts to remove him from his vehicle. . . .Unfortunately, the majority's opinion offers little guidance to officers confronting a similar situation in the future. Given the failed efforts initially to remove plaintiff from the truck, what should have happened next? The officers had immobilized the truck; should they have left him in it and waited for him to sober up (based on their reasonable assumption that he was under the influence of drugs or alcohol)? Ironically, such a strategy could have resulted in permanent brain damage or even death had plaintiff's low blood sugar persisted or worsened.")

Correa v. Simone, 528 F. App'x 531, 535, 536 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Looking at cases before May 2010, this Court's analysis of whether a defendant's right to be free from a taser shock was clearly established can be split into two lines of cases. First, this Court has generally found no clearly-established right where the suspect is actively resisting arrest, which can include physically resisting, fleeing the scene despite police orders, and not responding to orders to move. [collecting cases] In a second set of cases, this Court has found that plaintiffs' right to be free from a taser shock is clearly established where they have done nothing to resist arrest or are already detained. [collecting cases] Simone's argument is that the law regarding tasing a non-resistant but possibly armed suspect was not clearly established because none of our cases has dealt specifically with a suspect who was armed with a firearm. We disagree. As noted above, this Court's precedent has emphasized the concept of resistance when considering whether an officer's conduct violates established law. . . . The absence of case law specifically addressing gun possession does not bear on whether the law is clearly established. The precedent in this Circuit clearly holds that a police officer must encounter some level of resistance by the defendant to justify using a taser. The mere possession of a gun is not, in and of itself, resistance unless coupled with something more, such as a physical or verbal action. . . Holding otherwise would mean ignoring a significant amount of precedent establishing the importance of a defendant's resistance to an officer's calculation of whether to use his or her taser. Using a taser on a potentially armed suspect who is complying with all officer commands and not resisting violated clearly established law as of May 2010.")

Watson v. City of Marysville, No. 12–3478, 2013 WL 1224089, *3 (6th Cir. Mar. 26, 2013) (unpublished) ("The question presented here is whether it was clearly established in June 2008 that using a taser on a suspect disobeying repeated orders amounted to excessive force. It is clearly established that suspects have the right to be free from tasing where they are fully compliant with officers' orders, not resisting arrest, or immobilized and posing no threat of danger. Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509 (6th Cir. 2012). Although the case at bar does not present facts which fall neatly into this category, cases of like circumstances have found no clearly established right of a suspect to be free from tasing where he or she disobeys police orders and may be in possession of a weapon. . . Watson offers no sustained argument regarding the defense of qualified immunity. He fails to identify any case factually similar to this one, where a police officer has been denied qualified immunity on a charge of excessive force, based upon the tasing of a suspect who disregards repeated commands and is believed to be armed. Therefore, Diehl and Sergeant Nicol are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Martin v. City of Broadview Heights, 712 F.3d 951, 960-63 (6th Cir. 2013) ("The bottom line is that a jury could find that the officers' conduct was unreasonable. The officers used their weight to compress Martin, struck his head and body multiple times, restrained his neck or chin, and placed him in a torso lock. These tactics were not justified by Martin's possible crime, the threat he posed to anyone's safety, or his resistance. The officers' failure to adhere to a departmental policy that explained the grave dangers of positional asphyxia verifies the unreasonableness of their actions. The quantum of force the officers used was constitutionally excessive, violating the Fourth Amendment right of an unarmed, minimally threatening, and mentally unstable individual to be free from gratuitous violence during an arrest. . . Having determined that the officers violated Martin's constitutional right, the next step is to consider whether that right was clearly established when the arrest occurred. . . . The prohibition against placing weight on Martin's body after he was handcuffed was clearly established in the Sixth Circuit as of August 2007. In Champion, we held that applying pressure to the back of a prone suspect who no longer resists arrest and poses no flight risk is an objectively unreasonable use of force. . . . The more difficult issue is whether the officers were on notice that the force they used against an unarmed and mentally unstable individual before he was subdued violated the Constitution. The officers argue that Champion is inapposite here because it only forbids creating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial pressure on a handcuffed suspect's back. But this is too cramped a view of our precedents. The better view is that Champion proscribes the use of 'substantial or significant pressure' that creates asphyxiating conditions in order to restrain a subject who does not pose a material danger to the officers or others. That Champion himself was handcuffed when this occurred is incidental to the rule. . . .Martin exhibited conspicuous signs that he was mentally unstable. He was also unarmed. Confronted with such an individual, Champion required the officers to de-escalate the situation and adjust the application of force downward. Contrary to this command, the officers ignored Martin's diminished mental state and used excessive force to control him. Finally, BHPD's Positional Asphyxia Policy regulated the conduct of the officers when they encountered Martin, instructing them to recognize the risks of restraining an individual exhibiting bizarre and agitated behavior. . . Though they knew the hazards of the tactics they deployed against a high-risk individual, the officers failed to heed the policy's warnings. This is further evidence that the officers were on notice that their conduct exceeded the bounds of permissible force. To summarize: Our precedents and BHPD's own policies clearly established in August 2007 that the force the officers used to restrain Martin was excessive. A reasonable officer should have known that subduing an unarmed, minimally dangerous, and mentally unstable individual with compressive body weight, head and body strikes, neck or chin restraints, and torso locks would violate that person's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. The Constitution does not countenance this level of force. The officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Wilkins, No. 12–1534, 2013 WL 827725, *3, *4 (6th Cir. Mar. 6, 2013) (not published) ("The Estate disputes this conclusion in two ways. First, it contends that Blaskie violated 'TASER rules and procedures' when he allegedly tased Jackson while Jackson was running. The Estate has not cited any cases, however, that say that tasing a running suspect is an excessive use of force. So it has not shown that Blaskie violated clearly established law. Cf. Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509 (6th Cir.2012) (holding that, in May 2007, the use of a taser was not a violation of clearly established law). Second, the Estate contends that the officers used too much force after Jackson's collision with the dumpster arm, when they allegedly tased him 11 times, as well as punched and kicked him repeatedly. The Estate concedes, however, that Jackson was the 'strongest' and the 'most physical' person the officers had ever fought. So the officers had to use a significant amount of force to subdue him. Moreover, we give a 'measure of deference to the officer's on-the-spot judgment about the level of force necessary in light of the circumstances of the particular case.'. . . And the officers used less force here than we have found reasonable elsewhere. For example, in Williams v. Sandel, 433 F. App'x 353, 362 (6th Cir.2011), we held that it was reasonable for officers to tase a suspect 37 times, in addition to using their batons and pepper spray, because the suspect 'remained unsecured and unwilling to comply with the officers' attempts to secure him[.]' Id. Blaskie and Wilkins acted similarly—they stopped applying force the moment Jackson stopped resisting them. In sum, Jackson's Estate cannot prove to a jury that Blaskie and Wilkins used excessive force during the arrest, or that they violated clearly established law. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jones v. City of Cincinnati, 736 F.3d 688, 695-97 (6th Cir. 2012), cert. denied sub nom. Jones v. Abrams, 133 S.Ct. 2802 (2013) ("Jones's survivors argue that the reasonableness of Pike's and Osterman's blows depends on a disputed factual issue: when Jones ceased resisting arrest and started struggling to breathe. Even assuming that Jones started struggling to breathe during the fifty-nine-second period of strikes and jabs, we still conclude that the officers did not act objectively unreasonably. Under the rapidly evolving circumstances of that morning, an objectively reasonable officer could not have discerned whether Jones resisted in an attempt to breathe or in defiance of commands. . . . Officer Abrams argues that his refusal to unhandcuff Jones despite a firefighter's request to do so was not objectively unreasonable. We agree. The video shows that approximately three minutes elapsed from the time when officers handcuffed Jones [MVR at 6:02:54] to when firefighters arrived by his side [MVR at 6:05:50]. Some time later, Firefighter Gregory Adams asked that Jones's handcuffs be removed. . . An objectively reasonable officer—given the short time to transition from handcuffing Jones to understanding his medical condition—could have thought that Jones's breathing problems did not warrant the removal of his handcuffs. Abrams testified that he did not remove Jones's handcuffs because putting them on was difficult, and he did not know if Jones was feigning injury. Abrams and Pike also testified that after a physical struggle, officers usually leave on handcuffs until the suspect is in jail. Although courts eschew considering an officer's subjective intent when applying the objective reasonableness test, see Graham, 490 U.S. at 397, an officer's explanation of his motivations inform a court's understanding about what an objectively reasonable officer would have done under such circumstances. Moreover, nothing in the record suggests that Adams or any other firefighter told Abrams that CPR could not be performed while Jones was handcuffed. . . . Without notice that performing CPR on a handcuffed person is ineffective or less effective, Abrams did not act objectively unreasonably in refusing to remove Jones's handcuffs. . . . Because Pike, Osterman, and Abrams's actions were not objectively unreasonable, we need not decide whether Jones's rights under these circumstances were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Qualified immunity also shields the officers from the Fourteenth Amendment claim arising from a sixty-four-second delay in rolling Jones out of a prone position. To prevail on a claim for failure to provide medical care, Jones's survivors must show that the officers were 'deliberately indifferent' to Jones's 'sufficiently serious' medical need. . . .The officers concede that Jones developed a sufficiently serious medical need. We also assume that all six officers (1) were aware or could infer that Jones was at risk for positional asphyxia and (2) inferred that Jones was at risk by 6:02:32 a.m. when Officer Slade first asked, 'How 'bout we roll him?' Assuming these facts, we determine that the officers did not disregard Jones's substantial risk of positional asphyxia. . . .The officers' attempts to aid Jones undermine the claim that they deliberately disregarded Jones's substantial medical risk. . . . Our conclusion on deliberate indifference obviates any need to determine the clearly established law at the time of the incident.")

Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 700 F.3d 779, 789 (6th Cir. 2012) ("In contrast to the facts in Robinette and Matthews, the events in the present cases occurred in areas unlikely to expose police to ambush and the suspects were not believed to be a threat to anyone at the time the canine unit was called in. Although officers believed that Gemperline may have been a threat to herself, no weapons were found on her person and officers believed she might still be handcuffed. Clark also failed to give warnings to either of the suspects prior to Spike biting them. Even more important to this case is the question of whether or not Spike was properly trained. In both instances, Spike attacked the suspects without warning or a command from Clark. While the facts in the present case are not as extreme as in White, the facts are sufficiently analogous. Clark allowed a 'bite and hold' dog, whose training was questionable, to attack two suspects who were not actively fleeing and who, because of proximity, showed no ability to evade police custody. In light of Sixth Circuit case law, there is ample evidence to suggest that Clark acted contrary to clearly established law when he used an inadequately trained canine, without warning, to apprehend two suspects who were not fleeing.")

Marcilis v. Township of Redford, 693 F.3d 589, 599, 600 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Regardless of whether the force allegedly used by the police officers in this case was greater than necessary, we believe that the police officers could have reasonably believed that their conduct was a lawful means of exercising command of the situation. . . The warrant authorized the officers to search for weapons and drugs in both homes; and, with respect to the Suffield Drive search, Marcilis II had previously pleaded guilty to assaulting a police officer. Given the purpose of the searches, and the risks involved in a drug raid, . . . a reasonable officer in the police officers' position would have been justifiably concerned with his safety and 'could have believed' that the level of force used was lawful. . . The instant case is distinguishable from others where we have found that officers engaged in similar actions were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Under the circumstances here—a raid on two homes wherein police had been authorized to search for firearms and drugs—a reasonable officer would not have known that the force used here would be considered excessive.")

Austin v. Redford Tp. Police Dept., 690 F.3d 490, 497-99 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The Defendants also raise a further, purely legal, argument that this Circuit's precedent on the use of excessive force on subdued and unresisting subjects is irrelevant to situations involving noncompliance with police orders. Instead, they argue that Morgan's two discharges of his Taser in order to gain compliance with his order for Austin to put his legs in the police car did not violate any clearly established constitutional right. We review this legal argument de novo. . .Our 'prior opinions clearly establish that it is unreasonable to use significant force on a restrained subject, even if some level of passive resistance is presented.'. . Further, 'a line of Sixth Circuit cases holds that the use of non-lethal, temporarily incapacitating force on a handcuffed suspect who no longer poses a safety threat, flight risk, and/or is not resisting arrest constitutes excessive force.' . . Although Defendants cite non-binding authority from other courts for the proposition that use of a Taser to obtain compliance is objectively reasonable, each of those cases involved the potential escape of a dangerous criminal or the threat of immediate harm, neither of which is present here. . . Austin was already sitting in the backseat of the patrol car which was safely parked at the deadend of a street with traffic blocked by other police cars. There were several other officers present. And although Austin did not immediately comply with Morgan's request to put his feet in the patrol car, Austin did not refuse; rather, he stated he was having trouble breathing and asked Morgan to roll down the car window before shutting the door. We need not decide whether we would have reached the same conclusion as the Eleventh Circuit on the officer's three uses of a Taser in Buckley; in any event, it is clear that the facts present here are distinguishable from those in Buckley. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Austin, the district court found that Austin was not resisting; he was disoriented from at least two prior Taser deployments and at least one attack by a police dog; he was experiencing and complaining of shortness of breath; he was already placed in the patrol car leaving only his feet outside; and he did not have time to comply with Morgan's order before Morgan used his Taser. There is no evidence or allegation that Austin was belligerent, threatening or assaulting officers, or attempting to escape. As mentioned above, it is well established in this Circuit that the use of non-lethal, temporarily incapacitating force on a handcuffed suspect who no longer poses a safety threat, flight risk, and/or is not resisting arrest constitutes excessive force. . . 'Even without precise knowledge that the use of the [T]aser would be a violation of a constitutional right,' on these facts, Morgan 'should have known based on analogous cases that [his] actions were unreasonable. Landis v. Baker, 297 F. App'x 453, 463 (6th Cir.2008). Defendants' legal argument that this Circuit's precedent on the use of excessive force on subdued and unresisting subjects is irrelevant to situations involving noncompliance with police orders fails.")

Thomas v. Plummer, Nos. 11–3165, 11–3181, 2012 WL 2897007, *9, *10 & n.12 (6th Cir. July 17, 2012) (unpublished) ("Although Officer Plummer's use of force was excessive, Thomas's claim against him can proceed only if, as of August 23, 2009, 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing violate[d]' the Fourth Amendment. . . '[T]he right [generally] to be free from physical force when one is not resisting the police [was] ... clearly established,' at least as of July 13, 2002. Wysong v. City of Heath, 260 F. App'x 848, 856 (6th Cir.2008). We have since applied this general rule in the context of taser use, holding that a suspect not resisting arrest had a clearly established right not to be tased, as of October 28, 2006. . . This is so even if the plaintiff had offered, but later abandoned or been forced to abandon, violent resistence. Landis, 297 F. App'x 453 (holding that use of taser against plaintiff who violently resisted, but had already been subdued, violated clearly established law, as of November 2004). Here, Thomas surrendered, putting herself at the officers' mercy by falling to her knees and placing her hands above her head. Every reasonable officer would have understood that tasing a suspect in such a position was excessive in August 2009. Officer Plummer is not entitled to dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . Officer Plummer argues that the Cincinnati Police Department's finding that he violated department policy by deploying his taser, and its subsequent decision to fire him are not relevant to the 'clearly established right' analysis. Not so. '[G]uidance from experts in a field, and even the obvious cruelty inherent in a practice can contribute to the conclusion that an act was so aberrant that every reasonable official would have understood that it was unconstitutional.'. . Thus, the City's findings and action, while not dispositive, could play some role in determining how clearly unconstitutional Officer Plummer's act was. First, this case is, of course, unique. All cases are. But the Supreme Court has made pellucidly 'clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . The question is not whether the parties can dredge up a precisely analogous case from the federal reports, but whether 'the state of the law [at the time of the incident] ... gave respondents fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiff] was unconstitutional.'. . Second, Kijowski can establish that Officer Plummer had enough warning that his conduct was unconstitutional, as of August 23, 2009. Officer Plummer correctly notes that we did not publish Kijowski until April 2010. But this is irrelevant. Kijowski decided that, at least as of October 2006, a non-resistant suspect had a clearly established right not to be tased. The 'state of the law,' in other words, gave Officer Plummer ample warning that his use of force was unconstitutional.")

Hermiz v. City of Southfield, No. 10–1842, 2012 WL 1816230, at *3-*5 (6th Cir. May 21, 2012) (not reported) ("A reasonable jury drawing inferences in the estate's favor could determine that an officer that aimed and fired shots while to the side of the vehicle—including a shot fired far enough from the side to shatter the driver's-side window—would have had time to realize that he was no longer in the path of the car and no longer in immediate danger. Accepting this view of the circumstances, as we must, we conclude that Matatall lacked justification to fire at least his final shot. Even if the car appeared to head toward Matatall at one point, its single pass at five to ten miles per hour does not justify the inference that Hermiz posed an ongoing threat, especially considering that Hermiz's driving prior to the traffic stop presented no cause for concern. . . . Because the district court identified a factual dispute material to the constitutionality of Matatall's use of deadly force, the first prong of the qualified-immunity analysis resolves in favor of proceeding to trial. . . . Even if Matatall's actions violated the Fourth Amendment, he may still claim qualified immunity if the legal rules he violated were not 'clearly established' on September 27, 2007. . . . At the time of the incident, Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit case law clearly established the unreasonableness of shooting at the driver of a car that no longer poses a threat. . . . Though Matatall urges that a reasonable officer could have acted as he did under such rapidly changing circumstances, . . . we lack jurisdiction to review the factual question regarding whether an officer had sufficient time to perceive, at the time of the last shot through the driver's-side window, that the passing car no longer presents an immediate threat. Because we decide the legal question—whether 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law prohibited shooting at the driver of a fleeing car from the side, absent indications of an ongoing threat—in the estate's favor, we affirm the denial of summary judgment against Matatall.")

Walker v. Davis, 649 F.3d 502, 503, 504 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Here, Germany posed no immediate threat to anyone as he rode his motorcycle across an empty field in the middle of the night in rural Kentucky. . . . Nor does it matter that, at the time of Davis's actions, there were few, if any, reported cases in which police cruisers intentionally rammed motorcycles. It is only common sense–and obviously so–that intentionally ramming a motorcycle with a police cruiser involves the application of potentially deadly force. . . .Whether, in fact, the collision here was intentional is for a jury to decide. Davis insists it was not. But the facts, as we must view them, make out a violation of Germany's clearly established constitutional rights. The district court's denial of qualified immunity is affirmed.")

Walker v. Davis, 649 F.3d 502, 504, 511 (6th Cir. 2011) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent because I think that the majority has significantly downplayed the level of risk that Germany posed to the public, and defined clearly-established law at too high a level of generality. Because I do not believe that Davis's alleged conduct was prohibited by clearly-established law, I would find that Davis is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . I find that this case is much closer to Scott, Pasco, Abney and Sharp–all cases in which the court concluded that the officer's decision to ram the vehicle was objectively reasonable, than it is to Kirby or Garner. . . . Because no one 'has identified a single case predating the conduct at issue that prohibits [ramming a car] in a materially similar context,' and because I believe that these cases demonstrate that Davis's actions 'at best fell in the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' the Plaintiff has failed to show that Davis's conduct was prohibited by clearly-established law.")

Greathouse v. Couch, No. 09-6011, 2011 WL 2989069, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. July 22, 2011) (not published) ("In applying the segmented approach, we have held that knock-and-announce rule violations are 'conceptually distinct' from excessive-force claims and are, accordingly, analyzed separately. . . In Dickerson, we considered and rejected an argument almost identical to Greathouse's, that 'officers should be held accountable for creating the need to use excessive force by their unreasonable unannounced entry.'. . In subsequent cases, we have continued to apply the segmented approach to excessive-force claims, without regard to earlier violations committed by police officers. . . Despite Greathouse's arguments to the contrary, the knock-and-announce rule violation is irrelevant to her excessive-force claim. The district court correctly segmented the events and evaluated the reasonableness of Couch's gunfire by looking only at the moments immediately preceding his use of force. . . We turn now to the question of whether Couch is entitled to qualified immunity on this excessive-force claim. . . .We may dispose of this case by reference to Saucier's second prong because, on these facts, even if there was a constitutional violation, it did not contravene clearly established law. . . .When a person aims a weapon in a police officer's direction, that officer has an objectively reasonable basis for believing that the person poses a significant risk of serious injury or death. . . . A police officer need not wait for a suspect to open fire on him, much less wait for the suspect to actually hit him, before the officer may fire back. . . The circumstances in this case provide substantial grounds for Couch to have concluded that he had 'legitimate justification under the law' for firing at Mrs. King, and that he would contravene no clearly established law by doing so.")

Bletz v. Gribble, 641 F.3d 743, 751-54 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Whether events leading up to a shooting are legitimate factors to consider in assessing an excessive-force claim depends on the totality of the circumstances in question . . . . In the case before us, we need not decide precisely which preceding events (i.e., the breadth of the excessive-force segment) should properly be considered in analyzing the reasonableness of Gribble's use of deadly force. We can instead affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity by looking only at the facts alleged by plaintiff in the moment immediately preceding the shooting. Zachary Bletz testified that Fred Bletz was lowering his gun in response to Gribble's command to do so. If Gribble shot Fred Bletz while the latter was complying with the officer's command, then Gribble violated Fred Bletz's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from deadly force. . . . Because Fred's right to be free from deadly police force while complying with police commands to disarm was clearly established, both Saucier prongs have been met. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's decision to deny Gribble qualified immunity on the estate's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Coble v. City of White House, Tenn., 634 F.3d 865, 869-71 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Here, in contrast to the plaintiff in Scott, Coble does not merely characterize the recording differently. Rather, Coble insists that the facts differed from what was recorded. Coble testified that he screamed, that he called Officer Carney names, that he was forced to walk on his broken ankle, and that he was dropped face-first on the ground. His testimony is not 'blatantly contradicted' by the lack of corroborating sound on the audio recording. A reasonable jury could believe Coble's version of the events. . . . Even if part of Coble's testimony is blatantly contradicted by the audio recording, that does not permit the district court to discredit his entire version of the events. . . . We cannot say that Coble's version of the events was so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could believe it. Accordingly, there is a genuine question of material fact as to whether Officer Carney used excessive force, and the district court erred by granting summary judgment for Office Carney. . . The district court held that Officer Carney was entitled to qualified immunity because Coble failed to show the violation of a constitutional right. The district court based this finding, like its summary judgment finding, on the audio recording. Because we have determined that it was improper to rely on this audio recording over Coble's version of events, this finding is also subject to reversal. In light of its conclusion that Coble failed to show the violation of a constitutional right, the district court did not consider the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We leave consideration of whether the right was clearly established for determination by the district court in the first instance.")

Morrison v. Board Of Trustees Of Green Tp., 583 F.3d 394, 406, 407 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Officer Celender essentially asks this Court to impose a blanket de minimis injury requirement for excessive force claims. In support of this proposition, he cites several of our cases in which we denied the defendant police officer qualified immunity when the plaintiff presented evidence of particularly violent displays of physical contact. . . . But while an excessive use of force claim may be established through evidence of severe injury or physical contact, this Circuit has not required that this must be the case. . . . As discussed above, a reasonable juror could find based on the evidence that Officer Celender pushed Amanda's face into the ground absent a legitimate government interest, namely officer safety. . . . Officer Celender was on notice that his conduct was a violation of Amanda's constitutional rights to be free from excessive use of force because it was ‘ “obvious” under the general standards of constitutional care’ existing as of October 30, 2002–the date of the relevant events–that such conduct violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Therefore, we reject Officer Celender’s argument that the right at issue was not ‘clearly established.’”).

Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 372, 373 (6th Cir. 2009) (Clay, J., concurring) (“In the qualified immunity context, the courts need not determine the ‘specific constitutional right’ at issue to resolve whether a defendant officer was sufficiently ‘on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful.’ . . . [O]n my reading of the required inquiry, Defendants would not be entitled to summary judgment regardless of whether the application of the Fourth Amendment was unclear at the time, and regardless of whether Harris remained in the joint custody of the arresting officers and the booking officers. By addressing those issues, the district court wrongly implied that Defendants’ premise that they would be entitled to qualified immunity if the application of the Fourth Amendment was not fully settled at the time has some credence. It does not. The district court’s decision to address this issue also perpetuates the notion that the application of the Fourth Amendment turns on whether the suspect remains in the continuing custody of the arresting officers, a premise that our decision in Drogosch unequivocally put to rest.Simply put, because our case law makes clear that Defendants’ conduct was unconstitutional under any standard, it is irrelevant for qualified immunity purposes whether Harris’ claims are controlled by the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment, and thus it is irrelevant whether Harris remained in the joint custody of the arresting officers and the booking officers. And, despite what we unintentionally may have suggested in Phelps, it is not always necessary to determine the governing legal standard to resolve a qualified immunity claim. That is especially true in this context because this circuit’s case law gave the officers more than sufficient notice that criminal suspects who already have been subdued and who present no possible threat to the officers or themselves have a clearly established constitutional right not to be gratuitously struck by a police officer. Although it may be helpful to the district court for us to clarify what standard it must apply when addressing the merits of Harris’ claims, because we need not reach that constitutional question to resolve Defendants’ present appeal, well-established principles counsel us to abstain from addressing the issue.”).

Smoak v. Hall, No. 08-5442, 2009 WL 2778101, at *5-*7 (6th Cir. Sept. 2, 2009) (not published) (“We review a district court’s denial of a Rule 50 motion de novo. . . . Bush asks us to do what we are expressly forbidden to do–to look at the video and substitute our judgment for that of the jury. Bush’s reliance on this case law is misplaced and this proposal is untenable. . . . Unless we are to say, as a matter of law, that a police officer may use as much force as he likes to subdue a noncompliant but handcuffed robbery suspect, the question of how much force in this situation is too much is a question for the jury. And, unless we are to rewrite or ignore our standard of review, we must defer to the jury’s reasonable interpretation of the evidence, no matter how we might feel about that evidence if we were to assess it ourselves. . . . Bush’s second claim on appeal is that the district court erred by denying him qualified immunity. We disagree. . . .[I]t was clearly established that the force Bush used was excessive. . . . As the family knelt on the side of the highway–the Cookeville officers’ guns trained on them–Smoak complied while the troopers secured his hands behind his back, handcuffed his wife and step-son, and looked in his car. Up to this point, Smoak was remarkably compliant–in fact, commendably so.When Hall shot the dog, Smoak stood up, crying out, 'You shot my dog, you shot my dog!' Despite the fact that both Bush and Andrews had hold of the handcuffed Smoak, that Trooper Phann had hold of Smoak's step-son, Brandon, and that the two Cookeville officers had guns at the ready, Bush contends that he thought it was necessary to slam Smoak to the ground, i.e., that this use of force was, at most, a reasonable mistake. We disagree. Having reviewed the evidence, including the video, we find this use of force clearly unreasonable. Bush has not established that he was entitled to qualified immunity.").

Grawey v. Drury, 567 F.3d 302, 311-14 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Grawey, who was unarmed, did not pose an immediate threat to the officers or to others when Saad sprayed him. And Grawey was not actively resisting arrest or trying to flee at the time he was pepper sprayed by Saad. Rather, he had stopped running and placed his hands against the wall while he waited for the officer to arrive. . . . Even if Saad's use of pepper spray per se on Grawey was not excessive force, Saad's discharging enough pepper spray at a very close distance to cause Grawey to pass out supports a claim of excessive force. . . . Based on the caselaw that existed on June 16, 2005, the date of the alleged use of excessive force, Saad was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. The general consensus among our cases is that officers cannot use force, including pepper spray, on a detainee who has been subdued, is not told he is under arrest, or is not resisting arrest. . . . While we must examine the issue from the perspective of the police officer, a reasonable police officer would know that using pepper spray on a suspect who has submitted, is not resisting, and is no danger to anyone constitutes excessive force. Moreover, discharging enough pepper spray in a detainee's face to cause him to lose consciousness is an obvious constitutional violation that does not require a specific body of caselaw to be clearly established.")

Vance v. Wade, 546 F.3d 774, 785, 786 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Although the facts in this case and those in Saucier are similar, this case involves a substantial difference: Vance asserts that Wade escorted him to a police vehicle, left that scene for several minutes, and then returned to Vance and forcibly crammed him into the floorboard of the vehicle. Further, although both cases involved a degree of tension and concern for keeping order, the level of tension and danger in this case was considerably lower. Saucier involved a demonstrator protesting a speech by the Vice President, whereas in this case a large crowd of approximately fifty people were standing outside a restaurant where officers were executing a search warrant for illegal gambling machines. The time delay between Wade escorting Vance to the car and Wade's later actions in cramming Vance into car is the decisive factor that renders this case substantially different than Saucier. . . . Wade had secured the situation by the time that he handcuffed Vance and escorted him to the police vehicle. Consequently, when Wade returned to the vehicle several minutes later, it was objectively unreasonable for him to believe that any further force was necessary to maintain order because it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that [Wade's] conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . [A]ccording to Vance's allegations, Vance had been cooperatively sitting handcuffed in the back of a police vehicle for several minutes when Wade returned and used force.. . We therefore hold that Wade is not entitled to qualified immunity from Vance's claim that Wade used excessive force in cramming him into the back of a police vehicle.")

Landis v. Baker, 297 F. App'x 453, 2008 WL 4613547, at *10 (6th Cir. Oct. 16, 2008) ("The district court correctly concluded that the officers should have known that the gratuitous or excessive use of a taser would violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The defendant officers should have known that the use of a taser in stun mode, in rapid succession on a suspect who is surrounded by officers, in a prone position in a muddy swamp, who has only one arm beneath him, and who has just been struck several times with a baton would be a violation of a constitutional right. The fact that only Deputy Lynch pulled the trigger on the taser does not absolve Baker and Galarneau of liability."). See also Landis v. Galarneau, No. 2:05-cv-74013, 2009 WL 4947600, at *6 (E.D. Mich. Dec. 14, 2009) ("As a threshold matter, the Court must address the unusual legal posture of the present motion for summary judgment, following as it does the Sixth's Circuit's opinion addressing the defendants' previous motion for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The cases on unlawful force establish that the question of objective reasonableness is a question of law. Often there are factual disputes as to what precisely happened during the alleged unlawful force: for example, did the plaintiff attack the police officer or not? There are few such disputes in this case. The facts here are largely undisputed and the Sixth Circuit has already found that the facts could, if proved, constitute unlawful force. The question therefore arises whether the precedent established by the Sixth Circuit in this case require this Court to determine as a matter of law that a constitutional violation occurred, or, conversely, if the reasonableness of the force here is still a question for the jury. . .The Court concludes that the Sixth Circuit opinion affirming the denial of qualified immunity to defendants does not mandate a grant of summary judgment to the plaintiff. While the plaintiff is correct that most of the facts in the present case are undisputed, there are several. . .material factual disputes, including whether Keiser lunged at Galarneau and the number of times Galarneau struck Keiser with his baton. There are also various inferences that a jury would be entitled to draw on the undisputed facts, which inferences must be drawn in favor of the defendant on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. Specifically, here a jury could interpret the largely undisputed facts as either suggesting that Keiser was still highly dangerous, and therefore the police response was justified, or a jury could interpret the undisputed facts as suggesting that Keiser was no longer dangerous, because he was surrounded by four police men, and was not trying to escape or aggressively resist arrest, and therefore the police response was not objectively reasonable. The Sixth Circuit opinion drew all permissible inferences in favor of the plaintiff, and did not consider the question of excessive force where the inferences from the undisputed facts were drawn in favor of the defendant, as is necessary here. The Court therefore will proceed to determine whether summary judgment is appropriate based upon the facts in the record, construed in the light most favorable to the defendant.")

Kirby v. Duva, 530 F.3d 475, 482-84 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The plaintiffs' version of the events, relied upon by the district court, supports a holding that defendants violated Kirby's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Under that version, the Ranger was moving slowly and in a non-aggressive manner, could not have hit any of the officers, and was stationary at the time of the shooting. Consequently, reasonable police officers in defendants' positions would not have believed that Kirby 'pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer[s] or to others.' . . . In fact, under Moore's testimony, it was Buckley who placed himself in potential danger by moving towards the rolling Ranger instead of fleeing or simply remaining where he was. . . . Where a police officer unreasonably places himself in harm's way, his use of deadly force may be deemed excessive. . . .Finally, and critically, defendants had sufficient time under plaintiffs' account to assess the situation before firing several rounds at Kirby. . . . Even if defendants were in close proximity to the Ranger and were thus unable to determine initially that Kirby did not pose a risk, each had an adequate opportunity to realize before shooting that the Ranger had stopped moving and that no one was in its path. . . . At the time of the shooting, it was clearly established under Tennessee v. Garner . . . that police officers may not fire at non-dangerous fleeing felons such as Kirby. . . . Although Garner did not, as defendants point out, involve the roadside execution of a search warrant, its holding was clear enough to have placed defendants on notice that their conduct was unconstitutional. Garner made plain that deadly force cannot be used against an escaping suspect who does not pose an immediate danger to anyone. That rule applies here, where reasonable police officers in defendants' positions would not have perceived a threat. This conclusion is not changed by the fact that the seizure occurred on a roadside or in an attempt to execute a search warrant. . . . Finally, Brosseau v. Haugen . . . upon which defendants rely heavily, does not require a contrary result. . . . Kirby not having presented a risk under the factual version on appeal, Brosseau does not preclude a finding that the right at issue was clearly established.").

Ryan v. Park, 279 F. App'x 335, ___ (6th Cir. 2008) ("In this case, Ryan was fleeing, resisting, and obstructing police officers. She led three police cruisers on a chase that lasted almost eight minutes. As Ryan points out, this was not a high-speed chase, and the testimony and police reports from the defendants indicate that Ryan was driving at or below the speed limit during the chase. However, a chase need not be high-speed to be dangerous, and the record indicates that Ryan disobeyed traffic signals and stop signs. . . . The three factors highlighted by the Supreme Court in Graham weigh in favor of the reasonableness of the officers' use of force. First, although Ryan's initial crime was merely a traffic violation–swerving abruptly from one lane to another–Ryan ultimately committed the felony offenses of fleeing and eluding and assaulting, resisting, or obstructing an officer. This Court has held that officials are entitled to qualified immunity in the face of excessive force allegations even when the plaintiff 'was suspected of relatively minor crimes' if the plaintiff resisted and the officials responded with force. See Wysong v. City of Heath, 2008 WL 185798 at *6-7 (6th Cir. Jan. 22, 2008) (slip opinion) (discussing such cases). Second, Ryan posed an immediate threat to herself and the officers. She refused to place her vehicle in park, and it continued to push against Clark's cruiser even after the chase ended. Once she exited the vehicle, she was on a busy street and the officers wished to quickly place her in custody. Third, Ryan actively resisted arrest and attempted to evade arrest. If a reasonable officer would have recognized Ryan's condition and understood that her non-responsiveness was beyond her control, this analysis might be different. However, under the circumstances, the officers could not be expected know that Ryan's non-responsiveness might be due to a seizure. Thus we find that, under the totality of the circumstances, the officers' actions were objectively reasonable.").

Davenport v. Causey, 521 F.3d 544, 553, 554 (6th Cir. 2008) ("While neither Officer Pugh nor Officer Causey had been knocked unconscious, the situation here was similar enough to allow the use of deadly force without violating the Constitution. The officers were facing a large, violent, and angry individual who was unwilling to be brought under control by the officers. Mr. Davenport had already knocked Officer Causey to the ground and was delivering blows in rapid succession to Officer Pugh's head. Indeed, Mr. Davenport was more dangerous than the defendant in Colston because Mr. Davenport never broke off his attack and there was no indication that he would. Even though when looking in retrospect 'in the peace of a judge's chambers' it may seem that serious physical injury or death was not imminent, we cannot say that a reasonable officer on the scene facing such a suspect and having to decide very quickly could not have reasonably believed it was. . . Our analysis is not changed by the assumed fact that, when viewing the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, the off-camera blow did not occur and Officer Causey did not see the whites of Officer Pugh's eyes. While both would bolster Officer Causey's decision to use deadly force, the circumstances provided sufficient cause for deadly force absent these two facts. Even though Officer Causey did cite the fact that Officer Pugh's eyes rolled to their whites as a reason he decided to use deadly force, it was still reasonable for him to shoot Mr. Davenport under the circumstances. Again, as detailed above, Mr. Davenport was a large, violent, and angry man who was unwilling to comply with direction from the police and who had attacked two police officers in quick succession, with only four seconds having elapsed while he delivered at least five blows to the two officers. In those four seconds Mr. Davenport had struck Officer Causey at least twice and knocked him to the ground, and had struck Officer Pugh in the head three times, strikes which Officer Causey had observed. At the time he was shot, Mr. Davenport was preparing to strike Officer Pugh on the top of his head with his fist for a fourth time. As conceded by the plaintiffs, Mr. Davenport had given no indication that he planned on retreating, and, if the fight were scored on points, Mr. Davenport was winning. While Officer Causey may have been mistaken in deciding that deadly force was required and that there was no time to warn Mr. Davenport, we cannot say that, given the rapidly evolving circumstances, his decision was unreasonable.").

Floyd v. City of Detroit, 518 F.3d 398, 409 (6th Cir. 2008) ("According to the facts that we must consider at this stage of the proceedings, the officers ran around the corner of the house with their guns drawn, spotted Floyd in the diminished light, and shot him without (1) announcing themselves as police officers, (2) ordering him to surrender, or (3) pausing to determine whether he was actually armed. Based upon the facts as construed in the light most favorable to Floyd, we conclude that his right to be free from such excessive force was clearly established on the date in question. Neither officer is therefore entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.").

Lawler v. City of Taylor, Nos. 07-1329, 07-1442, 2008 WL 624770, at *2 (6th Cir. Mar. 5, 2008) ("The videotape also undermines Toro's claim that his use of force, after he threw Lawler to the floor, was reasonable. A jury could fairly conclude that, once Toro was kneeling on Lawler's back, it was gratuitous to knee him in the back twice and to hit him once with his elbow. Though Toro disputes some of Lawler's account, the video of the altercation would permit a jury to conclude that Lawler never posed a threat to Toro and that Toro used objectively unreasonable force in reaction to Lawler's continued pleas for leniency, verbal insults and drunken resistance. See generally Scott v. Harris, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 1775-76 (2007) (relying on a videotape in assessing summary-judgment evidence).")

Marvin v. City of Taylor, 509 F.3d 234, 246 n.6, 248 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The St. John court noted the passive resistance, but ultimately concluded that '[e]ven if there was evidence of resistance, it would be improper to determine whether the resistance justified the officers' actions because such a determination is for a jury in the first instance.' However, the standard articulated by the Supreme Court in Scott clearly dictates that it is a pure question of law for the court to determine whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the officers' actions were objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . As such, the St. John court's determination that such a determination is for a jury in the first instance is directly contrary to subsequent Supreme Court authority. . . Therefore, this Court will take the resistance into account in analyzing the Defendants' actions. . . .[I]t is clearly established that handcuffing an arrestee in an objectively unreasonable manner is a Fourth Amendment violation. However, it is important to keep in mind that simply because the right not to be handcuffed in an objectively unreasonable manner was clearly established, it does not necessarily follow that the Defendants in the instant matter actually behaved in an objectively unreasonable manner. Again, the value of Walton and similarly situated cases is strictly limited to the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis because Walton did not perform the objective reasonableness analysis as announced by the Supreme Court in Saucier and recently re-articulated in Scott. But, we reiterate, to get to the clearly established prong, there must first be a constitutional violation. In any event, to the extent that the facts of Walton might be so similar as to presuppose a denial of qualified immunity here, those facts are distinguishable. The Walton court credited the suspect's claim that she told the officers that she had an injured shoulder and could not put her hands behind her back. . . Similarly, Marvin claimed he was physically unable to put his hands behind his back. In Walton, the officer responded to the suspect's refusal by saying '[w]e can do this the easy way or the hard way.' . . Similarly, Officer Minard told Marvin '[p]ut your arm[s] behind you or we'll put them behind you for you.'. . In Walton, the suspect obeyed the officer's command, put her hands behind her back, and allowed the officer to handcuff her. And herein lies the critical difference between the two cases: Marvin did not obey the officers' command, but instead resisted. Note also that the suspect in Walton was not intoxicated, whereas the officers who were confronted with Marvin observed a person who was obviously intoxicated.")

Marvin v. City of Taylor, 509 F.3d 234, 253 (6th Cir. 2007)(Daughtrey, J., dissenting) ("The majority's decision to reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity is apparently based not just on the 12 video files that were before the district court, but also on six additional video files that clearly were not before the district court. The majority justifies its consideration of this extraneous evidence on the basis of our authority to exercise de novo review of a district court's ruling on a motion for summary judgment. That review, however, does not allow us to resolve disputes of fact that are, as here, material to the outcome of the case, nor to consider evidence not introduced below or to find facts not found by the district court. Indeed, nothing in Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 10, governing the record on appeal, permits the introduction–or, presumably, the consideration–of new evidence in the courts of appeal. For this reason, I would remand the case to the district court with a direction to identify the 12 files submitted into evidence below or, alternatively, to view all 18 files and reconsider its ruling on the defendants' motion for summary judgment in light of the intervening case of Scott v. Harris, 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007). That recent Supreme Court opinion, released after the district court's decision was issued in this case, holds that in ruling on a motion for summary judgment, a district court need not view the facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party if that party's version of events is 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.' . . As in this case, the record in Scott included videotapes that arguably conflicted with the non-moving party's version of events in a section 1983 action charging law enforcement officers with the use of excessive force. Whether or not Scott is applicable retroactively to this case in its current posture, clearly it would be both relevant and applicable to a new ruling by the district court on the motion for summary judgment.")

Green v. Taylor, 239 F. App'x 952, 2007 WL 2478663, at *8 (6th Cir. Aug. 30, 2007) ("The present situation is an 'obvious case' in which the standards articulated in Garner and Yates ' "clearly establish"the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'[citing Brosseau] The district court correctly determined that a reasonable jury could conclude under Green's version of the facts that Taylor had no reason to believe that the suspects posed an immediate risk to the officers or anyone else if the vehicle was not backing up or being used as a weapon.").

Murray-Ruhl v. Passinault, 2007 WL 2478584, at *8 (6th Cir. Aug. 29, 2007) ("When the suspect poses no immediate risk of death or serious danger, Brosseau does not control and Tennessee v. Garner provides a 'clearly established' right that fulfills the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis.").

Williams v. City of Grosse Pointe Park, 496 F.3d 482, 487, 488 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The dissent relies upon Sigley v. City of Parma Heights, 437 F.3d 527 (6th Cir.2006), and Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766 (6th Cir.2005), in support of its contention that the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, demonstrate that Miller acted unreasonably. We respectfully disagree. The Sigley and Cupp courts were both presented with a factual dispute regarding the events that gave rise to the officers' use of deadly force. . . In contrast, the facts of this case are undisputed, and while the dissent takes a different view of the events depicted on the video, we do not believe that any rational trier of fact could conclude that Miller acted unreasonably. Both Sigley and Cupp concluded that the plaintiffs' version of the facts could support a finding that the defendants acted unreasonably, and we have no difficulty with those conclusions. Sigley and Cupp are inapplicable to the facts of this case because the events depicted on the video demonstrate that Miller reasonably believed that Williams posed a threat of serious harm and acted in accordance with that belief. The dissent's assertion that Smith and Cupp should control the outcome of this case depends upon its view of the facts of this case–purportedly after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs–for which we find no support in the record.").

Bouggess v. Mattingly, 482 F.3d 886, 894, 895 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The question in this case, therefore, is whether Mattingly reasonably could have thought that he had probable cause to believe that Newby posed a serious danger to Mattingly or to others. Under the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Bouggess, Newby was (a) present at a crack deal; (b) uttered no threatening remarks toward Mattingly or anybody else; (c) never drew a weapon; (d) struggled with Mattingly in order to flee; (e) did not reach for Mattingly's gun; (f) did not fire Mattingly's gun at Mattingly's foot; (g) broke free from Mattingly and ran away, facing away from Mattingly; and (h) was shot three times in the back. Viewing the facts that way, no reasonable officer could have thought he had probable cause to use deadly force against Newby. . . . Certainly, Garner's statement of the governing law may be applied differently in particular sets of circumstances, and reasonable minds can disagree over precisely which circumstances justify the use of deadly force. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has recognized that there are obvious cases in which an officer should have been on notice that his conduct violated constitutional rights, despite the generalized nature of that Court's pronouncements of constitutional standards. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Our circuit and others have held that some cases can be so obvious under Garner and governing circuit precedent that officers should be presumed to have been aware that their conduct violated constitutional standards. . . . This is such an obvious case.").

Humphrey v. Mabry, 482 F.3d 840, 847, 848, 851 (6th Cir. 2007) ("In a situation such as the present one where the constitutional violations are based on the collective knowledge of a number of police officers, it is important to recognize that an individual officer is still entitled to qualified immunity if an objectively reasonable officer in the same position could have reasonably believed that he or she was acting lawfully. . . More specifically, where individual police officers, acting in good faith and in reliance on the reports of other officers, have a sufficient factual basis for believing that they are in compliance with the law, qualified immunity is warranted, notwithstanding the fact that an action may be illegal when viewed under the totality of the circumstances. . . . Accordingly, in a case such as this where one officer's claim to qualified immunity from the consequences of a constitutional violation rests on his asserted good faith reliance on the report of other officers, we consider: (1) what information was clear or should have been clear to the individual officer at the time of the incident; and (2) what information that officer was reasonably entitled to rely on in deciding how to act, based on an objective reading of the information. . . . . We agree with our dissenting colleague that the complaint alleges an unconstitutionally intrusive seizure and use of force. We also agree that if several police mistakes had not occurred, Humphrey would have been spared his brief ordeal. . . However, all three defendant officers' individual mistakes were reasonable mistakes understandably committed in good faith while performing their job in a potentially dangerous situation. They are entitled to qualified immunity for those mistakes.").

Griffith v. Coburn, 473 F.3d 650, 659, 660 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Brosseau is fundamentally distinct from the present case. In Brosseau there was no factual dispute about the reasonableness of the officer's belief that the suspect posed risk to others. . . . When the facts in this case are viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it is clear that Partee posed no threat to the officers or anyone else. It follows that the use of the neck restraint in such circumstances violates a clearly established constitutional right to be free from gratuitous violence during arrest and is obviously inconsistent with a general prohibition on excessive force. . . .[I]f the jury concludes that Officer Sutherland used the neck restraint without an objectively reasonable belief that Partee posed a threat of serious bodily injury, then it is obvious to us that 'no reasonable officer could believe that such [use of force] would not violate another's constitutional rights.'")

Pigram v. Chaudoin, No. 05-6660, 2006 WL 2860773, at *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 5, 2006) (not published) ("Although the 'right to make an arrest ... necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it,' the officers' interest justifies only the amount of force that a reasonable officer in the heat of the moment could have believed was needed to effectuate the arrest. In the present case, the slap cannot reasonably be construed as a means of subduing Pigram, especially given that Chaudoin's justification for the slap was not to protect himself, other officers, or the public, but rather was because Pigram had a 'smart-ass mouth.'. . . On the facts as we must take them, there was simply no governmental interest in slapping Pigram after he had been handcuffed, nor could a reasonable officer have thought there was. This Court's case law supports Pigram's right not to be slapped gratuitously. Specifically, cases in this circuit clearly establish the right of people who pose no safety risk to the police to be free from gratuitous violence during arrest. [citing cases] Therefore, qualified immunity is not available for lack of a 'clearly established' right.")

Smoak v. Hall, 460 F.3d 768, 782 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In balancing the THP troopers' suspicion–based on an unsupported dispatch alerting the troopers to a 'possible robbery'–against the intrusiveness of the seizure, we conclude that the seizure of the Smoaks violated their Fourth Amendment rights because it became an arrest without probable cause.The Smoaks have not, however, met their burden of demonstrating that the THP troopers on the scene should have known that the unreasonable seizure was in violation of the Smoaks' constitutional rights. . . Caselaw from this circuit has endorsed the use of guns and handcuffs during a felony stop, even if only as part of an investigatory seizure. . . Although the use of guns and handcuffs in the present case was unreasonably intrusive, prior decisions had not made this clear. We are also faced with the question of whether the approximately nine minutes that the Smoaks spent in handcuffs after the THP troopers were informed that no robberies had occurred is enough to deny the troopers qualified immunity. The law is clear that '[o]nce the purposes of the initial traffic stop [are] completed, there is no doubt that the officer [can] not further detain the vehicle or its occupants unless something that occurred during the traffic stop generated the reasonable suspicion to justify a further detention.' . . As a result, the traffic stop morphed into an arrest. But the THP troopers were still in the process of sorting out the disconnect between why they had pulled over the Smoaks in the first place and the new information received from the dispatchers. The Smoaks were also justifiably agitated and upset over the loss of their dog, and the troopers wanted to diffuse the situation. In this confusing factual scenario, we believe that the few extra minutes that the troopers took to release the Smoaks was not so unreasonable as to deny them the protection of qualified immunity.").

Bing v. City of Whitehall, Ohio, 456 F.3d 555, 570, 571 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Throwing a flashbang device into a house with knowledge that the dwelling will likely catch fire thus constitutes unreasonable force in these circumstances even assuming (without deciding) that the police would have been justified in using deadly force. Bing's right not to endure a second flashbang device in these circumstances, however, was not 'clearly established.' The Supreme Court has not clearly established such a right, nor has this court or other circuits. . . None of the cases concerning flashbang devices to which the parties refer involve policemen who knew that such devices would likely ignite flammable materials and thereby cause a fire. . . Given the lack of any case similar to this case finding a Fourth Amendment violation, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in the circumstances at issue that employing the second flashbang device violated the Constitution.")

Bing v. City of Whitehall, Ohio, 456 F.3d 555, 571, 572 (6th Cir. 2006) ("This set of facts assumed by the district court, if true, constitutes a violation of Bing's Fourth Amendment right against the use of deadly force. If, indeed, Bing did not have the gun after the police entered the house and posed no safety threat to anyone when he was shot to death in the back, then the danger he had once posed had abated. Under these assumptions, the officers had no legitimate interest in using deadly force that could counterbalance Bing's fundamental interest in his life. Therefore, under these assumptions, the Graham balancing test compels the conclusion that Bing's rights would have been violated. . . Moreover, the right allegedly violated is clearly established under the Supreme Court's ruling in Tennessee v. Garner. . . . No reasonable officer could fail to see that shooting an unarmed man in the back who has ceased to present a danger violates Garner. The district court therefore properly denied summary judgment to the officers with respect to the police-shooting deadly force claim.").

Alkhateeb v. Charter Township of Waterford, No. 05-1856, 2006 WL 1889240, at *9 (6th Cir. July 10, 2006) (not published) ("In our opinion, the unlawfulness of holding a gun to a suspect's head while berating him about his nationality is apparent. No reasonable officer in Lemos' position would think that what he was alleged to have done would be lawful. . . Moreover, in this Circuit, the law is clearly established that an officer may not use additional gratuitous force once a suspect has been neutralized. . . . Thus, with the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Basim, the officers inflicted force that was gratuitous and would have been recognized by a reasonable officer as excessive. Officers are and have been on notice that the use of gratuitous force against a detained and passive or non-resisting suspect violates the Constitution. No reasonable officer would have believed that he could kick, kneel upon a suspect's neck, or hold a gun to a suspect's head when that suspect has shown no sign of resistance, no sign of being armed or dangerous, and is already subdued.").

Sigley v. City of Parma Heights, 437 F.3d 527, 536, 537 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The conflicting views of the facts demonstrate that there are unresolved factual issues regarding whether Mockler was chasing after Davis' car or the car was turning into him when he fired. Additionally, it is not clear whether Mockler had probable cause to believe that Davis posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to others. Viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the Plaintiff, these are disputed factual issues that preclude the granting of summary judgment. . . . On appeal, Defendants argue, and the dissent asserts, that even if a constitutional violation occurred, Officer Mockler is entitled to qualified immunity. We disagree. Although, the district court did not address this issue because qualified immunity presents a purely legal issue we will discuss this issue. Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, Mockler should not be granted qualified immunity. . . . The primary issue is whether the constitutional right allegedly violated was defined at the appropriate level of specificity to be clearly established. This is a legal issue. The contours of the right must be clear enough to put an officer on notice that the actions he is taking are unlawful. At the time of the shooting, '[u]se of deadly force to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable.'. . . Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, the situation confronting Mockler was whether to shoot Davis, who did not intentionally create any harm to anyone on the scene, while attempting to flee.The dissent relies on Brosseau to support the granting of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. In Brosseau, the Court stated that the material facts taken in a light most favorable to the plaintiff showed that the shooting officer believed the suspect had a gun and was fearful for officers in the immediate area. . . The Court held that when the material facts identify official conduct within the 'hazy border' between excessive and acceptable force, the qualified immunity privilege applies. . . . . Accordingly, viewing the facts in a light most favorable to the Plaintiff, Mockler was running behind Davis' car, out of danger, and Davis drove in a manner to avoid others on the scene in an attempt to flee. Accepting these facts as true, Mockler would have fair notice that shooting Davis in the back when he did not pose an immediate threat to other officers was unlawful.").

Sigley v. City of Parma Heights, 437 F.3d 527, 538, 539 (6th Cir. 2006) (Batchelder, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. I would affirm summary judgment in favor of Officer Mockler because he was entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects an officer from suit when the officer 'makes a decision that, even of constitutionally deficient, misapprehends the circumstances she confronted.' [citing Brosseau] In Saucier v. Katz, the Supreme Court held that a lower court faced with a qualified immunity defense must first determine whether the plaintiff has asserted the violation of a constitutional right. . . Sigley clearly has done so. '[T]he next, sequential step is to ask whether the right was clearly established.' . . . Officer Mockler could not have known that his conduct was unlawful. Under Tennessee v. Garner, the use of deadly force is reasonable when an 'officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . The Supreme Court has addressed the question of when a suspect escaping in a vehicle poses such a threat. In Brosseau v. Haugen, the court held that an officer who fatally shot a suspect fleeing in a Jeep was entitled to qualified immunity. . .

.Because the law did not clearly establish a Fourth Amendment right in favor of a 'disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight,' the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . . This case is analogous to Brosseau. The defendants in this case have produced uncontroverted evidence that Davis posed a significant threat to the officers on the scene.").

Tallman v. Elizabethtown Police Dep't., No. 04-5723, 2006 WL 166610, at *6, *7 (6th Cir. Jan. 23, 2006) (unpublished) ("In sum, the Graham factors raise no genuine questions about the reasonableness of Bland's actions. At the moment of the incident, it was not unreasonable for Bland to perceive that Lee posed a serious threat to his safety. Therefore, Lee's constitutional rights were not violated and Bland is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Furthermore, even if Bland's actions had violated Lee's Fourth Amendment rights, the right in question was not clearly established so as to preclude the application of qualified immunity. The cases cited by the parties demonstrate that 'this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.... The cases by no means "clearly establish" that [Bland's] conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.'[citing Brosseau]").

Tallman v. Elizabethtown Police Dep't., No. 04-5723, 2006 WL 166610, at 11-14 (6th Cir. Jan. 23, 2006) (Clay, J., dissenting) (unpublished) ("The key issue in this case is not whether it was reasonable for Officer Bland to chase Babb and Lee at high speeds; nor whether it was reasonable for him to have his gun drawn as he exited his car once the chase was over. The key issue in the case–the one that warrants a trial and the one the majority entirely ignores–is whether it was reasonable for Bland to charge full-speed at Lee with his gun drawn, giving Lee no meaningful chance to submit to his authority, and to continue at full-speed upon arriving at the passenger window, plunging into the passenger compartment, gun still in hand. After reading the majority opinion, one would not imagine that this is in fact what occurred. The only reason I am able to recount the event as it actually happened is because I have seen the videotape that recorded it for posterity–a videotape no jury will see. The majority has treated this case so cavalierly that justice has escaped. I therefore dissent. . . . I am firmly of the view that a reasonable jury could conclude Officer Bland's decisions to charge Lee with his gun drawn, without giving Lee a meaningful opportunity to comply with his instructions, and reach into the passenger compartment while still aiming the gun at Lee's head, were objectively unreasonable, indeed reckless. . . . Furthermore, on this record a reasonable jury could conclude that Bland's conduct went beyond mere negligence, i.e., beyond objective unreasonableness, such that application of the qualified immunity doctrine would be improper. . . . The majority has dissociated itself with the remarkable facts of this case. As I have endeavored to explain, genuine issues of material fact abound. Was it reasonable for Bland to charge at Lee with his gun drawn, giving Lee no meaningful chance to submit to Bland's authority? To allow only 2.5 seconds for Lee to consider the instruction to exit the car and, moreover, to force Lee to consider this instruction while facing an advancing policeman with a gun trained directly at him? To continue full-speed upon arriving at Babb's car and to plunge through the passenger window with the gun still in hand and his finger pressing on the trigger? The case law and the record suggest some or all of these decisions may not have been reasonable under the circumstances of this case and, furthermore, that a reasonable officer would have known it. A trial is required. I therefore dissent.").

Ciminillo v. Streicher, 434 F.3d 461, 467-69 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Although the factors articulated in Graham each militate against a finding that Knight's conduct was reasonable, we must consider the totality of the circumstances. It is undisputed that Knight shot Ciminillo during the course of a riot. However, the fact that the shooting took place during a riot does not automatically render Knight's conduct reasonable. . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Ciminillo, it was objectively unreasonable for Knight to shoot Ciminillo as he attempted to leave the scene of the riot. The use of less-than-deadly force in the context of a riot against an individual displaying no aggression is not reasonable. . . . Even though Ciminillo alleges facts that, if true, would constitute a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, Knight may still be entitled to qualified immunity unless those rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the shooting. . . . Thus, we must determine whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Knight's position that shooting Ciminillo with a beanbag propellant was unreasonable. It was clearly established law in this Circuit at the time of the underlying events that individuals have a right not to be shot unless they are perceived as posing a threat to officers or others. . . Although Knight did not use deadly force in shooting Ciminillo, that fact cannot insulate him from liability. At the time of the underlying events, this Court had previously held that the use of less-than-deadly force, including pepper spray, may be excessive. . . . Thus, in this Circuit, it was clearly established that individuals had a general right to be free from the unreasonable use of non-lethal force. Furthermore, Knight was on notice that it is unreasonable to use beanbag propellants against individuals who pose no immediate risk to officer safety. In Deorle, the Ninth Circuit held that the use of beanbag propellants against an unarmed man who posed no immediate threat was not objectively reasonable. . . . Given Yates, Adams, and Deorle, it was clearly established that shooting Ciminillo with a beanbag was objectively unreasonable. Thus, Knight is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 771, 773-77(6th Cir. 2005) ("The plaintiffs have put forward sufficient evidence to show that Dunn's actions violated Smith's constitutional rights. According to the plaintiffs' evidence, Dunn shot Smith after the police cruiser was past Dunn and there was no immediate danger to anyone in the vicinity. Dunn's use of force was made even more unreasonable by the fact that Smith had been cooperative up to this point, and was arrested for the nonviolent offence of making harassing phone calls. Although there was some danger to the public from Smith's driving off in a stolen police car, the danger presented by Smith was not so grave as to justify the use of deadly force. . . . Thus although events developed rapidly, under plaintiffs' version of the facts this is not a case where a dangerous situation evolved quickly to a safe one before the police officer had a chance to realize the change. . . Instead, this is a case where a jury could conclude that Officer Dunn was not in any danger in the first place. The fact that this was a rapidly evolving situation does not, by itself, permit him to use deadly force. Although this circuit's previous cases give substantial deference to an officer's decision to shoot a unarmed suspect in a car chase, the officer must have reason to believe that the car presents an imminent danger.[discussing cases] Though Smith could have used the police cruiser to injure or kill Officer Dunn, under the plaintiffs' version of the facts he was not doing so when Dunn shot him or even before Dunn shot him. Although Smith had possession of a dangerous 'weapon,' he was not threatening the lives of those around him with it when he was fatally shot. . . . It is clearly established constitutional law that an officer cannot shoot a non-dangerous fleeing felon in the back of the head. . . Brosseau v. Haugen does not preclude this court from finding the right at issue was clearly established because the Brosseau Court said that undisputed facts showed that the shooting officer believed the suspect had a gun and was fearful for officers in the immediate area. . . Brosseau is instructive on what makes law 'clearly established' in a case where an officer shoots a suspect fleeing in a car. Brosseau held that the two major excessive force cases, Tennessee v. Garner and Graham v. Connor . . . did not clearly establish the existence of the right alleged to have been violated in Brosseau. . . The Brosseau Court reasoned that the rule from Tennessee v. Garner did not apply because of the substantial risk of danger. . . In this case, the plaintiff's facts show there was no danger. The absence of any Garner preconditions to the use of deadly force makes this an 'obvious' case and distinguishes it from Brosseau. . . . The facts in Brosseau are not comparable to those in this case. In the light most favorable to Smith, there is no comparable evidence that Dunn had cause to believe that Smith posed an immediate risk of death or serious danger to Dunn, Rutherford, or nearby citizens. Smith was being arrested for a making harassing phone calls, not a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm. . . Unlike the situation in Brosseau, Smith and Dunn never struggled, Smith never displayed any violent tendencies, and the facts support a finding that a reasonable officer in Dunn's position would not have perceived danger to anyone at the scene. The fact that this case is very different from Brosseau permits the conclusion that Garner, by itself, clearly establishes the right at issue. . . . Garner and Graham clearly establish that a suspect fleeing in a car that has never posed a danger to anyone has the clearly established right not to be seized with deadly force. Because, Garner and its progeny clearly establish that Dunn violated Smith's constitutional rights by shooting him when the facts support a finding that a reasonable officer in Dunn's position would not have perceived Smith endangered anyone at the scene, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.").

Bultema v. Benzie County, No. 04-1772, 2005 WL 1993429, at *8, *9 (6th Cir. Aug. 17, 2005) (not published) ("It has long been held in this circuit that the right to be free from the use of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established. . . More specifically, in the context of the police's use of chemical spray to subdue a suspect, we held that it was clearly established in 1999 that a police officer's use of pepper spray against a suspect after he was handcuffed and hobbled constituted excessive force. . . With regard to Ketz's alleged blow to Bultema's head, we have also held for more than twenty years that it is clearly established in this circuit that 'a totally gratuitous blow' to a suspect who is handcuffed and offering no resistance violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Thus, applying these precedents to this case, we conclude that Ketz's actions as described by Stariha violated a clearly established constitutional right. Furthermore, we hold that Ketz's alleged actions were objectively unreasonable in light of this clearly established constitutional right. Ketz argues in his brief that 'a reasonable officer in Deputy Ketz's position would not necessarily have known that it might be unlawful to use pepper spray or force on a plaintiff who assaulted him and who was actively resisting him.' . . . [C]ontrary to Ketz's argument, regardless of what the suspect may have done to the police officer prior to the arrest, the police officer is constitutionally prohibited from exacting retribution once the suspect has been subdued. Accordingly, we have repeatedly upheld limits upon police action against those already restrained. . . . Therefore, we hold that under the facts as described by Stariha, no reasonable police officer in Ketz's situation would use pepper spray on Bultema or strike him in the head after he had already been placed in handcuffs.").

Myers v. Potter, 422 F.3d 347, 356, 357 (6th Cir. 2005) ("The particularized inquiry we employ to determine whether Hutchins should be entitled to qualified immunity is whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Hutchins's position that the 'consent' obtained from Myers and his mother was legally insufficient to justify Raymond's seizure and detention. It is, we think, indisputable that a reasonable officer would have known that it was unlawful to take Myers into custody by using false representations as to the location and expected duration of the interrogation in order to obtain his consent and that of his mother. And no reasonable officer would have believed that Myers's detention was consensual after he made repeated requests to go home within hours of his detainment. . . . We hold that a reasonable officer in Hutchins's position would have known that, in light of Myers's detainment without probable cause or judicial authorization, the false representations made to him and to his mother to obtain their 'consent' to his detainment, and his repeated requests to be released, Raymond's clearly established constitutional rights were being violated. Accordingly, the district court erred in concluding that Officer Hutchins is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 579 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Brosseau leaves open two paths for showing that officers were on notice that they were violating a 'clearly established' constitutional right–where the violation was sufficiently 'obvious' under the general standards of constitutional care that the plaintiff need not show 'a body' of 'materially similar' case law, id., and where the violation is shown by the failure to adhere to a 'particularized' body of precedent that 'squarely govern [s] the case here,' id. at 599-600. Lyons has not satisfied either requirement for showing the violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right. First, the constitutional violation, if any, was by no means an 'obvious' one that the 'general [excessive-force] tests set out in Garner and Graham ... can 'clearly establish' ... even without a body of relevant case law.' . . Even accepting all of Lyons' factual allegations as true, there is nothing 'obvious' about what Officer Foubert should have done upon entering a house from which a fellow officer had just placed a distressed call for backup help and in which he could see immediately upon entering that the officer and resident were in close proximity to each other and in the middle of some form of confrontation. . . . . Second, no precedent 'squarely governs the case here.'. . As the cases that we have canvassed fairly indicate, the standards governing the constitutionality of Lyons' excessive-force tackling claim 'depend[ ] very much on the facts of each case.' . . To that end, we have been unable to identify a single case predating the conduct at issue that prohibits tackling in a materially similar context. 'Because the focus is on whether the officer had fair notice that her conduct was unlawful,' . . . and because Officer Foubert's actions, as in Brosseau, at best 'fell in the Ahazy border between excessive and acceptable force,"' . . Lyons has failed to show the violation of a clearly established right in this more 'particularized' sense.").

Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 589, 590 (6th Cir. 2005) (Tarnow, District Judge, dissenting) ("I do not read Brosseau to require that, for notice purposes, prior case law must be factually identical to the case sub judice. . . . [T]he issue is not whether prior case law presents identical, or even substantially similar, facts, but whether those cases would have put a reasonable officer on notice that his conduct would violate a constitutional right. In Brosseau, the Supreme Court left open one avenue by which a plaintiff may circumvent the notice requirement. In an 'obvious' case, a constitutional violation can be clearly established even without a body of relevant case law. . . I conclude that the law was sufficient to place Officer Foubert on notice that his action would violate Lyons's constitutional rights and that this is an obvious case in which a body of case law is not necessary. The events in question occurred in August 1998. At that time, it was clearly established that, before tackling a suspect to the ground, an officer should give the suspect an opportunity to voluntarily surrender. . . . Regardless of the status of the law in August 1998, I believe that reasonable officers would know, even without specific guidance from the courts, that tackling a woman who is merely resisting an unlawful arrest in her own home, without giving her fair warning, is unconstitutional. Thus, I place this case under the 'obvious' rubric established by the Supreme Court in Brosseau and conclude that a body of relevant case law is not necessary.").

St. John v. Hickey, 411 F.3d 762, 774 (6th Cir. 2005) ("[W]e conclude the right of a nonviolent arrestee to be free from unnecessary pain knowingly inflicted during an arrest was clearly established as of November 9, 2000, the day the defendants arrested St. John. Consequently, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on St. John's claim that they violated his Fourth Amendment rights by attempting to place him in the back seat of the police cruiser after he specifically explained that his legs would not bend on account of his muscular dystrophy. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer would have known that the manner of the arrest was clearly unlawful.").

Sample v. Bailey, 409 F.3d 689, 698-700 (6th Cir. 2005) ("In denying qualified immunity, the district court held that since the Garner decision in 1985, it has been clearly established that the use of deadly force is only constitutionally reasonable if *'the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'* . . Bailey argues in his brief that this generalized statement is not particular enough to put a reasonable officer on notice in the specific factual context of this case. Instead, Bailey argues that the absence of a factually similar precedent case requires this court to find that the constitutional right is not clearly established. Put another way, Bailey claims that a reasonable officer would be unaware that he could not use deadly force to seize a burglary suspect, who was unarmed but found hiding in a building at night. We disagree. In Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S.Ct. 596, 599 (2004), the United States Supreme Court recently stated that 'Graham and Garner, following the lead of the Fourth Amendment's text, are cast at a high level of generality*'* and therefore may be insufficient to give a police officer fair warning of the constitutional parameters regarding the use of deadly force in a specific factual context. In Brosseau, the police officer was faced with the situation of *'whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight.'*. . The Court cited three cases, including one from this court, which reached different conclusions on whether a police officer in such a situation would be justified in using deadly force. As a result, the Court held that a reasonable officer who fully understood Garner's general constitutional command nevertheless would not know whether the use of deadly force was permissible in that situation. Because a reasonable officer at that time would not have had fair warning that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, the Court held that the law was not clearly established and therefore, the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . .By contrast, the Court recognized that *'in an obvious case, [general] standards can 'clearly establish' the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'* . . As the Supreme Court has noted, *'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'*. . When a general constitutional principle *'is not tied to particularized facts,'* the principle *'can clearly establish law applicable in the future to different sets of detailed facts.'* . . The determinative issue is whether the officer had *'fair warning that his conduct deprived [the plaintiff] of a constitutional right.'*. . We hold that this case is *'an obvious case'* because it does not present a novel factual circumstance such that a police officer would be unaware of the constitutional parameters of his actions. We have held that it has been clearly established in this circuit for the last twenty years that a criminal suspect *'ha[s] a right not to be shot unless he [is] perceived to pose a threat to the pursuing officers or to others during flight.'* . . This articulation of the Garner rule is clearly established even in situations with diverse factual distinctions. . . . Though a factually similar precedent case may not have existed at the time these cases were decided, we held that the rule established in Robinson was particular enough to give a reasonable officer fair notice of his unconstitutional conduct. Thus, regardless of whether the incident took place at day or night, in a building or outside, whether the suspect is fleeing or found, armed or unarmed, intoxicated or sober, mentally unbalanced or sane, it is clearly established that a reasonable police officer may not shoot the suspect unless the suspect poses a perceived threat of serious physical harm to the officer or others. These factual distinctions between the cases do not alter the certainty about the law itself. Similarly, we conclude that the factual context of this case–the darkness, the unfamiliar building, Sample's intoxication and unresponsiveness–is sufficiently similar to our body of case law applying the Robinson rule so as to give Bailey fair warning that shooting a suspect who was not perceived as posing a serious threat to the officers or to others is unconstitutional.").

McKinley v. City of Mansfield, 404 F.3d 418, 440-42 (6th Cir. 2005) ("We decline to adopt the view of qualified immunity advanced by Defendants and the district court, namely, that since 'there is no federal case on point,' . . . Defendants are immune from suit. The Supreme Court's response to this argument is well-suited to the circumstances of this case: 'This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful; but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . In cases where courts have dismissed Fifth Amendment suits against state employers on qualified immunity grounds, they have done so because the complaining employees did not allege that they had been subjected to the kind of compulsion and subsequent prosecution proscribed by Garrity and its progeny. . . . In stark contrast to these cases, McKinley presents sufficient evidence for summary judgment purposes to suggest that he was compelled to incriminate himself in precisely the manner held unlawful by the Supreme Court in Garrity. The Court's holding in that case bears repeating: 'We now hold that the protection of the individual under the Fourteenth Amendment against coerced statements prohibits use in subsequent criminal proceedings of statements obtained under threat of removal from office, and that it extends to all, whether they are policemen or other members of our body politic .'. . Particularly in light of the defendants' obvious familiarity with Garrity, . . . we take issue with the district court's representation that 'there is no federal case on point' because it is hard to imagine a case that could be more on point–in view of the facts before us– than Garrity itself. We conclude, therefore, that Defendant Fortney is not entitled to qualified immunity . . . . Finally, we address the criticisms of our dissenting colleague. The dissent suggests that Officer Fortney should be entitled to qualified immunity because we have established a *'new right of action.'* We are unclear how, but it makes no difference since in no sense is McKinley's right to sue Fortney 'new.' The dissent cannot mean that the use at a criminal proceeding requirement is new. In Chavez, the Court was asked whether the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination was truly as broad as the Ninth Circuit had interpreted it, which is to say, as a right not only against the use of one's self-incriminating statements in a criminal case but a right against being coercively questioned in the first instance. . . Chavez established a new rule of law only in the sense that it limited the right to sue for Fifth Amendment violations to only those cases in which such suits were already permissible under clearly established law, i.e., cases in which the plaintiff's incriminating statements had been used in a prior criminal proceeding. If the dissent means that our holding is *'new'* because we have sustained, at the summary judgment stage, a § 1983 action against a police officer on the allegation that he compelled the plaintiff to incriminate himself, we can only conclude the dissent misapprehends the nature of qualified immunity. The doctrine of qualified immunity does not mean that a state actor is qualifiedly immune unless the plaintiff can point to a prior case in which judgment was entered against the same type of state actor on the same facts. . .As we said recently: *'*Officials do not enjoy qualified immunity simply because the exact action in question has not previously been held unlawful by a court, but Ain light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent." ' . . With regard to the present case, pre-existing law makes apparent the unlawfulness of compelling someone to make incriminating statements that are later used against him at trial. . . . Accordingly, we hold that a reasonable officer would understand that what Fortney and his colleagues are alleged to have done violates the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.").

Beard v. Whitmore Lake School District, 402 F.3d 598, 603, 607, 608 (6th Cir. 2005) ("In this case, the searches performed by the defendants were unconstitutional; however, at the time that the searches occurred, the law did not clearly establish the unlawfulness of the defendants' actions. We accordingly do not reach the third prong of the test–whether the plaintiff has offered sufficient evidence that the defendants' actions were unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . In this case, approximately twenty male students were searched, in the absence of individualized suspicion and without consent, in the hopes of locating missing money. Approximately five female students were searched under similar circumstances, but were also required to remove their clothes in the presence of one another. Under these circumstances, the searches were a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Assuming arguendo that Officer Mayrand was aware of these circumstances when ordering the female students to be searched, his conduct was also unlawful. As explained by the Supreme Court in New Jersey v. T.L.O.,. . . a school search violates the Fourth Amendment when the school undertakes a search of a student that is unreasonable. . . . . At the time of the search at issue, the prior law involving strip searches of students did not clearly establish that the defendants' actions in this case were unconstitutional. The Supreme Court cases on school searches, T.L.O. and Vernonia, set forth basic principles of law relating to school searches, yet do not offer the guidance necessary to conclude that the officials here were, or should have been, on notice that the searches performed in this case were unreasonable. . . . The Supreme Court has recently instructed that, for purposes of the 'clearly established' inquiry, the analysis ' 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' ' [citing Brosseau] Accordingly, cases'cast at a high level of generality,' will only be sufficient to clearly establish the unlawfulness of the defendants' actions where the conduct at issue is 'obviously' a violation based on the prior cases. . . This is not such an obvious case. In T.L.O., the Court announced that school searches should be subject to a reasonableness standard. . . In determining whether a particular search is reasonable, the Court announced a two-pronged, multi-factor test that weighs the students' interest in privacy against the school's interest in maintaining a safe learning environment. . . Yet, the Court did little to explain how the factors should be applied in the wide variety of factual circumstances facing school officials today. Accordingly, T.L.O. is useful in 'guiding us in determining the law in many different kinds of circumstances'; but is not 'the kind of clear law' necessary to have clearly established the unlawfulness of the defendants' actions in this case. . . . Given the lack of a factual context similar to that of this case, T.L.O. and Vernonia could not have 'truly compelled' the defendants to realize that they were acting illegally when they participated in the searches of the students in this case. The Sixth Circuit cases involving student strip searches also do not clearly establish the unconstitutionality of the searches in the instant case. Indeed, in Williams, 936 F.2d 881, and Tarter v. Raybuck, 742 F.2d 977 (6th Cir.1984), strip searches of students were found to be reasonable. Although the officials in each of those cases possessed individualized suspicion as to the particular student searched, the cases do not clearly state that such individualized suspicion is absolutely necessary to justify such a search. . . . The Sixth Circuit cases thus simply do not 'truly compel' the conclusion that the searches in this case were not reasonable. Finally, we recognize that, at the time the searches were conducted, the Seventh Circuit had held that the strip search of a student in particular circumstances was not reasonable. . . In addition, some district courts in other circuits have held student strip searches to be unreasonable in cases more closely analogous to the instant case. [citing cases] These cases were not sufficient to establish clearly the unlawfulness of the defendants' actions in this case. In the 'rare instance' where it is proper to seek guidance from outside this circuit, the law will only be clearly established where the cases from outside this circuit 'both point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and [are] so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct, if challenged on constitutional grounds, would be found wanting.' . . The cases dealing with school strip searches from courts in other circuits are not 'clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority,' and therefore do not clearly establish that the searches in this case were unreasonable.").

Wiley for the Estate of Thomas v. City of Columbus, No. 2:17-CV-888, 2021 WL 2634860, at *6, *10, *12–13 (S.D. Ohio June 25, 2021) ("[W]here the Graham test does not fit, 'because the person in question has not committed a crime, is not resisting arrest, and is not directly threatening the officer,' the Sixth Circuit requires that a 'more tailored set of factors be considered in the medical-emergency context' to determine whether the officers' actions were objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them. Estate of Hill, 853 F.3d at 314. . . . In the case at bar, the Court concludes that after applying the Estate of Hill factors to the record evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Andrews and Shaffner did not use excessive force against Thomas when restraining him on the ground for the purpose of allowing paramedics to safely enter the scene and administer emergency medical treatment. . . .Even if the Court determined that a constitutional violation had occurred, the law as of January 14, 2017, was not clearly established that police officers responding to a medical emergency call could not apply pressure to the legs and lower back/hip area of a combative, non-compliant person to secure emergency medical treatment. . . . At the time of the incident, no reasonable officer would have known that applying pressure to the legs and lower/back hip area of a kicking and flailing individual who needed emergency medical treatment, posed a threat to paramedics' safety, and needed to be subdued for paramedics to administer medical assistance, violated that person's constitutional rights. Andrews's and Shaffner's conduct was therefore not clearly prohibited in the circumstances before them, and they acted reasonably in the particular circumstances they faced. Plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that a right is clearly established, and the Court finds that Plaintiff has not presented sufficient case law clearly establishing that police officers responding to a medical emergency call could not apply pressure to the legs and lower back/hip area of a combative, non-compliant person to subdue the person, so that he or she could receive emergency medical treatment. Therefore, Andrews and Shaffner are also entitled to qualified immunity under this prong of the qualified immunity analysis.")

Dunfee v. Finchum, 132 F. Supp. 3d 968, 978-79 (E.D. Tenn. 2015) ("While the Court declines to address whether Officer Finchum's conduct was constitutional, the pre-existing law leans toward constitutionality. . . . For Officer Finchum to have violated a clearly established right, it would have to have been clear to every reasonable officer on June 29, 2012, that a person suffering from a medical condition, who became combative toward police officers responding to a call for medical assistance, had a right not to be subjected to the force Officer Finchum employed on that day. The force Officer Finchum used against plaintiff was as follows: (1) placing a hand on plaintiff to keep him in the vehicle; (2) laying on top of plaintiff in the car; (3) tasing plaintiff in the car; (4) again laying down on plaintiff while outside the vehicle. All the while plaintiff headbutted and kicked Officer Finchum as well as other officers at the scene. Similar to Caie, in light of the circumstances in the present case, it is reasonable to assume there was a threat to the officers' safety, to the plaintiff himself, and to the safety of others. . . . Based on the pre-existing law holding that conduct similar to Officer Finchum's alleged use of force on June 2012 is constitutional, the Court finds that the contours of the right Officer Finchum is alleged to have violated were not so clear in June 2012 that every reasonable officer would have known that Officer Finchum's actions were unconstitutional. Thus, plaintiff fails to meet the clearly established prong to defeat qualified immunity. In light of this finding, the Court declines to address the second prong of qualified immunity, that is whether the alleged actions of Officer Finchum in June 2012 were constitutional. Accordingly, because not every reasonable officer would have understood that Officer Finchum's conduct in tasing and holding down plaintiff violated the Constitution under law existing as of June 29, 2012, the Court finds Officer Finchum is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brock v. Harrison, No. 2:14-CV-0323, 2015 WL 7254204, at *2 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 17, 2015) ("The parties agree that the jury must be able to examine 'the totality of the circumstances' in order to determine whether a law enforcement officer's use of force was objectively reasonable. See, e.g., Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396–97 (1989). Where, as here, an officer employs a firearm, the circumstances leading up to the shooting are relevant (and oftentimes vital) in determining whether the use of a firearm was justified. See, e.g., Pollard v. City of Columbus, 780 F.3d 395 (6th Cir. 2015) (holding that an officer's use of force following a vehicle pursuit was reasonable and basing that holding, at least in part, on the suspect's conduct during the pursuit). Here, Plaintiff's motion for segmentation of the evidence asks the Court to prevent both parties from presenting evidence of the events leading up to a shooting. That request, if granted, would cause the jury to view the shooting entirely out of context and with no way to determine whether Defendant's conduct was reasonable. The Court accordingly denies that request.")

Johnson v. Latzy, No. 1:12-CV-805, 2015 WL 470756, at *3 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 4, 2015) ("The essence of Plaintiff's Response is that Decedent Erica Collins dropped the knife before she was shot, so that Defendant's reaction was unjustified (Doc. 25). Plaintiff further contends that photos of the scene establish that Collins could not have advanced toward Defendant in a threatening manner because her body was ultimately positioned next to the front tire of the vehicle where she had been standing. . . Plaintiff further argues Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity because shooting an unarmed suspect has been clearly established as excessive use of force since Tennessee v. Garner . . . Finally, Plaintiff contends Decedent was at most guilty of a non-violent misdemeanor as she 'never made any type of threatening movement toward anyone.'. . In Reply, for purposes of the motion, Defendant accepts the claims that Decedent dropped the knife, raised her hands, and said 'No' before she was shot. . . Even under such factual scenario, Defendant contends that he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Defendant argues that the photographic evidence attached to Elisabeth's affidavit indisputably shows that Decedent's head was by the front tire, and her feet by the passenger door, such that no reasonable jury could conclude Decedent did not advance toward Defendant. . . Moreover, Defendant contends the facts show he was confronting, in a rapidly evolving situation, an unpredictable person who had already refused his shouted command to drop the knife. . . From Defendant's viewpoint, any reasonable officer would have viewed Decedent's movement toward him as hostile and aggressive. . . Having reviewed this matter, the Court finds Defendant's position well-taken that Decedent's movements were reasonably perceived by Defendant as hostile and aggressive. Defendant was responding to a 911 call regarding a domestic dispute when he saw Decedent brandishing a knife. The encounter unfolded rapidly. Decedent did not drop the knife when ordered to do so. The photographic evidence establishes that Decedent moved toward Defendant. Defendant had nowhere to easily retreat to as he was caged in by the position of his vehicle. Taken together, the Court finds the facts show Defendant reasonably understood that Decedent posed a threat of serious physical harm to himself or others. As such, though regrettable, his use of deadly force was permissible under the law.")

O'Neal v. Smith, No. 1:12-CV-971, 2015 WL 452306, at *3-4 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 3, 2015) ("The Court finds no Fourth Amendment claim for use of excessive force because a reasonable officer at the scene in the instant matter, who had just seen O'Neal back his car aggressively into another car, would have been justified to use deadly force to protect himself, fellow officers, and the public from a risk of serious physical harm. See, e.g., Cass v. City of Dayton, 770 F .3d 368 (6th Cir.2014). The Court concludes that Officer Smith reasonably acted in self-defense and thus did not violate O'Neal's right to be free from excessive force. Smith is, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The remaining questions in the case are as to Plaintiff Mathews, who was shot in the arm, and the Plaintiffs' state law claims. Constitutional tort claims asserted by persons collaterally injured by police conduct who were not intended targets of an attempted official 'seizure' are adjudged according to substantive due process norms. County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 118 S.Ct. 1708 (1998). Fundamentally, the substantive component of the due process clause insulates citizens against the arbitrary exercise of government power. . . Accordingly, conduct of a law enforcement officer which 'shocks the conscience' denies the victim fundamental substantive due process. . . In rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous situations, public servants' reflexive actions 'shock the conscience' only if they involve force employed 'maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm' rather than 'in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline.'. .Here, the Court finds no reasonable jury could conclude that Defendant Smith's actions amounted to anything other than a good faith effort to stop O'Neal and ensure public safety. The physical injuries were inadvertently inflicted and not due to malicious and sadistic force. As such, there is no basis for Mathews' claim as a passenger in the car.")

McKissic v. Miller, No. 1:12 CV 1057, 2014 WL 3798718 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 1, 2014) ("Officer Miller has cited no cases in which a Court has sanctioned the use of gunfire against an unarmed person, with no known proclivity for violence or for carrying a weapon, sitting in a stopped vehicle (albeit running), who has not previously attempted escape, or previously endangered or injured an officer during the same course of events. Further, he has cited no cases where a suspect was shot simply for raising his arm across his body or failing to immediately follow an officer's command. This Court has also failed to find any cases that would support qualified immunity under these alleged facts during its independent review. Although some cases have found no excessive force when the perceived danger arose from the suspect's position in a vehicle with the engine running, there was always an additional event that heightened the officer's belief that the driver would use the vehicle as a weapon. In almost every case sanctioning the officer's use of deadly or potentially deadly force, prior to an officer's use of gunfire the driver had either already hit an officer or a police vehicle, had engaged in aggressive driving that directly threatened an officer or the public, had fired shots or otherwise used force against an officer or civilian, was known to be in possession of a weapon, had previously fled during the same incident, had failed to respond to an officer's use of lesser force, and/or had engaged in a dangerous high speed chase prior to the execution of the stop. [citing cases] The Court, however, has found a multitude of cases in which the Sixth Circuit, and others have found a triable question of fact as to excessive force, and have denied qualified immunity on fact patterns far more similar to and often more ominous than those alleged in this case. [collecting cases] Therefore, when the facts as alleged by the Plaintiff and supported by some evidentiary materials, are taken to be true, there remains a question of fact as to whether Officer Miller's actions constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Further, the parameters of this established right would be 'sufficiently definite that any reasonable officer in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it' by shooting under the facts as alleged by Plaintiff, if found to be true.")

Turner v. City of Toledo, No. 3:07 CV 274, 2012 WL 1669836, at *11-*14 (N.D. Ohio May 14, 2012) ("Even if Lewis' taser deployments were unreasonable, they did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Plaintiff's attempt to rely on cases establishing the right of non-violent, non-resistant persons to be free from taser use is not persuasive. As explained above, such a description does not accurately characterize the events in this case. Rather, with regard to Lewis' first taser deployment, a right not to be tased after pulling away from an officer's grasp and causing a physical struggle—however brief or minor—was not clearly established in January 2005. . . . With regard to Lewis' second, third, fourth, and fifth taser deployments, a right not to be tased while thrashing on the ground, resisting efforts to be handcuffed and/or ankle cuffed, and ignoring commands to comply was not clearly established in January 2005. . . .The Court finds that all Defendant TPD Officers are immune from claims regarding the hog-tie and transport of Turner because such force was not unreasonable. Turner rolled, thrashed, and kicked his legs for several minutes before the officers attempted to further restrain him. Turner then successfully thwarted four officers' efforts to do so—despite being handcuffed—even kicking one officer in the face. The officers were able to gain control of Turner's legs only after Lewis tased him two more times. It was only then that the officers hog-tied Turner and made the decision to transport him in the hog-tie restraint. Such conduct is not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .Even if the hog-tie and transport method were unreasonable, such force did not involve a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Plaintiff's argument that Johnson clearly established a right to be free from restraint methods that might cause positional asphyxia is unavailing. Instead, the Court finds that 'the lack of precedent from either the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit, combined with the split of authority over the restraint method used by the officers qualifying as excessive force, requires a finding that no constitutional right was violated.'")

McCline v. Roose, No. 1:07 CV 0545, 2009 WL 585844, at 9-12 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 6, 2009) ("The Court has reviewed each of these cases in which the officers were granted qualified immunity, each court holding that the use of a Taser did not amount to excessive force under the circumstances. Each of the cases relied upon by the defendant exhibits a material difference from the case at hand. In Draper, Ewolski, Russo, Biggers and RT, the tasered plaintiff was not handcuffed. . .The plaintiffs in Devoe, Johnson and Goebel, while handcuffed, nevertheless, continued to actively resist prior to the tasering, endangering the acting officer and others nearby. In the instant case, while Mr. McCline was on the sally port floor, he was according to the defendant 'simply [ ] noncompliant,' and according to the plaintiff, unable to rise to his feet due to his weight, his arthritis and because he was handcuffed. A recent, similar case helps to underscore the distinctions in the instant matter. In Buckley v. Haddock, the Eleventh Circuit found not unreasonable the officer's decision to twice taser a plaintiff who was placed under arrest for refusing to sign a traffic ticket. While walking the handcuffed plaintiff to the police car to effect the arrest, the individual dropped to the road and refused to get up, sobbing that he was destitute and could not afford a traffic ticket. The suspect was noncompliant. The Court found the officer's use of force in this particular situation 'not outside the range of reasonable conduct under the Fourth Amendment' by underscoring three facts: the incident occurred at night on the side of a highway with considerable passing traffic; the deputy could not complete the arrest because the plaintiff was resisting getting into the patrol car; and, the deputy resorted to using the Taser only after trying to persuade the plaintiff to cease resisting and, further, provided the plaintiff ample time to comply. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. McCline, none of these three factors were at play in the instant matter. Mr. McCline and Officer Roose were safely in the Euclid City jail sally port, Officer Roose and at least three other individuals were available to bring Mr. McCline to the booking desk, and Mr. McCline was not provided an opportunity to comply. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. McCline, under the first Saucier factor, a jury could find that Officer Roose's use of the Taser amounted to excessive force. Accordingly, because a material issue of fact exists with respect to whether Officer Roose's conduct was objectively unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment totality of the circumstances test, the Court will deny the defendant's motion for summary judgment. . . . The Sixth Circuit has repeatedly held that the use of force on a subject who is disabled or has been neutralized is excessive force as a matter of law. . . The Sixth Circuit has further applied this rule in several instances involving claims that a police officer used excessive force in tasering or deploying pepper spray against a suspect. [collecting cases] . . . . Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. McCline, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Roose tasered the plaintiff gratuitously and unreasonably.") Pirolozzi v. Stanbro, No. 5:07-CV-798, 2008 WL 1977504, at *6, *7 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 28, 2008) ("Construing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff means that the Court must assume that the Defendant Officers applied substantial force to the head, neck, torso, and legs of Pirolozzi, a mentally ill individual who was no longer resisting arrest or posing a threat to anyone in the vicinity, to keep him motionless on the ground in a prone position for several minutes with his hands handcuffed behind his back. The Court also must assume that the Defendants used a taser device, brachial stuns, kicks, punches, and physical force against the decedent while he was on the ground. Thus, the plaintiff alleges, and shows cognizable evidence demonstrating, sufficient facts to show a constitutional violation that is actionable under § 1983. . . . The Plaintiff offers sufficient evidence to show a constitutional violation of the decedent's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. These individual defendants are not therefore entitled to qualified immunity in this case."). [See also Pirolozzi v. Stanbro, 2009 WL 961155, at *4 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 7, 2009) ("In denying summary judgment to the Defendant Officers on the § 1983 excessive force claim, the Court explained that it could not 'conclude as a matter of law that any of the officers are entitled to qualified immunity .'. . That is not synonymous with the conclusion that the Defendant Officers are liable under § 1983 for the use of excessive force. Again, denying summary judgment to one party is not the same as granting it to the other. It is simply a decision that sufficient disagreement about the facts exists to require that the case go to a jury.")]

Edwards v. City of Martins Ferry, 554 F.Supp.2d 797, 805-08 (S.D. Ohio 2008) ("In the instant case, Plaintiffs claim that the force used in effecting Mr. Edwards' arrest was unreasonable. Specifically, Plaintiffs assert that Officer Dojack's use of the taser on Mr. Edwards, who was 82 years old and suffering from Alzheimer's, was unconstitutionally excessive. . . The Court disagrees. . . . Plaintiffs concede that Officer Dojack had probable cause to stop Mr. Edwards and probable cause to arrest him, therefore, the only question is whether the use of the taser constitutes excessive force. . . . Plaintiffs argue that Mr. Edwards never threatened, attempted to hit or verbally abused Officer Dojack. But absent from this description is that Mr. Edwards refused to comply with Officer Dojack's initial orders. . . .Plaintiffs primary argument for why Officer Dojack's use of the taser was unreasonable is because Mr. Edwards was 82 years old and suffering from Alzheimer's. However, there is no caselaw provided in support of this argument that Mr. Edwards' age precludes use of the taser. Officer Dojack, at first, was merely trying to talk to Mr. Edwards, but soon realized that was not possible. Then, Officer Dojack attempted to grab him, but Mr. Edwards continued to pull away. Officer Dojack then attempted to restrain Mr. Edwards. Regardless of Mr. Edwards' age and the fact that he had Alzheimer's, he was not cooperating with Officer Dojack, and his actions could be construed as resisting arrest. . . . Even if the Court were to have found that Defendants did violate Plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights, Plaintiffs cannot establish that an objectively reasonable officer faced with the same circumstances as Officer Dojack would have recognized that the conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. The final test for qualified immunity is whether an objectively reasonable officer under the circumstances would have known that the officer's conduct violated the constitution in light of the preexisting law. Considering the circumstances in this case, that Mr. Edwards refused to answer Officer Dojack's simple questions and refused to comply with his initial orders, and then backed away and drew his hands up, a reasonable officer would attempt to secure the arrest of the suspect. Then, when the suspect continued to resist arrest while the officer was trying to place handcuffs on him, a reasonable officer would take the use of force to the next level on the continuum to the taser. Therefore, such use of force under these circumstances was not a violation of Mr. Edward's constitutional rights. Accordingly, Defendant Officer Dojack is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Michaels v. City of Vermillion, 539 F.Supp.2d 975, 983, 986, 987, 989, 990 (N.D. Ohio 2008) ("[T]he Saucier directive to construe the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff has particular significance when (1) there are disputed issues of fact and, (2) whether a constitutional violation occurred hinges on which version of the facts is accepted. That is, when the plaintiff's evidence, viewed in the most favorable light, amounts to a constitutional violation, prong one of the Saucier test is satisfied even if the facts pertinent to the alleged constitutional violation are disputed. . . . Focusing on the tasing–the specific conduct alleged to constitute excessive force–the Graham factors favor finding that, taking the facts as alleged by the Plaintiffs, a jury could find that a constitutional violation occurred. In other words, the discrepancy between the parties' accounts of the tasing constitutes a material issue of fact and, under the first prong of the Saucier test, the Plaintiffs' version of the facts rises to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . The same construction of the facts necessarily applies to prong two as well; the question is whether the constitutional right that Officer Grassnig arguably violated under the prong one analysis is clearly established. . . . As discussed above in connection with prong one, construing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Grassnig tased Michaels gratuitously and unreasonably. Therefore, based on the well-established line of authority prohibiting the gratuitous use of nonlethal, temporarily incapacitating force, it would be clear to a reasonable officer that the manner in which Officer Grassnig allegedly used the taser on Michaels was unlawful under the circumstances. The 'clearly established' prong of the Saucier test is thus satisfied.").

Ashbrook v. Boudinot, 2007 WL 4270658, at *3, *8 (S.D. Ohio Dec. 3, 2007) ("Where there is authentic and uncontroverted video evidence that utterly discredits a litigants' version of events such that there is no genuine issue of material fact, the Court should view the facts in the light depicted by the videotape. Scott v. Harris , __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 1776 (2007). . . .The video evidence confirms that the officers applied a reasonable amount of force in arresting, detaining, and transporting Ashbrook. Because the Court does not find a constitutional violation, it is unnecessary to determine whether Ashbrook's rights were clearly established.")

McGee v. City of Cincinnati Police Dept., No. 1:06-CV-726, 2007 WL 1169374, at *6 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 18, 2007) ("[S]ituations such as that at issue in the instant case, where an officer tases an individual who fails to comply with the officer's orders and who the officer has reason to believe is armed, fall into a grey area about which there does not appear to be clearly established law regarding the appropriate use of force. Indeed, Plaintiff does not cite one case in which a court has found the use of a taser unconstitutional under similar circumstances. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's excessive force claim.").

Carter v. Colerain Township, No. 105-CV-163, 2007 WL 869727, at *15 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 20, 2007) ("Generally speaking, individuals have a clearly established right to be free from the unreasonable use of non-lethal force. Defendants cite Russo, 953 F.2d at 1044-45, for the proposition that the use of a taser in order to obviate the need for greater force does not violate clearly established law. However, Russo involved a situation in which officers were faced with a potentially homicidal and suicidal suspect, armed with two knives, who had made threatening remarks to the officers. Russo, therefore, is not controlling in this case. Indeed, courts have found that under certain circumstances, such as where the suspect did not pose the level of threat described in Russo, the unreasonable use of a taser to subdue the suspect violates the suspect's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. [collecting cases]")

Glaeser v. Cheatham County Sheriff's Dept., No. 3:05cv1043, 2006 WL 3805660, at *6 (M.D. Tenn. Dec. 21, 2006) ("Using deadly force against a speeding or even a reckless driver will not always be objectively reasonable. Because it is not clear that a reasonable officer in the defendants' situation would not have known that engaging in the conduct alleged by Mr. Glaeser was violative of his clearly established right to be free from excessive force, Defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motion on the basis of qualified immunity must be denied at this stage in the proceedings. Cf. Hayes v. Wickert, No. C06-5402RJB, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84316, at *13-*14 (W.D.Wash. Nov. 20, 2006) (holding that material issues of fact precluded summary judgment on defendant police officer's qualified immunity defense, even where it was undisputed that the plaintiff had run a stop sign, was speeding, was driving without headlights at night, was driving into oncoming lanes to avoid having to take curves, and had committed the felony of evading arrest, because it was not clear whether the plaintiff posed an "immediate threat to the safety" of the officer or others at the time the officer actually used deadly force).").

Hoover v. Isaacson, No. 04-CV-70654, 2005 WL 1682051, at *5 (E.D. Mich. July 15, 2005) ("As discussed in the recent Sixth Circuit case of Sample v. Bailey, 409 F.3d 689, 2005 WL 1283517 (6th Cir. May 9, 2005), 'it has been clearly established in this circuit for the last twenty years that a criminal suspect Aha[s] a right not to be shot unless he [is] perceived to pose a threat to the pursuing officers or to others during flight."'. . The question this case turns on, then, is whether or not the defendant could have reasonably believed that Sommers' attempt to escape posed a threat of death or serious physical injury to himself or others. After considering the evidence offered in the case to date, it is the court's determination that it cannot rule on the question of qualified immunity as a matter of law. In a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the plaintiff is required to identify a clearly established right that was violated, and establish that a reasonable officer in the defendant's situation should have known that deadly force violated that right. . . However, where the question of qualified immunity 'is completely dependent upon which view of the facts is accepted by the jury,' a district court cannot grant qualified immunity to an officer on a claim such as this. . . In the instant case, defendant has testified that he was afraid of being struck by the vehicle. . . and about his general fear for his and other officers' safety at the time of the fatal shooting . . . However, plaintiff points out that defendant shot Sommers through the side passenger window, rather than the front windshield, and that he in fact admitted that he did not fire the shots until the vehicle was moving past him. . . Indeed, Isaacson concedes he was at the side of the vehicle at the time of the shooting . . . and did testify at deposition that he fired the shots 'knowing the guy just tried to run me over.' . . As plaintiff emphasizes, this testimony may indicate, to some extent, a retaliatory motive on the part of Isaacson. Furthermore, the court's repeated viewing of the videotapes confirms that Sommers' vehicle was significantly disabled, and that no specified individual was at an immediate risk of being hit by the vehicle at the time of the fatal shooting. Finally, the court notes that witnesses at the scene have offered varying depictions of the events. . . The court further notes it is not clear from the evidence, including the videotapes offered by defendant, exactly how disabled the van appeared to be at the time, what Sommers was doing inside the van, or whether in fact Sommers threatened to turn the van sharply in the officers' direction prior to the shooting, as asserted by defendant, and as testified to by defendant and Officer Bonacorsi. Thus, it is the court's determination that whether an officer in defendant's position would have found the use of deadly force reasonable under the circumstances depends on certain findings of fact which are in dispute in this case. Because defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity turns on the events unfolding in those moments before the fatal gunshots, which require the careful assessment of a fact finder, this is a case where disputed material facts require the court to deny defendant's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Armstrong v. U.S. Bank, No. C-1-02-701, 2005 WL 1705023, at *5 (S.D. Ohio July 20, 2005) ("In determining whether a right was clearly established, the Court may consider whether officers should be on notice from either the specific facts of particular prior cases or the general reasoning of such cases. . . Both Greene and Hickey are instructive here. In Greene, the Sixth Circuit held that a reasonable officer would not necessarily know that it was unlawful to use an eye irritant when a suspect was actively resisting arrest and the officer was following police procedure for restraining non-cooperative arrestees. . . In Hickey, by contrast, the Sixth Circuit held that a reasonable officer would have known that inflicting unnecessary pain on a nonviolent arrestee violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . In this case, under the facts alleged, while Armstrong did resist being handcuffed, Defendant Officers already had one of her wrists handcuffed before they used mace. Moreover, though Armstrong resisted arrest, she did not do so violently, but rather by backing away while crying. Considering the alleged facts in light of the general reasoning of cases involving similar facts, the Court holds that a reasonable officer would have known that, because Armstrong was not violent, inflicting unnecessary pain on her by spraying her with mace, throwing her up against the car, and roughing her up violated her clearly established constitutional rights. Likewise, given that Armstrong has alleged that Defendant Officers maced and threw against a car a mentally disabled woman whose resistance was limited to tearfully backing away, the Court finds Defendant Officers' actions were objectively unreasonable.").

Kaylor v. Rankin, 356 F.Supp.2d 839, 851, 852 (N.D. Ohio 2005) ("Kaylor's supposed crime, obstruction of official business, was not severe, and had not involved physical acts on his part. He was not threatening anyone's safety or attempting to flee. Once the officers undertook to arrest him, however, he actively resisted arrest, did so in an aggressive and physical manner, and continued to do so until finally subdued. During the scuffle, Officer Radde used pepper spray to subdue Kaylor. Although the Sixth Circuit recognizes circumstances in which the use of pepper spray by police officers will not be considered to be excessive force, those cases are, so far, limited to situations where either the defendant is armed or the officers fear for the arrestee's own safety. . . Kaylor was unarmed and presented no danger to himself. Therefore, under these circumstances, the use of pepper spray may have constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Under the Saucier analysis, however, I cannot find that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Officer Radde's position that it would be unlawful for him to use pepper spray on an arrestee who was actively and aggressively resisting arrest. . . Because I cannot find that the right to be free from the level of force used here was clearly established, Officers Rankin and Radde are entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's unreasonable use of force claim.").

Mwangangi v. Nielsen, No. 21-1576, 2022 WL 4244594, at *13–15 (7th Cir. Sept. 15, 2022) (Easterbrook, J., concurring) ("I join the court's opinion and add an observation about one of plaintiff's legal theories. Mwangangi contends that Noland and Nielsen are liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because they did not intervene to prevent Root from arresting him. He does not explain why. What statute or constitutional rule requires one employee of the government to stop another from making a mistake? The Supreme Court has held many times that § 1983 supports only direct, and not vicarious, liability. . . 'Failure to intervene' sounds like vicarious liability. Mwangangi contends that Root violated the Fourth Amendment by arresting him without probable cause. If Noland and Nielsen participated in the arrest, they, too, may have violated the Fourth Amendment. But if, however, all they did was stand by while Root made an arrest, then what Mwangangi seeks is vicarious liability. Many a plaintiff contends that the Constitution requires public employees to act for their protection. Yet DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, 489 U.S. 189, 109 S.Ct. 998, 103 L.Ed.2d 249 (1989), holds that our Constitution establishes negative liberties—the right to be free of official misconduct—rather than positive rights to have public employees protect private interests. . . So a police officer who fails to stop a municipal bus that the officer sees being driven recklessly is not liable to a pedestrian later struck by the careening bus. Similarly, when persons who had been injured by soldiers' misconduct sued the Secretary of Defense, contending that the Secretary had to ensure his subordinates' correct behavior, we replied that this would amount to forbidden vicarious liability. See Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 203–05 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc). The wrongdoers were personally liable, but others in the chain of command were not. Perhaps state law requires police officers to prevent their fellows from violating suspects' rights, but § 1983 cannot be used to enforce state law. Some federal statutes or constitutional provisions may require public employees to render assistance, and these could be enforced through § 1983, because then liability would be direct rather than derivative. But Mwangangi has not cited any such sources of law. Several decisions of this court say that police officers and prison guards must intervene when they see their colleagues acting improperly. See, e.g., Doxtator v. O'Brien, 39 F.4th 852, 865 (7th Cir. 2022). None of these decisions explains why this theory of liability is consistent with Iqbal, Vance, and similar decisions. Doxtator relies on Abdullahi v. Madison, 423 F.3d 763, 774 (7th Cir. 2005); Lanigan v. East Hazel Crest, 110 F.3d 467, 478 (7th Cir. 1997); and Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 285 (7th Cir. 1994), all of which predate Iqbal and Vance. I suspect that these decisions arose in much the same way as today's quotation from Doxtator (op. at ——): the plaintiff asserts that intervention is necessary, and the defendants do not provide a substantive response. The court observes (op. at ——) that the Lebanon defendants' brief 'does not tackle this issue directly'; certainly it does not invoke Iqbal or Vance. . . This is how circuit law comes to diverge from decisions of the Supreme Court and from our own en banc decisions. Given the principle of party presentation, see United States v. Sineneng-Smith, —— U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 1575, 206 L.Ed.2d 866 (2020), I do not disagree with my colleagues' decision to remand with respect to the failure-to-intervene theory against Noland and Nielsen. I hope, however, that litigants will not continue to allow this questionable theory to pass in silence.")

Mwangangi v. Nielsen, No. 21-1576, 2022 WL 4244594, at *15-16 (7th Cir. Sept. 15, 2022) (Kirsch, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority on every issue but one. The majority affirms the denial of qualified immunity to Officer Blayne Root, holding that he lacked even arguable probable cause to believe Daudi Mwangangi had violated Indiana's police impersonation law at the time he handcuffed Mwangangi. On this narrow issue, I disagree. Given the totality of what Officer Root knew at the time of the handcuffing and the lack of any clearly established law on what constitutes probable cause under Indiana's foggy police impersonation statute, I would hold that Root had arguable probable cause to believe Mwangangi had violated the statute. . . . In my view, an officer in Officer Root's position could have reasonably, if mistakenly, believed that there was probable cause that Mwangangi had committed the impersonation offense. . . . There are no Indiana cases that I could find addressing what probable cause looks like under Indiana's impersonation law (and we have not taken up the issue either), let alone anything that would clearly dictate to Officer Root that the information he possessed was insufficient under the statute. . . Without any clearly established guidance from a court, or simply anything addressing a situation analogous to the one Officer Root confronted here, I do not agree that no reasonable officer in Root's situation could conclude that there was probable cause. . . . Root knew that an unmarked Crown Victoria (not a tow truck) was driving on the interstate at night with strobe lights on, that the same vehicle may have pulled someone over at the gas station, and that the vehicle matched the description and license plate number dispatch provided. I am not suggesting that Officer Root's actions were model officer conduct. He could have slowed down and taken further steps to confirm his suspicions before placing Mwangangi in handcuffs. But qualified immunity shields 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . And operating without any clearly established law, I conclude that an officer in Officer Root's position could have reasonably, if erroneously, believed that he had probable cause. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.")

Turner v. City of Champaign, 979 F.3d 563, 567-71 (7th Cir. 2020) ("The estate's Fourth Amendment claims fail because the officers did not use excessive force. A claim for excessive force under § 1983 invokes the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. . . . We are not saying that Officer Wilson and Young's decision to chase Mr. Turner down the alley exhibited best police practices. The estate argues that Mr. Turner's death might have been avoided if the officers had instead continued to monitor him from a distance and waited until the ambulance arrived, as they had on prior occasions. The Champaign Police Department's own policies train officers responding to calls involving persons with mental illnesses to 'consider[ ] first the least restrictive environment possible to meet the needs of the individual and the community.'. . This approach can include 'officer intervention as a calm third party, to reduce tension and hostility, and to restore order without unnecessary force.'. .With the benefit of hindsight, one can say that perhaps such an approach might have saved Mr. Turner's life. But police training policies and best practices, while relevant, do not define what is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Officer Wilson did not violate the Fourth Amendment when he caught up with Mr. Turner and grabbed his shoulder to stop his flight. Since Mr. Turner never submitted to the authority of spoken police commands, this physical contact was the moment police first seized him. . . . The undisputed facts show that he resisted the officers actively and continually. He was not offering merely passive resistance to lawful detention; in such cases significant force can violate the Fourth Amendment. Unlike when someone is passively refusing to move or follow lawful commands, the police may use significant force to subdue someone who is actively resisting lawful detention. . . . The undisputed facts show that Mr. Turner's behavior qualified as active resistance. When Officer Wilson grabbed his shoulder, Mr. Turner shoved Officer Wilson and began grabbing at Officer Young. The officers then took Mr. Turner to the ground, where Mr. Turner kept resisting and trying to pry himself away from the officers. The officers all testified that this resistance continued throughout the encounter. Even after Mr. Turner was handcuffed, they needed a hobble because he kept kicking his legs. The hobble had to be attached twice because Mr. Turner's flailing legs broke free on the first attempt. In this respect, as the district court recognized, the facts closely resemble Estate of Phillips, where we found no excessive force. . . . Here too, the escalating force against Mr. Turner was a constitutionally permissible response to his continued resistance. As in Estate of Phillips, officers placed Mr. Turner in a prone position, pinned down his shoulder, handcuffed him, and hobbled him. And just as in Estate of Phillips, each of these actions was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. After Mr. Turner shoved Officer Wilson and continued resisting, it was reasonable to place him in a prone position to handcuff him. Placing a knee on Mr. Turner's shoulder was also not excessive given the undisputed evidence of his continued resistance on the ground. Finally, pinning down Mr. Turner's legs and attaching a hobble were reasonable given the undisputed testimony that he kept kicking and that he maneuvered out of the hobble when it was first applied. Unfortunately, also as in Estate of Phillips, '[t]hat force, it turned out, when combined with Mr. [Turner's] other health problems, resulted in [his] death.'. . But legally, it was not 'deadly force' because it did not "carry a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.'. . Rather, at each step of the encounter, the undisputed facts show that the officers used a reasonable amount of force. Critically, Mr. Turner's body showed no signs of suffocation or trauma from the officers' force. The officers 'did not hogtie, choke or transport Mr. [Turner]. Nor were his medical conditions,' including his enlarged heart, 'observable to the untrained eye.'. . In situations like this, where an officer's force causes unexpectedly severe injuries due to a hidden condition, reasonableness is assessed objectively based only on what the officer knew at the time force was applied. . . The same principle applies when an officer reasonably mistakes medical symptoms as resistance. . . . On the other hand, when officers observe medical symptoms that cannot reasonably be mistaken as resistance, they may not respond with force. . . . Here, the estate argues that Mr. Turner was not resisting the officers but only struggling to breathe. The estate, however, has offered no evidence supporting this theory, and the autopsy results contradict it. Nor is there any evidence showing that, even if this were true, the officers were aware of it before Sergeant Frost asked if Mr. Turner was breathing. The estate therefore lacks the kind of evidence that raised a genuine issue of fact in McAllister. Without such evidence, we must conclude that the officers here—like the officers in Smith—reasonably interpreted Mr. Turner's movements as resistance. The district court properly granted summary judgment for the defendants on the estate's excessive force claims against Officers Wilson, Young, and Talbott.")

Estate of Biegert by Biegert v. Molitor, 968 F.3d 693, 698-701 (7th Cir. 2020) ("The estate contends that the officers acted unreasonably by creating the conditions that precipitated the violent encounter. As the estate sees it, the officers created the situation that ultimately led to Biegert's death by failing to make a plan for the encounter, failing to secure the knife block in the kitchen, and questioning Biegert aggressively. But none of these actions rendered the officers' subsequent use of force unreasonable, nor did the officers' creation of a dangerous situation constitute an independent violation of Biegert's constitutional rights. The officers might have made mistakes, and those mistakes might have provoked Biegert's violent resistance. Even if so, however, it does not follow that their actions violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Only in narrow circumstances have we concluded that an officer acted unreasonably because he created a situation where deadly force became essentially inevitable. [discussing Starks v. Enyart and Sledd v. Lindsay] . . . . In Starks and Sledd, the officers acted so far outside the bounds of reasonable behavior that the deadly force was almost entirely a result of the officers' actions. That's not true in this case. Even if the defendants' actions exacerbated the danger, Biegert's actions were an intervening cause of the deadly force. Dunn and Krueger escalated the force that they applied in response to the force with which Biegert resisted; the situation requiring them to use deadly force was not primarily of their own making. . . . We emphasize that someone does not pose 'an immediate threat of serious harm' solely because he is armed. We made that point in Weinmann v. McClone, which involved an officer performing a wellness check on a man who had locked himself in the garage with a shotgun on his lap. . . Without making any attempt to communicate with the man, the officer barged into the garage and shot him. . . We held that the case turned on whether the man had threatened the officer with the shotgun—if he hadn't, it was unreasonable for the officer to shoot him. . . Having a weapon is not the same thing as threatening to use a weapon. . . Here, though, Biegert not only threatened to use the knife—he actually used it. By the time Biegert was shot, he had already stabbed Dunn multiple times. The officers, therefore, indisputably faced an immediate threat to their physical safety. And as in Henning, King, and Sanzone, the imminent threat of deadly harm posed by an aggressive, armed assailant justified the defendants' use of lethal force. We also note that the officers did not resort to deadly force as their first line of defense to Biegert's resistance. Rather, the officers applied only mild physical force to restrain Biegert during the pat down and increased the force only as Biegert increased his physical resistance. When Biegert dragged the officers to the kitchen and onto the floor, Dunn and Krueger resorted to punches and Tasers. And when the Tasers proved ineffective, the officers continued to employ less lethal methods—fists, batons, and bodyweight—in their attempts to restrain Biegert. Only after Dunn yelled that he had been stabbed and Biegert advanced toward Krueger with a knife did the officers employ lethal force. We must evaluate the reasonableness of the officers' actions with the understanding that the situation they faced was 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' and required them to 'make split second judgements' about how much force to apply to counter the danger Biegert posed. . . As in Henning, the officers first attempted less lethal methods in response to Biegert's resistance. And, as in King, Biegert posed an imminent threat to the officers once he had armed himself with a knife, attacked Dunn, and advanced toward Krueger. At this point, the officers reasonably resorted to firing at Biegert in response to the imminent threat he posed. . . . The officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment by shooting Biegert. Nor did their actions preceding the shooting render their use of force unreasonable. Because we conclude that no constitutional violation occurred, we need not determine whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Gysan v. Francisko, 965 F.3d 567, 570 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Gysan does not doubt that police may use deadly force to protect themselves. Instead she contends that Cataline was not a danger to them. Yet he had violated an order to turn off the engine; then he turned the van around, began to drive the wrong way on an expressway, and turned again to hit a police cruiser. All of that is undisputed. Gysan suggests that, after smashing into Kuehl's car, Cataline may have put up his hands in surrender. That's conceivable, though we do not see how it could be proved; as in King, the only person in a good position to offer evidence contradicting the police account is dead. Francisko and Kuehl both testified that Kuehl was wedged behind the door and at continuing risk; again Gysan lacks contrary evidence. What objective evidence we have supports the officers: the van's engine continued to run at high speed until Francisko shot Cataline, which is inconsistent with his desisting from the attack and surrendering. Kuehl appears in the video to walk with a limp after the events, and Gysan does not deny that the voice heard screaming was Kuehl's; this supports the officers' contention that Kuehl's life was at stake. Francisko is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ybarra v. City of Chicago, 946 F.3d 975, 979-80 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Cruz was not merely an impaired driver or someone driving away from a traffic ticket. After someone in his Tahoe fired multiple shots at another vehicle, Cruz sped away through city streets at roughly twice the speed limit, driving for a mile before crashing into multiple cars. First, he careened into a parked car with such force that it pushed the car forward into a second car parked a full car-length in front of it, which then rolled into a third. Despite the severity of that initial collision, Cruz did not stop. Cruz kept driving and crashed into a fourth car parked on the opposite side of the street. Then, when Valadez parked behind Cruz's Tahoe, Cruz drove backward directly into the same car door from which Valadez was attempting to exit. Cruz's Tahoe crashed into the unmarked police car with enough force that it slammed Valadez's door shut, caused the 'whole car' to 'rock[ ],' and led Reyes to believe that Valadez may have been seriously injured. During the encounter in the parking lot moments later, the officers reasonably believed that there was still at least one gun in Cruz's Tahoe, that Cruz could access it, and that all of the suspects in the Tahoe might have been armed and dangerous. . . The situation was particularly difficult given that the officers could not see into the Tahoe to determine which occupant had the gun because the Tahoe had dark, tinted windows. . . Moreover, only sixteen seconds elapsed from when Valadez entered the parking lot (with Reyes trailing by a few seconds) until the Tahoe exited the parking lot, at which time Cruz had already been shot. Within that sixteen-second window, the officers had mere seconds to determine how to respond, and that determination was informed by the violent acts the officers had witnessed less than ninety seconds previously. . . .Even though the encounter occurred during the very early hours of the morning, surveil-lance footage shows other pedestrians, cyclists, and motorists in the area around the time of the shooting. Regardless of whether the officers reasonably believed that Cruz presented a direct threat to the officers' own safety—whether by driving toward or shooting at them—there is no genuine dispute of material fact that the officers acted reasonably in using deadly force against Cruz to prevent his escape to protect others in the immediate vicinity. . . Their use of deadly force to prevent escape continued to be reasonable even as Cruz drove past the officers.")

Ybarra v. City of Chicago, 946 F.3d 975, 981-83 (7th Cir. 2020) (Hamilton, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I would affirm summary judgment on the narrower ground of qualified immunity on plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim. In briefing in this court, plaintiff effectively conceded that qualified immunity is appropriate. She described this case as straddling the 'hazy border' between reasonable and unreasonable force. . . I would not make my colleagues' further finding that the officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment, particularly in light of the officers' use of deadly force while driving an unmarked vehicle and wearing plain clothes. . . . The extensive case law concerning police use of force, and especially deadly force in police chases, almost always involves uniformed police officers and clearly marked police vehicles. Courts expect civilians to comply with police commands and warnings and to respect the authority of the police. Those expectations do not necessarily apply to police officers who are out of uniform in unmarked vehicles, however effective those tactics may be for particular police purposes. The officers here were in plain clothes, not in uniform, and they were driving an unmarked car. Never in the ninety-second episode did the officers use the car's hidden emergency lights or sirens. In reviewing a grant of summary judgment, we cannot assume Cruz knew he was being pursued by police officers during the chase or even during the fatal confrontation in the church parking lot. One passenger in Cruz's car recognized from their gear that the people on foot in the parking lot were in fact police officers. Cruz and others may not have. The evidence of shouted warnings did not show beyond reasonable dispute that the officers could reasonably have expected the Tahoe's driver to have heard them. We explained in Doornbos v. City of Chicago, 868 F.3d 572, 585 (7th Cir. 2017), that with only rare exceptions, plainclothes officers may not initiate Fourth Amendment seizures without identifying themselves as police . . . . In Doornbos, we also summarized the special dangers posed by the use of force by plainclothes officers as reported in the U.S. Department of Justice's investigations of the police departments in Chicago and other cities, highlighting Chicago's 'aggressive plainclothes policing practices that result in needless injuries.'. . There have been too many tragedies around the nation in which police officers have used deadly force against their own colleagues in plain clothes, often officers of color, in circumstances that were 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving,' to quote Graham v. Connor[.] . . Nevertheless, despite some factual disputes bearing on the ultimate reasonableness of the officers' actions in this case, I would affirm summary judgment for the officers based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. As noted, plaintiff concedes that the officers' conduct falls somewhere on the 'hazy' borderline separating excessive and appropriate force. . . And even if that were not so, plaintiff's briefs failed to identify 'a body of relevant case law' rendering the officers' conduct clearly unconstitutional on the facts construed most favorably to her, and failed as well to persuade that this is an 'obvious' case controlled directly by Garner and Graham. . . We should take the more conservative decisional route here by limiting our holding to the qualified immunity defense.")

Johnson v. Rogers, 944 F.3d 966, 969-70 (7th Cir. 2019) ("A conclusive video allows a court to know what happened and decide the legal consequences. . . The video we have, however, does not unambiguously establish what Rogers did. On an interlocutory qualified-immunity appeal, a court must not resolve disputed issues of material fact. . . Still, we think that the video does show two things beyond reasonable question. First, Rogers did not kick Johnson or otherwise harm him after he was on the ground. Second, Rogers used his legs to undermine Johnson's balance and force him down. Because the video is grainy, and both Johnson and Rogers were moving at the critical moment, we cannot be sure just how the injury occurred. It looks like Rogers tried to use a knee to unbalance Johnson, and, when that did not work, used his foot—but whether Johnson's foot motion was an effort to trip Johnson or a kick to the lower shin (or perhaps the foot) is not possible to discern. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, a jury could conclude that Rogers delivered a kick. And there is no doubt that an unnecessary kick, after a suspect is under control, violates the suspect's clearly established rights. On-the-spot punishment, not reasonably adapted to obtain or keep control, violates the Fourth Amendment (and perhaps other rules as well). . . . What resolves this appeal in Rogers's favor is this: Johnson, who had told the officers that he wanted to run away, was not under control when Rogers tried to use his knee to unbalance Johnson, who remained on his feet until Rogers took a further step. If that further step is best understood as a kick, it must also be understood as an attempt to regain control. That such an attempt causes injury, perhaps because poorly executed, does not lead to liability. Nor does the possibility that Rogers had two things in mind: regaining control and punishing Johnson for abusive language. Graham holds that the excessive-force inquiry is objective. If the force used was objectively allowable, the officer's state of mind can't make it unconstitutional. Lester v. Chicago, 830 F.2d 706, 712 (7th Cir. 1987). Taking the events as the video depicts them, the district court properly found that Rogers is entitled to qualified immunity.")

United States v. Proano, 912 F.3d 431, 443-45 (7th Cir. 2019) [prosecution under § 242] ("Reasonableness depends on the totality of the circumstances. . . .We must view the events through the lens of the officer in the moment, not with 20/20 hindsight. . . The law, of course, allows for 'the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments.'. . Deadly force is generally reasonable when a reasonable officer in the same circumstances would believe that the assailant's conduct put someone in the 'immediate vicinity in imminent danger of death or serious bodily injury.'. .Based on the totality of the circumstances, Proano argues, it was reasonable for him to believe that Brown and the other passengers were in mortal danger and to act accordingly. He emphasizes the chaos of the scene: Brown hanging out of the Toyota, Grant stuck between Flaherty's squad car and the Toyota, the occupants' refusal to show their hands, and the car reversing. The dashcam video, however, provided ample grounds for the jury to conclude that there was no danger posed to anyone and, thus, no need for lethal force. The video showed Brown sitting up out of a window, not being dragged. The car reversed at a mild pace, and quickly slowed, redirected, and butted against a light pole. No bystander was near it. Yet Proano shot and continued to shoot even after the Toyota stopped its retreat. Nor does the BB gun's presence at the scene show that the jury erred in its conclusions. The officers' first awareness of the gun was when it fell to the ground, and there was no evidence that any passenger threatened an officer with a weapon. . . Kalicki's testimony, moreover, suggested that the BB gun fell out at the same time the shooting started. That fact, combined with Proano's immediate show of force and Proano's post-shooting reports, which did not identify the BB gun, could have reasonably led the jury to reject the idea that Proano fired in reaction to the weapon. Proano relatedly posits that the government's reliance on the dashcam video, particularly its slow-motion version, is (1) inconsistent with the totality analysis required under the Fourth Amendment and (2) distorts the in-the-moment experience Proano felt. The jury heard, and clearly rejected, these arguments. The jury saw at trial and had in deliberations the real-time dashcam video. It may well have reviewed that video and found that no interpretation of the circumstances supported the notion that someone was in danger. Even if circumstances were sufficient to give rise to a lethal threat reasonably requiring deadly force, a jury still could have decided that Proano's reaction was unreasonable. Proano argues that the number of rounds he fired—sixteen—is irrelevant, because officers reasonably shoot until the threat is eliminated. That is correct in principle, see Plumhoff, 134 S.Ct. at 2022, but wrong in application. The jury could have concluded (easily) that Proano continued to apply lethal force even after the threat subsided. After the vehicle stopped reversing and began inching toward the light pole, Proano continued to fire several more shots into its side. . . Proano next asserts that there was insufficient evidence to prove that he willfully used unreasonable force. Again, however, the dashcam video provided grounds for the jury to conclude otherwise. The brazenness of Proano's actions alone could have supported the jury's conclusion: despite the car not threatening anyone's safety, Proano fired sixteen shots at it, including several after the car began idling. . . Add to that how Proano, viewing the record in the government's favor, disregarded training by: using his gun, cocked, as an immediate show of force; discharging it into a group of people; shooting at something into which he did not have visibility; and never reassessing the situation until his magazine was empty. The jury also could have disregarded Proano's justifications as inconsistent with the video evidence. Specifically, although Proano reported concern for Brown, who he said was being 'dragged' by the Toyota, the jury could have concluded that assertion was flatly not believable in light of the video, which showed Brown propped up out of the window (and thus not 'dragged'). In all, there was sufficient evidence to convict Proano on both counts.")

Dockery v. Blackburn, 911 F.3d 458, 467-68 (7th Cir. 2018) ("We have two guideposts in an excessive-force case like this one. The first is that an officer's use of a Taser against an actively resisting subject either does not violate a clearly established right or is constitutionally reasonable. . . Examples of active resistance include 'kicking and flailing,' Clarett v. Roberts, 657 F.3d 664, 674–75 (7th Cir. 2011); declining to follow instructions while acting in a belligerent manner, Forrest v. Prine, 620 F.3d 739, 745–46 (7th Cir. 2010); and swatting an arresting officer's hands away while backpedaling, Brooks v. City of Aurora, 653 F.3d 478, 481 (7th Cir. 2011).The second guidepost is that an officer may not use significant force (like a Taser) against a 'nonresisting or passively resisting' subject. . . . In some cases each discrete use of force must be separately justified. . . We think a sequential analysis is appropriate here and therefore divide our discussion between the first use of the Taser and the subsequent deployments when Dockery was on the ground. . . .The video shows that Dockery was uncooperative and physically aggressive when the officers tried to handcuff him, rocking back and forth and twice escaping their grasp. When he fell backward, he wildly kicked in their direction and immediately jumped to his feet. Under these circumstances we have no difficulty concluding that the first use of the Taser is protected by qualified immunity. . . .The video unequivocally shows that Dockery did not submit to the officers' authority after the first Taser shock. Instead he sat up, pulled out one of the prongs, pointed an arm in Sergeant Blackburn's direction, attempted to stand up, and otherwise ignored the officers' commands to get on the ground. . . .[T]the video evidence here, which unambiguously shows that Dockery had not submitted to the officers' authority and was far from subdued when Sergeant Blackburn applied the Taser three more times.")

Sanzone v. Gray, 884 F.3d 736, 740-41 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The Estate contends that Gray impermissibly escalated the situation before shooting by not taking cover. But the law does not establish that such conduct is relevant to an excessive-force analysis, let alone that an officer may be liable based on actions before the shooting that might have led to the use of force. . . And the Estate contends that Gray should have used a less deadly method before shooting, but Graham makes it clear that the Fourth Amendment does not require the use of alternatives before deadly force in a situation such as this when there is 'no time.'. . Gray did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and so there is no need to assess whether a 'clearly established' right was at stake. Were it necessary, the Estate would be on shaky ground; the Estate admits that it cannot point to an analogous case decided before January 2014 that would put Gray on notice that his conduct was unreasonable. And the Estate's reliance on the general standard for excessive force 'is not enough' because the right must be ' "clearly established" in a more particularized, and hence more relevant, sense.'") Tolliver v. City of Chicago, 820 F.3d 237, 246 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Qualified immunity applies to the actions of Officers Sobieraj and Debose here. Reasonable officers in their circumstances would have perceived the car as a deadly weapon that created a threat of serious physical harm. The Mitsubishi was only two car lengths from the officers when it began to move in their direction, and even at slow speeds, the officers had only seconds to react to the threat. Moreover, the officers had no way of knowing whether Tolliver would accelerate, shortening the space and time to react. By Tolliver's own account, the bullets were fired in rapid succession, over a period that could be measured in seconds. The officers stopped firing when the vehicle stopped moving and the threat had passed. During those few seconds, Sobieraj sprained his ankle as he moved away from the car. . . .If the officers began shooting before the car moved, the defendants agree that qualified immunity would not apply but that scenario would necessarily imply the invalidity of Tolliver's conviction for aggravated battery. Because of Heck, Tolliver would have to obtain the reversal of his conviction before he could proceed against the officers on that theory. And once the car began to move towards the officers, as a factual matter, there was no natural breaking point between the first few shots and the remaining shots. Even if it were possible to discern in those few seconds a meaningful break from the shots absolutely necessary to protect the officers and those that were unnecessary, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because Tolliver had ducked out of sight, and the officers had no reason to know that he was disabled or that there was no need to continue firing. From a reasonable officer's perspective, the danger had not changed because the car continued to roll forward. In the totality of these circumstances, qualified immunity therefore applies to all of the officers' actions once the car began to move towards the officers.")

Williams v. Indiana State Police Dep't, 797 F.3d 468, 475-76, 478-80, 482-85 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Sheehan . . . cautions against interpreting the 'clearly established law' requirement too broadly and substituting general propositions of law for cases that are factually similar enough to apprise the officers of the contours of the constitutional protections due in the situation. We turn then, to the application of Sheehan and the other cases set forth above, to the facts of the individual cases before us, largely drawing from the thorough presentation of facts set forth in the comprehensive district court decisions. . . .Under the rule as announced in Sheehan, it is of no consequence for purposes of the Fourth Amendment that Williams' injury and imminent injury were self-inflicted; the officers were not required to allow him to carry out his suicide attempt. When the officers entered Williams' room, they initially attempted to take control of him without using deadly force. As we discuss later, their initial use of the tasers was appropriate under constitutional standards given Williams' possession of a knife and his threat to stab anyone who entered. When that was unsuccessful, and Williams advanced on them brandishing the knife, the officers acted reasonably in using deadly force; plaintiffs do not argue otherwise. That brings us to the appellants' related argument, which is that a reasonable officer, upon opening the bathroom door, would have been able to see that Williams was not at risk of bleeding out and therefore there were no exigent circumstances necessitating action. Once again, the Supreme Court and this court have repeatedly rejected that type of second-guessing of the split second decisions officers are forced to make in confronting rapidly evolving situations. . . Williams had acknowledged that he had cut himself and that it was taking longer than he thought to lose sufficient blood to end his life, and had also admitted to taking all of the remaining Xanax pills in his possession in an attempt to end his life. He also threatened to kill anyone who entered. Faced with those undisputed facts, as a matter of law the officers possessed an objectively reasonable belief that action was needed to avoid the threat to his life and the potential threat to others inherent in the danger that he could emerge in that agitated state with the knives. The appellants argue that no exigency was present because Williams had not lost consciousness and 'it is generally well known that most suicide attempts are not successful, unless a gun is used,' and in support point to the testimony of a forensic pathologist that only 20–50% of suicide attempts are successful. This rather astounding argument is unavailing. Setting aside the obvious question that perhaps non-firearms suicide attempts are unsuccessful precisely because timely aid is rendered, the argument would alter the standard to one that would allow officers to act only in the event of imminent death. There is no support for such a standard that would prohibit officers from rendering aid to a person who has already harmed himself, or that would require them to wait until a hostile person emerged and attacked others before attempting to defuse the situation, and it is inconsistent with Sheehan. Finally, no clearly established law renders the officers' use of force unreasonable in light of the circumstances that they faced. Williams' presence in the confined space of a bathroom, inaccessible from the outside, presented the officers with limited options, which was further impacted by the space limits of the bedroom that adjoined it. The decision to employ tasers immediately upon opening the bathroom door was a reasonable use of force to subdue a person who potentially presented an immediate threat to himself and the officers once that door was opened. Under the qualified immunity standard, the appellants must demonstrate that "the right to be free from the particular use of force under the relevant circumstances was 'clearly established.' " Abbott, 705 F.3d at 725. Rather than establishing that such force was impermissible, our cases repeatedly have upheld the use of non-lethal force such as tasers in such situations. . . .In contrast, the appellants have failed to present any case that would establish that the use of a taser in a scenario such as this one is excessive. . . . The appellants here, like the plaintiffs in Sheehan, cannot point to any case involving a dangerous, obviously unstable person in possession of a weapon, making threats, which would have put the officers on notice that their conduct was constitutionally impermissible. Accordingly, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity for their decision to open the door and utilize the tasers. Once the tasers were employed without effect, the officers were presented with a person advancing towards them with a knife, and in fact one officer was ultimately stabbed by Williams. The appellants do not contest that the officers acted reasonably in firing the shots at that point. Accordingly, the district court properly held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. . . .We turn then to the facts in Brown. . . . [I]in determining whether the district court properly denied qualified immunity, we accept the district court's determination that there was a genuine issue of fact as to whether John was raising the knife and advancing toward the deputies at the time he was shot. In denying the motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the district court identified two factual scenarios under which, in its view, a jury could find that Blanchard unreasonably had seized John. The first theory of liability considered by the district court is that Blanchard unreasonably created an encounter that led to the use of force against John. According to the district court, Blanchard could be liable under that theory even if he established that he reasonably thought John was advancing on him with an upraised knife, if the jury found that Blanchard's actions in kicking in the door were not reasonably calculated to prevent John from harming himself, which was the only legitimate ground for initiating a seizure. Blanchard argues that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity on that ground, because it was not clearly established that pre-seizure conduct of a law enforcement officer can violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable seizures. Blanchard is entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent placed the constitutional question beyond debate. . . That standard is not met here. Our caselaw is far from clear as to the relevance of pre-seizure conduct, or even as to a determination as to what conduct falls within the designation 'pre-seizure,' although the majority of cases hold that it may not form the basis for a Fourth Amendment claim. [collecting cases] Given the lack of clarity in cases in this area, we disagree that Blanchard was on notice that his conduct leading up to the encounter could itself be the basis for Fourth Amendment liability. . . . That does not mean that Blanchard's pre-seizure conduct is irrelevant to the Fourth Amendment claim. The sequence of events leading up to the seizure is relevant because the reasonableness of the seizure is evaluated in light of the totality of the circumstances. . . For instance, the short period of time that elapsed from Blanchard's arrival to the confrontation, and his abrupt action in kicking in the door, give context to John's possession of the knife that might be different if John had himself opened the door holding the knife. The circumstances known by Blanchard, or even created by him, inform the determination as to whether the lethal response was an objectively reasonable one. . . But our caselaw does not clearly establish that an officer may be liable under the Fourth Amendment solely for his pre-seizure conduct that led to the encounter. . . The second theory of liability considered by the district court concerns whether Blanchard is entitled to qualified immunity for using deadly force in the absence of probable cause to believe that John was threatening him at the time. Under this theory of liability, the issue is whether it is clearly established law that Blanchard could not constitutionally use lethal force against John in the circumstances facing Blanchard. On appeal, Blanchard argues both that the record establishes that he had probable cause to believe that John was raising the knife and advancing, and that even absent that John's possession of the knife in those circumstances were sufficiently threatening that he was entitled to qualified immunity. As we stated above, the first argument impermissibly seeks a review of the district court's determination that there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether John was advancing with the knife. Accordingly, we review only whether Blanchard is entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether John was merely holding the knife or advancing with it. In contrast to the situation presented in Williams, in this case, Blanchard resorted to the use of lethal force as an initial matter, and he did so despite the possession of a taser by Such who was present at the scene. There may have been reasons for that choice, given the confined nature of the mobile home including a hallway that was only 2–1/2 feet wide thus limiting mobility, but the record is undeveloped as to that. We must balance the nature of the force used—from lethal through the spectrum of non-lethal options such as flash bang devices, bean bags, pepper spray and tasers—with the governmental interest at stake. Even focusing the reasonableness inquiry, as Blanchard urges, on only the shooting itself as opposed to the second breach of the door that preceded it, the district court properly denied qualified immunity. It is well-established—and has been since long before the shooting at issue here—that 'a person has a right not to be seized through the use of deadly force unless he puts another person (including a police officer) in imminent danger or he is actively resisting arrest and the circumstances warrant that degree of force.'. . Accordingly, we have repeatedly recognized that officers could not use significant force on nonresisting or passively resisting suspects. . . If Nancy's description is accurate, and we must credit her version at this stage because the district court determined that it created a genuine issue of fact, then deadly force was used here even though John was merely passively resisting their entreaties, and in the absence of any threats of violence by John toward the deputies or anyone else. . . . Blanchard was faced with facts indicating that John posed a potential threat to himself, but there were no facts indicating that he was a threat to others, and in fact his mother's testimony that she was able to enter the room, talk with him, and hold his head indicates otherwise. Blanchard does not even dispute that proposition. Instead, he argues once again that the undisputed testimony established that John was shot because he approached the officers with a knife in a threatening manner. Blanchard fails to acknowledge that the district court determined that there was a genuine dispute of fact as to that matter, and that we cannot review that determination in this interlocutory appeal. That dispute of fact casts doubt on the contention that immediately after the door was kicked in a second time, John voiced resistance and then walked toward Blanchard with the knife, and as in Weinmann the mere possession of the knife is insufficient to warrant summary judgment. We are aware that officers responding to a scene in which a suicidal person is locked in a room are faced with the difficult determination as to whether delay in responding will allow the person to further harm himself or to become aggressive toward others. It is clearly established, however, that officers cannot resort as an initial matter to lethal force on a person who is merely passively resisting and has not presented any threat of harm to others. Blanchard is not entitled to qualified immunity under that theory of liability, and thus the district court properly denied the motion for summary judgment.")

Milan v. Bolin, 795 F.3d 726, 730 (7th Cir. 2015)("Police are not to be criticized for taking threats against them and their families seriously. But flash bangs are destructive and dangerous and not to be used in a search of a private home occupied so far as the police knew only by an elderly woman and her two daughters. We cannot understand the failure of the police, before flash banging the house, to conduct a more extensive investigation of the actual suspects: Murray, living two doors away from the Milan home and thus with ready access to Mrs. Milan's open network, and the male Milans. The police neglect of Murray is almost incomprehensible. His past made him a prime suspect. A day of investigating him would have nailed him, as we know because a day of investigating—the day after the violent search of the home—did nail him. The district judge's denial of the defendants' motion for summary judgment appears eminently reasonable when one puts together the flash bangs, the skimpy basis for the search and its prematurity—the failure to check whether the network was open and the failure to conduct a more extensive investigation before deciding that flash bangs were appropriate means of initiating the search, the resulting neglect of Murray, and the handcuffing of the daughter. True, we mustn't base our decision on the wisdom of hindsight. If the police had had reasonable grounds for conducting the search as they did (that is, with flash bangs, yet without any but the most perfunctory, indeed radically incomplete, preliminary investigation), then the doctrine of qualified immunity would shield them from liability even though the flash bangs and ensuing search yielded no benefits for law enforcement. But, to repeat for emphasis, the police acted unreasonably and precipitately in flash banging the house without a minimally responsible investigation of the threats. The open network expanded the number of possible threateners and just one extra day of surveillance, coupled with a brief investigation of Murray and the three male Milans, should have been sufficient to reassure the police that there were no dangerous men lurking in the house. Precipitate use of flash bangs to launch a search has troubled us before, leading us to declare that 'the use of a flash bang grenade is reasonable only when there is a dangerous suspect and a dangerous entry point for the police, when the police have checked to see if innocent individuals are around before deploying the device, when the police have visually inspected the area where the device will be used and when the police carry a fire extinguisher.' Estate of Escobedo v. Bender, supra, 600 F.3d at 784–85. The police in this case flunked the test just quoted. True, they'd brought a fire extinguisher with them—but, as if in tribute to Mack Sennett's Keystone Kops, they left it in their armored SWAT vehicle. So while the defendants are correct to point out that a reasonable mistake committed by police in the execution of a search is shielded from liability by the doctrine of qualified immunity, . . . in this case the Evansville police committed too many mistakes to pass the test of reasonableness.")

Weinmann v. McClone, 787 F.3d 444, 449-51 (7th Cir. 2015) ("So what did McClone know? He knew four things: 1) Jerome had access to a firearm and maybe ammunition; 2) someone had called 911 saying that Jerome was suicidal; 3) Jerome did not want to talk to the dispatcher and had not responded to McClone's knocks; and 4) there were sounds from inside the garage that sounded like pattering on cupboard doors. In addition, Jerome had hung up on the dispatcher and told her to tell the officer to leave the premises. . . .McClone also insists that it is undisputed that he believed his life was in danger because of the way Jerome was holding the gun. The critical problem with that argument, as the district court recognized, is that the way in which Jerome was holding the gun is disputed. Our task is to determine, under Jerome's version of the facts, if McClone was objectively reasonable in his belief that his life was in danger. At the moment McClone kicked down the door and saw Jerome, McClone only knew the four relevant facts we reviewed earlier. Those facts are not enough to justify the instant use of deadly force. It does not matter for purposes of the Fourth Amendment that McClone subjectively believed that his life was in danger. The test is an objective one, and taking the facts as Jerome presents them, it is not met. As the district judge rightly noted, if Jerome had the gun raised to his shoulder and pointed at McClone, then McClone would have been justified in using deadly force and hence entitled to qualified immunity. . . That alternate set of facts would have made McClone's assessment of the situation objectively reasonable. But, to repeat, the facts are disputed, and that is why the district judge was correct to determine that for present purposes Jerome has alleged actions that violated his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. . . . Jerome relies on two Supreme Court cases, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), and Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), and a handful of decisions from our sister circuits. Graham and Garner stand for the proposition that a person has a constitutional right not to be shot unless an officer reasonably believes that he poses a threat to the officer or someone else. The court of appeals cases are even more specific: they say that officers may not use deadly force against suicidal people unless they threaten harm to others, including the officers. . . McClone argues that there is no rule flatly forbidding the use of deadly force even if a weapon is not directly pointed at an officer. But the cases on which he relies are different from this one: they involve suspects who threatened the officer in some way. . . As our account of Jerome's version of the facts demonstrates, there is no evidence that Jerome threatened McClone and so that theory cannot help McClone. Even if we were to conclude that no other decisions are sufficiently analogous to be pertinent, we would still be unable to uphold a finding of qualified immunity on this record. McClone's shooting of Jerome while Jerome was passively sitting in a chair with the gun across his lap would meet the alternative standard of plainly excessive conduct. Recall that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Kicking down a door and immediately shooting a suicidal person who is neither resisting arrest nor threatening anyone save himself is an excessive use of force. And each of the four shots inflicted injury on Jerome. McClone did not look through the other windows into the garage to see what Jerome was doing, nor did he try to talk to him. Instead, within three minutes of arriving at the scene, McClone opened fire. Either viewed as so plainly excessive that no analogous case is needed, or viewed in light of existing authority, this was an excessive use of force. . .The existence of a factual dispute about the circumstances surrounding McClone's decision to fire on Jerome precludes a ruling on qualified immunity at this point. The district court correctly recognized this, and thus its judgment is Affirmed.")

Bruce v. Guernsey, 777 F.3d 872, 879 (7th Cir. 2015) ("While arguable probable cause is a relatively flexible standard, it does not bend so far as to encompass Guernsey's actions at this early stage in the case. Recall that for mental-health seizures, the question is whether there is probable cause to believe that the subject of the seizure is a danger to herself or others. This record does not establish as a matter of law that Guernsey, whose only indication that Bruce might commit suicide was the knowledge that someone had said Bruce was potentially suicidal, reasonably believed that he had probable cause to continue to seize her. When determining whether arguable probable cause exists, we must take into consideration the particular circumstances facing the officer. Guernsey faced a calm and undisturbed high school student who was at a friend's house with several other companions and whose father was present and objecting to Guernsey's actions. Not only did Guernsey take Bruce from D.F.'s home to the hospital against both her will and that of her father, but he also made misrepresentations on the petition for involuntary judicial admission and thus made it more likely that Bruce's confinement would continue. On this view of the facts, Guernsey is not entitled to qualified immunity. We stress, however, that this is an early stage of the case. It is possible that after further discovery, Guernsey may decide to move again for qualified immunity or for summary judgment.")

Williams v. City of Chicago, 733 F.3d 749, 758 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Williams, we do not find room for a reasonable mistake by the officers about whether they had probable cause to arrest Williams. The defendants argue that the officers reasonably concluded that the fire had been set intentionally. We can assume that is true, but the argument misses the mark. The question is not whether the fire was arson but whether it was reasonable to arrest Williams for arson. On this point, the defendants have only Williams's presence on the porch. And as explained above, it is and was well established that mere presence is not enough for probable cause. When asked, Williams freely identified himself and explained he was there trying to rouse any occupants in the locked and burning home. For purposes of summary judgment, we must assume there was no indication that Williams had been inside the home, let alone that he had set the fire. Based on those factual assumptions, there was no basis for reasonable minds to differ on whether there was probable cause to arrest Williams. On this record, these officers are not entitled to summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity.")

Rabin v. Flynn, 725 F.3d 628, 633-35 (7th Cir. 2013) ("We agree with Rabin that a police officer's suspicion of wrongdoing that is premised on a mistake of law cannot justify a Terry stop. . . .This principle, however, does not help Rabin because it only makes sense in situations where a reasonable officer would know all the facts that he or she needs to determine whether the suspected activity is unlawful. . . . In this case, even if the officers should have known what a tan card was, the officers still did not know (or have reason to know) all the relevant facts to determine whether Rabin could lawfully carry a gun in public. . . specifically, whether Rabin's tan card was legitimate. Under these circumstances, it would not be clearly unreasonable for an officer to believe that releasing an individual that may be unauthorized to carry a deadly weapon would present an unacceptable risk of danger to themselves or the public. . . .And though we are troubled by the use of handcuffs in the context of a Terry stop even after Rabin's gun (the primary source of danger) had been confiscated, an officer could have reasonably believed under clearly established law at that time that handcuffs may be used during a Terry stop when dangerous weapons are generally involved. . . . .We do not intend to suggest that taking one-and-a-half hours to simply verify a gun license is reasonable under these circumstances. . . .But there is no evidence that the individual officers (or their ignorance of the law) were responsible for the prolonged verification process. When Flynn was presented with the tan card, he did not sit there scratching his head, but promptly turned to other channels in an attempt to verify it. Perhaps the police department or other relevant government agency should have had a system in place that could more efficiently verify tan cards. But Rabin does not point to any cases clearly establishing that individual officers are personally responsible for curing such systemic failures, which is hard to imagine given that such failures are likely outside their control. . . . In sum, given the safety risks at stake, it was reasonable under clearly established law for the officers to temporarily detain Rabin pending the verification of his gun carrying license, even if the officers had known about the tan card exemption under the law. His prolonged detention was then caused by systemic failures outside the individual officers' control. So the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Rabin's wrongful arrest claim.")

Rabin v. Flynn, 725 F.3d 628, 638-41(7th Cir. 2013) (Rovner, J., concurring) ("[B]eginning with our decision in United States v. Glenna, 878 F.2d 967 (7th Cir.1989), we have recognized a very limited set of circumstances in which police may place an individual in handcuffs without thereby converting a Terry stop into a de facto arrest. Our holding in Glenna was founded on evidence that gave police officers reason to be concerned for their safety as they confronted the defendant and attempted to determine whether he was engaged in a crime. . . . Subsequent cases have likewise sustained the use of handcuffs during Terry stops when the circumstances suggested either that an individual stopped for questioning might have a weapon or that he might be involved in criminal activity often associated with violence. . . . A second line of cases has relied on the risk of flight to justify the use of handcuffs while the detained individual is being questioned. . . . These decisions are consistent with our observation in Glenna that it will be the rare case in which it will be necessary, and thus consistent with the purpose and scope of a Terry stop, to temporarily immobilize a person with handcuffs while a police officer attempts to confirm or dispel a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. . . . However, given our failure as a court to make explicit the limits which I believe are implicit in the facts and rationale of our decisions, along with our occasionally uncabined language regarding the use of handcuffs during Terry stops, I must join my colleagues in holding that the defendants here are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Thus, the question is not whether it was clear, in December 2009, that Rabin had a Fourth Amendment right not to be arrested absent probable cause to believe he had committed a crime; that much is beyond dispute. The question, rather, is whether it would have been clear to a reasonable police officer that handcuffing someone in the course of a Terry stop initiated to determine that person's authority to carry a firearm in public—when the firearm has already been taken from him—transformed the stop into a de facto arrest requiring probable cause. I agree that the answer to that question is 'no.'. . . I can identify no prior case making clear that the use of handcuffs in the scenario presented here would take an investigatory detention across that difficult-to-discern boundary. In view of our statements about the 'trend' toward allowing the use of handcuffs and other forcible restraints during Terry stops, and our continuing reaffirmation that the use of handcuffs will not necessarily transform such a stop into an arrest, I believe that a reasonable officer could have thought the use of handcuffs was consistent with the permissible purpose and scope of the stop, particularly one involving a firearm. Officer safety has been a recurring theme in our cases sustaining the use of handcuffs during investigatory detentions. And although Rabin claimed a legal right to carry his firearm—which he had readily surrendered to Flynn at the beginning of the encounter—an officer might have reasonably thought that he was free to handcuff any individual being investigated for the possible illegal possession of a weapon in the name of safety, without transforming the investigatory stop into an arrest.")

Abbott v. Sangamon County, Ill., 705 F.3d 706, 725-33 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Although Deputy Sweeney used the same device, a model X26 Taser, [footnote omitted] on both Cindy and Travis, he did not employ it in the same manner—he used the taser in dart mode on Cindy and in drivestun mode on Travis. . . .Deputy Sweeney argues, and the district court held, that he is entitled to qualified immunity on Travis's excessive-force claim because he did not violate clearly established law. Alternatively, Sweeney contends that use of the taser under the circumstances was reasonable so there was no constitutional violation in the first place. We need not examine whether Sweeney's use of the taser on Travis was reasonable because we agree with the district court that use of the taser under these circumstances did not violate clearly established law. The facts viewed in Travis's favor appear to show that, as Sweeney was backing out of the driveway, Travis was fidgeting around in the backseat and successfully maneuvered his cuffed hands from behind his back to the front of his body. . . .On appeal, Travis does not challenge Sweeney's initial use of the taser, arguing instead that Sweeney violated clearly established law in tasing him multiple times after he had been subdued by the first tasing. . . Travis claims that the subsequent taser applications were excessive because he had been subdued by the first tasing and he was already handcuffed and in custody. . . He marshals three pepper-spray cases from other circuits to support his position, but while those cases support the general proposition that it is excessive to use such force on a subdued suspect, the arrestees in those cases, unlike here, were actually subdued. . . . Unlike the arrestees in these three cases, even Travis admits that he continued fighting with Sweeney after the first application of the taser, so he was not subdued. And even though he was handcuffed, he had moved his hands to the front of his body, which allowed him to overpower Sweeney at times. . . . Courts generally hold that the use of a taser against an actively resisting suspect either does not violate clearly established law or is constitutionally reasonable. . . .Cindy's excessive-force claim again presents a closer question. Cindy, like Travis, does not challenge the first tasing on appeal. With regard to the second tasing, Deputy Sweeney contends that he did not violate clearly established law because Cindy failed to follow his orders to roll over and then attempted to stand up. But there is a factual dispute over whether Cindy attempted to stand up or whether she did not move, and we must view the facts in her favor. The district court acknowledged that Cindy testified she was unable to move, but it concluded that this was irrelevant because the reasonableness of the force used is determined from the officer's perspective and there was no dispute that Cindy failed to comply with Sweeney's command. Because Cindy does not challenge the first tasing, we assume without deciding that it was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment or at least that a reasonable officer could have believed that it was reasonable. But the fact that an initial use of force may have been justified does not mean that all subsequent uses of that force were similarly justified. . . . The totality of the circumstances, when viewed in a light favorable to Cindy, demonstrates that Sweeney's second application of the taser could be determined by a jury to have been unreasonable. Cindy was shot in dart mode both times, which caused her to lose control of her skeletal muscles, a very significant intrusion on her Fourth Amendment interests. . . . Moreover, there is absolutely no evidence that Cindy posed a threat to Sweeney, herself, or anyone else, especially after the first tasing when she was lying on her back on the ground and not moving. . . .In short, there are no countervailing governmental interests that come close to off-setting the substantial intrusion on Cindy's Fourth Amendment interests exacted by the second tasing. . . .Although Cindy has made out a constitutional violation, she must also show that the right that Sweeney violated was clearly established on June 25, 2007, the date of the incident. . . .The Supreme Court has not addressed an excessive force claim based on the use of a taser and the most analogous case from this circuit is Cyrus, which was decided in 2010 and did not consider qualified immunity. And although we cited several cases from other circuits holding that officers had used excessive force in deploying tasers under circumstances similar to those here—a misdemeanant who is not actively resisting—all of those cases were decided after June 25, 2007. The Ninth Circuit has held that the absence of any case law involving tasers means that officers are entitled to qualified immunity. See, e.g., Mattos, 661 F.3d at 452. But, as the Sixth Circuit has explained, just as defining a right too broadly may defeat the purpose of qualified immunity, defining a right too narrowly may defeat the purpose of § 1983. Hagans, 695 F.3d at 508–09. Moreover, we have explained that '[e]very time the police employ a new weapon, officers do not get a free pass to use it in any manner until a case from the Supreme Court or from this circuit involving that particular weapon is decided.'. .Turning to the present case, we conclude that it was clearly established on June 25, 2007, that it is unlawful to deploy a taser in dart mode against a nonviolent misdemeanant who had just been tased in dart mode and made no movement when, after the first tasing, the officer instructed her to turn over. Prior to 2007, it was well-established in this circuit that police officers could not use significant force on nonresisting or passively resisting suspects. . . Rather, only a minimal amount of force may be used on such arrestees. . . .[I]t was well-established in 2007 that police officers cannot continue to use force once a suspect is subdued. . . . In contrast to the situation posed by Travis, no reasonable officer could have understood Cindy's conduct after the first tasing, as she describes it, to be active physical resistance. . . . In short, a genuine issue of material fact exists that must be resolved by a jury, so summary judgment on this claim was improper.")

Xiong v. Wagner, 700 F.3d 282, 290, 291 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We need not determine whether probable cause in fact existed at the time of Wagner's removal decision. Rather, we may rule on qualified immunity grounds that a reasonable caseworker could have believed that probable cause existed and accordingly wouldn't have understood his actions to violate a constitutional right. . . Id. Thus, as long as RCHSD workers 'could have believed [Thor's removal] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information [they] possessed,' defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Id. (quoting Hunter v. Bryant, 502 U.S. 224, 227 (1991)). . . . Thus, because defendants could have reasonably believed that probable cause existed sufficient to justify Thor's seizure—and accordingly would not have understood their actions to violate clearly established law—qualified immunity shields them from any alleged liability stemming from Thor's initial removal. We therefore affirm the grant of summary judgment in defendants' favor on this claim.")

Phillips v. Community Ins. Corp., 678 F.3d 513, 528, 529 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[W]e ask whether it was clearly established on November 11, 2005 that multiple trauma-inducing shots would constitute excessive force when used to secure a non-resisting, intoxicated arrestee. We conclude that the right to be free from this amount of force was clearly established on the date of Phillips's arrest. The officers contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because, on the date of the arrest, no case from the Supreme Court or from this circuit had held use of the SL6 unconstitutional. They argue that if the law had clearly established that use of an SL6 was unlawful, police departments would no longer retain the weapon in their arsenal. The defendants misconstrue the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Every time the police employ a new weapon, officers do not get a free pass to use it in any manner until a case from the Supreme Court or from this circuit involving that particular weapon is decided. . . . Even assuming a lack of clarity about the propriety of shooting Phillips with the SL6 once, the officers should have known that it was unlawful to escalate force by shooting Phillips three more times when she was unresponsive, presented no immediate threat, and made no attempt to flee or even avoid police fire. That is, it was clearly established in November 2005 that officers could not use such a significant level of force on a nonresisting or passively resisting individual.")

Phillips v. Community Ins. Corp., 678 F.3d 513, 530-33, 536, 537 (7th Cir. 2012) (7th Cir. 2012) (Tinder, J., dissenting) ("I am aware of no case before this one. . . where we have reversed a jury verdict in favor of a defendant officer by concluding that the officer's use of force under the totality of circumstances was excessive as a matter of law. The facts in this case should not lead us to such an extraordinary result. Although most of the relevant facts in this case are undisputed, it is within the jury's province to determine what reasonable inferences to draw from those facts. . . .Admittedly, this is a difficult and close case. Nevertheless, given the situation faced by the officers, I believe that whether four shots was too many under the circumstances was a question properly presented to the jurors. Under these facts, and looking at the situation as it was unfolding at the time, a jury could have determined that it was reasonable for the officers to use the SL6 baton launcher to gain compliance with their orders. . . . [E]ven if there were some basis to undo the jury's verdict, . . . I think the judgment of the district court should be affirmed: the officers should be entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The SL6 was a relatively new weapon for use in the field by the Waukesha police department; Officer Hoffman had never used it in the field prior to this incident and was not aware that it could penetrate the flesh. . . . In this case, the officers used the SL6 as a non-lethal weapon to gain the suspect's compliance from a safe distance. The weapon was carefully aimed to strike only Phillips's legs. There was no clearly established law alerting the officers that their actions in this instance were unlawful. . . .The majority is correct that by using a new type of weapon officers 'do not get a free pass to use it in any manner until a case from the Supreme Court or from this circuit involving that particular weapon is decided.'. . Certainly, qualified immunity doesn't give officers a green light to use new weapons in any unreasonable manner, but it does absolve them of personal liability where they acted cautiously (maybe too cautiously) in a close case requiring judgment calls. . . .Police officers must have the ability to make on-the-scene judgment calls that protect their safety and the safety of the public. That's what the officers attempted to do in this situation and there was no existing legal precedent warning them that their actions were unlawful.")

McComas v. Brickley, 673 F.3d 722, 725-27 (7th Cir. 2012) ("McComas was arrested on suspicion of committing two crimes: murder and assisting a criminal. . . . [T]he absence of arguable probable cause for murder does not preclude judgment in favor of Brickley. The existence of arguable probable cause for either charge is enough to bar liability for false arrest under § 1983. . . .[T]he important question is whether there was arguable probable cause for the arrest in light of McComas's troubled interview and the way it contradicted the surveillance footage. Considering the totality of the undisputed facts, we find that arresting McComas was reasonable. See Wheeler v. Lawson, 539 F.3d 629, 639 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Qualified immunity protects those officers who make a reasonable error in determining whether there is probable cause to arrest an individual."). Because there was arguable probable cause on these facts, Brickley is protected by qualified immunity from an action for false arrest.")

Jones v. Clark, 630 F.3d 677, 680, 683-85 (7th Cir. 2011) ("In Hiibel, the Supreme Court held that it did not violate the Fourth Amendment for an officer to stop a citizen, request identification, and arrest the citizen for failing to comply with Nevada's stop and identify statute after the citizen refused to identify himself. . . Integral to Hiibel's holding, however, was that there was 'no question that the initial stop was based on reasonable suspicion.'. . Indeed, the premise of the Illinois law, just like the Nevada law at issue in Hiibel, is that the initial stop is justified under Terry v. Ohio. Where an initial stop is not based on specific, objective facts that establish reasonable suspicion, Brown controls rather than Hiibel, and the existence of a stop-and-identify statute is irrelevant. The facts as Jones describes them demonstrate that Officers Clark and Kaminski violated Jones's Fourth Amendment rights when they stopped and detained her, and so the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. . . .The need to protect an official's ability to carry out important duties is the driving force behind the Supreme Court's recognition of qualified immunity as an entitlement to avoid trial and its corresponding decision to make denials of qualified immunity immediately appealable. . . Officers Clark and Kaminski took advantage of this framework in their appeal. Playing by the rules, they accepted Jones's version of events. But that version of events (to which they will not be bound as the case progresses) reveals nothing but a blatant and embarrassing abuse of police power. The district court correctly concluded that Jones's suit is not blocked by qualified immunity; we therefore AFFIRM its order.")

> See also Lyberger v. Snider, 42 F.4th 807, 812 (7th Cir. 2022) ("[W]e should not overread Hiibel. It held only that a state may pass a law that makes refusing to provide identification to the police a crime. . . Whether or not the Illinois legislature has done so is another question entirely, and one that rests on state law. Since Hiibel and Cady, the Illinois Appellate Court has reaffirmed that its answer to that question is no: refusing to identify oneself to the police does not constitute obstruction of justice. . . The state courts have likewise held that section 5/107–14, the criminal procedure rule mentioned in Cady, does not create a 'duty ... for a suspect to identify himself or herself.'. . We consider the uncertainty we noted in Cady resolved and therefore note that the depiction of state law in footnote eight of that decision is not accurate.")

Cyrus v. Town of Mukwonago, 624 F.3d 856, 863 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Defense counsel suggested at oral argument that if Lieutenant Czarnecki's first use of the Taser was reasonable, all other uses were necessarily appropriate because once an officer is justified in using a particular level of force to effectuate an arrest, he can continue to use that same level of force until the suspect is apprehended. Not so. Force is reasonable only when exercised in proportion to the threat posed . . . and as the threat changes, so too should the degree of force . . . . Force also becomes increasingly severe the more often it is used; striking a resisting suspect once is not the same as striking him ten times. It's the totality of the circumstances, not the first forcible act, that determines objective reasonableness. Accordingly, a jury might reasonably conclude that the circumstances of the encounter here reduced the need for force as the situation progressed. When Czarnecki first arrived at the scene, he was the only officer on site, and his concern that Cyrus might retrieve a weapon or pose a threat to persons inside the house was clearly reasonable. On the other hand, once Cyrus was on the ground, unarmed, and apparently unable to stand up on his own, the risk calculus changed. Or so a jury might reasonably conclude. Summary judgment was therefore inappropriate.")

Lewis v. Downey, 581 F.3d 467, 479 (7th Cir. 2009) ("We hold that a reasonable officer would understand that employing a taser gun under the version of the facts that Lewis has described would violate the prisoner's constitutional rights. Our case law makes this clear. . . . Lewis claims that he was prone on his bed, weakened, and docile. He asserts that he was told to rise one time and was not warned that a taser would be used against him if he failed to comply. He states that he was scarcely given enough time to turn his head and did not otherwise respond to Shreffler's order. If these truly are the facts, no reasonable officer would think that he would be justified in shooting Lewis with a taser gun. Accepting Lewis's story, we conclude that Officer Shreffler is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Baird v. Renbarger, 576 F.3d 340, 345, 346 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Renbarger urges this court to view his behavior at a high level of generality; he sees it as the mere pointing of a gun. We decline to take this perspective. 'Pointing a gun' encompasses far too great a variety of behaviors and situations. Renbarger pointed a submachine gun at various people when there was no suggestion of danger, either from the alleged crime that was being investigated or the people he was targeting. The Fourth Amendment protects against this type of behavior by the police.").

Guzman v. City of Chicago, 565 F.3d 393, 398, 399 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Bonnstetter should have known early on that the warrant did not accurately describe the premises to be searched. Once he knew that the house was not a single-family dwelling, he should have called off the search. Not doing so violated Guzman's constitutional rights. Interestingly, as this is a case for damages under § 1983, it may illustrate our recent observation that in some ways it is easier to protect Fourth Amendment rights though civil actions, rather than through the suppression of evidence in criminal cases. . . . As we said in Sims, civil cases–like our case today–do not raise concerns that illegally seized evidence essential to convicting the defendant of a grave crime might have to be suppressed, and the criminal let go to continue his career of criminality, even if the harm inflicted by the illegal search to the interests intended to be protected by the Fourth Amendment was slight in comparison to the harm to society of letting the defendant off scot free. . . . In the present case, we think there is no question that the search was illegal and there is no issue of qualified immunity–that is, no issue that somehow the fact that the officers did not have a right to enter Guzman's apartment was not clearly established. So a civil case vindicates Guzman's Fourth Amendment rights. There was no contraband found and therefore no criminal case. But one might wonder whether Ms. Guzman's Fourth Amendment rights would have been vindicated if the officers had found the dead body of a child in the apartment and the case was referred to Cook County circuit court for prosecution. Would the exclusionary rule have been invoked? Or would the officers have been found to be acting in good-faith reliance on the warrant? Or would the temptation be great to find that some other exceptions to suppression should be invoked? Finding that the execution of the search of the apartment was illegal, we will also reinstate Ms. Guzman's false arrest claim.")

Guzman v. City of Chicago, 565 F.3d 393, 399, 400 (7th Cir. 2009) (Rovner, J., concurring) ("I concur in the holding and the reasoning of the majority's thorough opinion, but I cannot concur in the substantial dicta devoted to attacking the exclusionary rule. This is a civil case; nothing incriminating was discovered during this illegal search, and no criminal charges ensued. There is thus nothing to exclude. The continued vitality of the exclusionary rule is a matter solely for the Supreme Court to consider. It is a far-reaching issue that would benefit from full argument, and should not be blithely dismissed absent that full presentation. Because it is not our province to comment on issues not before the court, I do not join that part of the majority's opinion.")

Marion v. City of Corydon, Indiana, 559 F.3d 700, 705, 706 (7th Cir. 2009) ("In this case, the government seizure occurred in the highway median, when law enforcement officers finally terminated Marion's freedom of movement. While evidence demonstrates that throughout the chase Marion had very little regard for the safety of officers or innocent bystanders, we limit our analysis to whether Marion posed a serious danger to officers or innocent bystanders once he was in the median. The evidence clearly demonstrates that, once in the median, Marion attempted to regain traction and drive toward the eastbound lanes of the highway, where many innocent bystanders were present. There is no question that he would have run over officers to reach the eastbound lanes and continue his flight eastbound, if he had the capability to do so. The key question, though, is whether it was objectively reasonable for officers to conclude that Marion posed an actual threat to officers or innocent bystanders once he reached the median. Marion claims that his vehicle was stuck in the mud, had three flat tires, was overheating, and that an objectively reasonable officer in the same circumstances as defendants would conclude that he did not pose a danger to anyone at that time. Despite Marion's contentions, it was reasonable for the officers to determine that he did actually pose a threat to the safety of officers and of innocent bystanders. While three of Marion's tires were flat, he had been able to travel on three flat tires at fairly high speeds for a significant stretch of time. Even after he entered the median and officers on foot surrounded his vehicle, the video evidence shows that Marion's vehicle continued to move forward significantly. Later, after he revved his engine, he was able to drive the vehicle backward as well. A reasonable officer would have concluded that, absent police intervention, Marion had the capability to run over officers and/or to reach the eastbound lanes of the highway. Moreover, a reasonable officer would have determined that, if he did reach the eastbound lanes, there was a significant possibility that Marion would have rammed one or more bystander's vehicles or caused an accident between bystanders' vehicles, posing a substantial risk of serious injury or loss of life. We conclude that, under the totality of the circumstances, it was reasonable for the officers to think that Marion seriously endangered officers and innocent bystanders, and it was reasonable for the officers to discharge their firearms in Marion's direction to stop him. Thus, there was no Fourth Amendment violation. Because there was no deprivation of a constitutional right in this case, the police officers are immune from liability.")

Viilo v. Eyre, 547 F.3d 707, 710 (7th Cir. 2008) ("While Brown and Hells Angels clearly establish that it is unreasonable for officers to kill a person's pet unnecessarily, these decisions are not essential to reaching this conclusion. . . In 2001, we held that domestic animals are 'effects' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . The Siebert decision is enough to give police officers reasonable notice that unnecessarily killing a person's pet offends the Fourth Amendment.").

Holmes v. Village of Hoffman Estate, 511 F.3d 673, 687 (7th Cir. 2007) ("At the time of Holmes's arrest, it was of course clearly established that a police officer may not use excessive force in arresting an individual. Teipel claims that he was not on notice that the types of force Holmes alleges he employed were impermissible under the circumstances. However, accepting as true Holmes's contention that he did not physically resist the officers, we cannot say that Teipel could have reasonably thought the types of gratuitous force Holmes has described were justified. No reasonable officer could have thought that it was permissible to slam Holmes's head against the car simply because his fellow officer deemed him a 'smart ass,' for example, nor could the officer have thought it proper to continually grind his knee into the face of an unresisting arrestee.")

Duran v. Sirgedas, 2007 WL 1259059, at *6, *14 *15 (7th Cir. May 1, 2007) (not published) ("[T]he reasonableness of directing and holding partygoers inside the house is not the issue; rather, the issue is whether, in seizing the plaintiffs inside the house, Officers DeCianni and Peslak used excessive force by spraying pepper spray into the house. . . . Assaulting citizens who are safely detained without any provocation violates clearly established constitutional principles. . . . [U]nlike the plaintiffs inside the house, these plaintiffs [standing in yard] were not 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, their claim is analyzed under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Conduct that violates the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process must be so arbitrary that it 'shocks the conscience.' . . . In this case, the facts as set forth by the district court were that Sergeant Krummick and Officer DeCianni sprayed pepper spray at Amada Duran and her children, and Officer DeCianni also used excessive force by spraying Amada's niece, all while they were standing in the back yard. The district court did not find any evidence that these plaintiffs were refusing to follow a police order or were resisting arrest in any way. Nor did the district court conclude that the record evidence indicated that the officers were spraying pepper spray more broadly to disperse the crowd. Given these limited facts, we agree with the district court that a reasonable officer would know that spraying individuals (who allegedly were not resisting arrest, refusing to obey a lawful order to disperse, or otherwise interfering with official business) with pepper spray without justification could support a jury verdict based on the Fourteenth Amendment's 'shocks the conscience' standard, as it could be found to be 'conduct intended to injure in some way unjustifiable by any government interest.' Lewis, 523 U.S. at 840. Accordingly, based on the facts set forth by the district court, we conclude that at this stage Sergeant Krummick and Officer DeCianni were not entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.").

Sallenger v. Oakes, 473 F.3d 731, 741, 742 (7th Cir. 2007) ("The officers argue that the use of the hobble was not clearly established as unconstitutional since there are no cases from this circuit which have called the use of hobbles into question. Moreover, the defendants cite authority from our sister circuits holding that the use of a hobble was not clearly established as constitutionally infirm so as to deny police officers qualified immunity. See, e.g ., Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274 (11th Cir.2004); Cruz v. City of Laramie, 239 F.3d 1183 (10th Cir.2001). Although the cases relied on by the defendants do suggest that the mere use of a hobble was not clearly established as constitutionally suspect, this does not speak to the totality of circumstances surrounding the use of the hobble on Andrew. Here, the alleged excessive force does not solely, or perhaps even primarily, involve the use of the hobble. Rather, here, the officers repeatedly struck Andrew with closed-fist blows and blows with a flashlight after he was handcuffed; they continued to strike him after he had stopped moving and placed him in a hobble; and, they failed to put him immediately on his side after they hobbled him. The question is not whether Andrew's right to be free from the officers' use of the hobble was clearly established; rather, the issue is whether Andrew's right to be free from the whole range of excessive force as described by the district court was clearly established. In the first part of our inquiry, we determined that the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable. We further conclude that Andrew's right to be free from the excessive force inflicted on him by the officers was 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable officer would have known that administering closed-fist punches and flashlight blows, including ones to the head, after the arrestee was handcuffed, continuing to strike him after he had stopped resisting arrest and failing to place him in the proper position after hobbling him violated the individual's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force.").

Graham v. Hildebrand, No. 06-2169, 2006 WL 3102351, at *4, *5 (7th Cir. Oct. 26, 2006) (not published) ("Although we have not specifically addressed a qualified immunity defense in a case involving the use of pepper spray, other circuits have found an officer's use of pepper spray reasonable when the individual sprayed was either resisting arrest or refusing reasonable police requests. [citing cases] Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Grahams, they were not resisting arrest or otherwise interfering with the officers at the point when they were shot with pepper spray. And while they were not entirely 'passive' or 'incapacitated'–they were pushing other persons in the crowd– Officer Bennett has never asserted that he dispersed the pepper spray to stop them from fighting with others rather than because they were resisting him. Morever, by the Grahams' account, Bennett never gave them an opportunity to comply peacefully with his orders; he simply shot pepper spray without warning at the targets of an angry and potentially violent mob–the precise individuals, if the Grahams are telling the truth, that he should have been protecting. Because a jury could find that a reasonable officer in Bennett's position would have known, under the Grahams' version of events, that dispersing pepper spray in their faces was an excessive use of force, we vacate the grant of summary judgment on the excessive-force claim as to Bennett.").

Jones v. Wilhelm, 425 F.3d 455, 463-65 (7th Cir. 2005) ("By his own admission, . . . Wilhelm knew before he executed the warrant that the phrase 'upstairs apartment on the right' would lead him to a different apartment depending on which staircase taken. Where a warrant is open to more than one interpretation, the warrant is ambiguous and invalid on its face and, therefore, cannot be legally executed by a person who knows the warrant to be ambiguous. . . We must emphasize that the Joneses' clearly-established rights were not violated because the warrant turned out to be ambiguous. Rather, the Joneses' rights were violated because Wilhelm knew the warrant did not particularly describe the place to be searched based on his prior surveillance of the building. . . Wilhelm recognized the warrant as ambiguous before the execution of the warrant, but failed to immediately stop execution and seek the necessary clarification of a warrant in order to make certain the warrant particularly described the place to be search as called for by the Fourth Amendment. . . . Wilhelm had prior knowledge of the building's layout before executing the warrant. As a result, he does not qualify for any good-faith exception. Where an officer executing a warrant knows or should have known that a warrant, which was valid when issued, now lacks the necessary particularity, then that officer cannot legally execute the warrant. . .Furthermore, if an officer obtains information while executing a warrant that puts him on notice of a risk that he could be targeting the wrong location, then the officer must terminate his search. . . . For all the reasons discussed, we find that the undisputed facts of this case establish that Wilhelm's actions violated the Joneses' clearly established rights because he (1) executed a validly issued warrant he knew to be facially ambiguous prior to the execution of the warrant; and (2) circumvented the magistrate judge and resolved the warrant's ambiguity based on information he should have disclosed to the magistrate who issued the warrant. Since Wilhelm's undisputed actions represent a violation of clearly-established, constitutional rights, we find that Wilhelm enjoys no qualified immunity as to the Joneses' warrant claim.").

Abdullahi v. City of Madison, 423 F.3d 763, 774, 775 (7th Cir. 2005) ("As a last-ditch effort to win the day, defendants argue (in just three pages of their appellate brief) that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here the plaintiff has certainly alleged violation of a valid constitutional right–if defendant Brooks applied deadly force to Mohamed while he was lying prone on the ground with his arms behind him, this would violate Mohamed's Fourth Amendment rights, as would an unjustifiable failure by the other officers to intervene. However, whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that Brooks' actions constituted unreasonable force under the circumstances–thus triggering the duty to intervene–is obviously a more difficult question. Presumably, if it would have been apparent to the other officers, just by watching, that Brooks was applying potentially deadly pressure to Mohamed while he was lying prone, then the officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Again, no one contends that deadly force was warranted in this case. However, it may have been difficult to tell how much force Brooks was applying, and at least one or two of the officers (those attempting to restrain Mohamed's legs) had their back to Brooks during the encounter. Additionally, this Court's 1997 decision in Estate of Phillips ruled that a similar takedown–during which one officer put a knee in Phillips' back for about one minute–was not unreasonable under the circumstances. . . However, since the very nature of Brooks' conduct remains undetermined, one can only speculate as to how visually obvious any violation of Mohammed's rights might have been. In other words, without knowing what Brooks did or how his conduct appeared to onlookers, it would be difficult to say that, as a matter of law, a reasonable officer could not have known that Brooks' conduct violated Mohamed's constitutional rights. A jury should decide whether Brooks' actions would have made it clear to a reasonable officer that intervention was warranted, and, if so, whether Grady, Mueller and Murphy had a realistic opportunity to intervene.").

Green v. Butler, 420 F.3d 689, 701(7th Cir. 2005) ("[A]t the time of the incident at issue here, a reasonable agent would have known that a critical component of a reasonable entry under the Fourth Amendment was the knock and announce requirement. There was no reason for an agent to believe, under these facts, that dispensing with the requirement was justified by any exigency or futility. Nor was there any basis for a belief that the parolee's consent to search justified dispensing entirely with the knock and announce rule. Indeed, when an officer enters a home without knocking and announcing his identity and purpose, and without a manifest exigency or demonstration that compliance would be futile, the Fourth Amendment violation 'is so obvious that a reasonable state actor would know that what he is doing violates the Constitution.'").

Hosty v. Carter, 412 F.3d 731, 738, 739 (7th Cir. 2005) ("The district court held that any reasonable college administrator should have known that (a) the approach of Hazelwood does not apply to colleges; and (b) only speech that is part of the curriculum is subject to supervision. We have held that neither of these propositions is correct–that Hazelwood's framework is generally applicable and depends in large measure on the operation of public-forum analysis rather than the distinction between curricular and extracurricular activities. But even if student newspapers at high schools and colleges operate under different constitutional frameworks, as both the district judge and our panel thought, it greatly overstates the certainty of the law to say that any reasonable college administrator had to know that rule. . . . Many aspects of the law with respect to students' speech, not only the role of age, are difficult to understand and apply . . . . 'Qualified immunity shields an official from suit when she makes a decision that, even if constitutionally deficient, reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances she confronted.' Brosseau, 125 S.Ct. at 599. That description is as apt here as it was in Brosseau. Public officials need not predict, at their financial peril, how constitutional uncertainties will be resolved. Disputes about both law and fact make it inappropriate to say that any reasonable person in Dean Carter's position in November 2000 had to know that the demand for review before the University would pay the Innovator's printing bills violated the first amendment. She therefore is entitled to qualified immunity from liability in damages.").

Does v. Kane County, No. 17 C 3944, 2018 WL 1744672, at *6-7 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 11, 2018) ("Defendants argue that 'no controlling case would have told Loomis that he could not unshackle Salters so that Salters could use the bathroom.'. . Specifically, Defendant Loomis asserts that '[r]esearch has not revealed a case "analogous" to this one, where a guard unshackled an inmate so that the inmate could use the toilet, the inmate then overpowered the guard, and then the inmate committed more violent crimes.'. . Although courts should not define clearly established law at a high level of generality. . . '[t]his requirement does not mean that a plaintiff must be able to point to a case "on all fours" with the defendant officer's alleged misconduct.'. . Instead, 'there must be settled authority that would cause him to understand the illegality of the action.'. . Therefore, Plaintiffs need not point to an analogous case where 'a guard unshackled an inmate so that the inmate could use the toilet, the inmate then overpowered the guard, and then the inmate committed more violent crimes' to survive Defendants' motions to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . .Plaintiffs' allegations and all reasonable inferences indicate that Defendant Loomis was aware of Salters' violent propensities and the increased dangers to those nearby if Defendant Loomis lost control of Salters. Had Defendant Loomis not lost control of Salters, Jane Does I and II would not have been held hostage at gunpoint and brutalized and the other Plaintiffs would not have been terrorized by Salters wreaking havoc at the hospital causing a hostage situation and resultant police standoff. Based on White, Reed, Monfils, and Paine, the law at the time of Defendant Loomis' alleged misconduct was sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand that his actions were unlawful. The Court therefore denies Defendants' motions to dismiss in this respect.")

McKnight v. Taylor, 210 F.Supp.3d 1069, 1074-75 & n.5 (S.D. Ind. 2016) ("The parties before us dispute whether McKnight was, in fact, holding a gun when he emerged onto the front porch of 403 Read Street. It turns out that he was not. He had the handset of a home telephone in his hand. But Officer Knight, Officer Taylor, Officer Montgomery, and Sergeant Hoover all reported to seeing a silver and black object approximately five to six inches long in McKnight's left hand at the time of their confrontation, and all reported thinking that the object was a medium-sized handgun. When the officers entered the residence following the shooting, they discovered McKnight's body lying near the entrance atop a silver and black phone matching the description of what the officers had believed to be a gun. The only gun located in the residence was found on the second story, near where McKnight had been shooting at the officers earlier during the incident. Defendant maintains that McKnight must have re-entered the home after being shot by Officer Taylor, traveled up the stairs to the second story where he dropped the gun, and then grabbed the silver and black telephone to make a call before falling on top of the phone and dying. Plaintiff, on the other hand, maintains that McKnight was holding the phone while on the porch and, after being shot by Officer Taylor, retreated into the home's first level where he collapsed and died. As Defendant recognizes, we must and do resolve this dispute in Plaintiff's favor as the non-moving party. However, our inquiry does not end here. The Seventh Circuit has affirmed the grant of summary judgment to an officer who shot a suspect under the reasonable belief that the suspect had a gun. See Henning v. O'Leary, 477 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 2007). Indeed, in Henning the Court found that two officers' reasonable belief that a suspect who was engaged in a struggle with them had gotten his hands on or near a gun gave them the requisite reasonable cause to use deadly force. . . The Court stated further that '[p]olice officers cannot be expected to wait until a resisting arrestee has a firm grip on a deadly weapon...before taking action to ensure their safety.'. .Thus, because our focus here is on the reasonableness of Officer Taylor's belief that McKnight possessed a gun on the porch, the issues surrounding McKnight's actual possession of it are immaterial. As fully explicated in our prior order denying summary judgment on Counts I and III, none of the circumstances of the standoff at 403 Read Street, apart from McKnight's putative possession of a gun, furnished grounds for the reasonable use of deadly force. We thus concluded that: Taylor's decision to shoot and kill McKnight was only within Fourth Amendment bounds if Taylor reasonably believed McKnight to have been armed—and thus an imminent threat to the responding officers. But McKnight was apparently unarmed, and we lack sufficient facts at this stage to determine whether Taylor's contrary belief was reasonable. . . . It is worth noting that despite our statement in our prior order that the absence of facts relevant to this determination created an 'issue of fact' preventing summary judgment, that phrasing may have been misleading; the objective reasonableness of force used by an officer in conducting a seizure remains a legal determination for the Court to resolve. Fitzgerald v. Santoro, 707 F.3d 725, 733 (7th Cir. 2013). . . . Based on the additional discovery and the second round of briefing performed by the parties focusing on this issue, we find, based on the totality of the circumstances known to Officer Taylor at the time of the shooting, he had the requisite reasonable cause to justify his use of deadly force.")

Flournoy v. Colbenson, No. 09 C 7159, 2014 WL 1477918 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 15, 2014) ("On these facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the Estate, the law points only in one direction: the use of the flash bang devices in this case was an unreasonable use of force to which qualified immunity does not apply. As discussed above, through the use of 'lucid and unambiguous' dicta, . . . we have repeatedly expressed our concern with the overuse of flash bang devices, especially where the circumstances do not warrant such extreme measures. This is because flash bang devices are essentially grenades and can be very dangerous and destructive. Despite the absence of a great deal of precedent in this area, the pertinent holdings and dicta do show a clear trend in the law that addresses the egregious circumstances of this case; even if the contours of the constitutional implications of the use of 'flash bang' devices in general is not clear, it is abundantly clear that this case arises in precisely the circumstances that this Court and other circuits have sought to avoid by providing detailed guidance on when the use of flash bang devices is (and is not) appropriate under the Constitution. . . If this were a borderline case, perhaps the relative paucity of judicial holdings forbidding the use of flash bang devices as compared to other more fully developed areas of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence would counsel in favor of a generous application of qualified immunity. However, on the facts of this case, the officers' conduct in the use of the flash bang devices so clearly exceeded the bounds of reasonableness in the circumstances that it cannot be said to lie near the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' along which qualified immunity shields officers from liability for their snap judgments, if those judgments prove to be wrong upon further reflection. Based on the pre-existing case law, it was clearly established as of July 19, 2005, that throwing a flash bang device blindly into an apartment where there are accelerants, without a fire extinguisher, and where the individual attempting to be seized is not an unusually dangerous individual, is not the subject of an arrest, and has not threatened to harm anyone but himself, is an unreasonable use of force. Therefore, taking the facts as presented to us from the district court, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity and the issue of the officers' decisions must be presented to a jury.") [See also Flournoy v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 869 (7th Cir. 2016) (evidence supported jury's finding that police officer did not use excessive force when he deployed flashbang grenade)]

Brown v. Blanchard, 31 F.Supp.3d 1003, 1012 (E.D. Wis. 2014) ("In the present case, I have identified two different factual scenarios under which Blanchard could be deemed to have unreasonably seized Brown: (1) using deadly force against Brown without probable cause to believe that Brown was threatening the deputies with serious physical harm; and (2) unreasonably creating the encounter that led to Brown's threatening the deputies with serious physical harm. Under the first factual scenario, Blanchard is not entitled to qualified immunity because it is clearly established that an officer may not use deadly force to seize a subject who is not threatening the safety of the officer or anyone else. . . Under the second factual scenario, Blanchard is not entitled to qualified immunity because it is clearly established that an officer who shoots a suspect in an effort to protect himself cannot escape liability if the danger he faced was created by his own unreasonable conduct. . . Although no case precisely identifies Blanchard's conduct in the second scenario as the kind of 'unreasonable conduct' that creates a dangerous situation, I conclude that it would have been obvious to a reasonable officer in Blanchard's position that his or her course of conduct was unlawful despite the absence of a case saying as much. . . My conclusion is based on the obvious unreasonableness of Blanchard's conduct: in light of Such's observations of Brown through the bedroom window, there was no reason for Blanchard to immediately enter the room with his gun drawn and create a situation calling for the need to use deadly force. A specific case identifying this conduct as unreasonable is not needed to give the officer fair notice that the conduct is unlawful. Accordingly, Blanchard is not entitled to summary judgment.")

Washington v. Matson, No. 12–C–33, 2013 WL 203988, at *2 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 17, 2013) ("The officer does not need to have one-hundred percent certainty that the suspect intends to harm him; under such circumstances, he is entitled to place his own safety first if there is even a reasonable chance that a suspect could be dangerous. It should be remembered that a Taser is an alternative to the use of deadly force, and in fact Tasers and other types of stun guns often save suspects' lives by allowing the officers an alternative to their firearm. There is no suggestion that the Taser was used for anything other than to secure Washington's arrest by temporarily stunning him and to thwart a potential threat to the officer himself. In circumstances like those on the night in question, the officer does not need to give the suspect the benefit of the doubt. Here, Washington has not disputed the essential elements underlying the officer's claim that his use of non-deadly force was reasonable.")

Overton v. Hicks, No. 1:06-cv-1513-DFH-JMS, 2008 WL 2518229, at *6, *7 (S.D. Ind. June 17, 2008) ("Defendants are entitled to summary judgment for the use of the dog and the taser while Overton was in his car after warning him to comply. Those actions were objectively reasonable responses to a driver who was revving the engine of a car surrounded by police. Officer Hicks reported that Overton continued to rev the car's engine even after the dog bit him. . . Moving cars can be deadly weapons, warranting use of deadly force under certain circumstances. . . . There is no indication that deadly force would have been reasonable here, particularly given Officer Parker's testimony that he did not believe that Overton could have dislodged his car from the curb. . . But some force was warranted to prevent an attempt to escape, including the reasonable use of a police dog and a taser. . . . This finding of reasonableness is based only on the undisputed evidence that Overton was revving his car's engine and fumbling with the steering column-before the officers had any indication that Overton might have been in diabetic shock. Had Overton merely been passively resisting the officers' commands to get out of the car and show his hands, their use of a dog and a taser would have presented a closer question. . . . Perhaps the officers violated the department's policy by not using an arm-lock or other less intrusive method, but the court's inquiry under the Fourth Amendment is whether the force used was reasonable under the circumstances, not whether it was the least forceful means possible.").

Estate of Fields v. Nawotka, No. 03-CV-1450, 2008 WL 746704, at *6, *7 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 18, 2008) ("Under the plaintiffs' version of the facts which this court must credit, Nawotka was never in the direct path of Justin's vehicle, Nawotka fired his weapon as the vehicle was already traveling away from him, the vehicle was driving away at low speeds, and the vehicle was significantly damaged and had a flat tire. Under the plaintiffs' version of the facts, nobody in the immediate vicinity was in imminent danger of death or serious bodily injury when Nawotka fired his weapon. Under these facts and in light of clearly established law, a reasonable officer in Nawotka's position would not have believed that exercising deadly force was lawful. . . . Also, unlike the officers in Scott [v. Edinberg, 346 F.3d 752, 755 (7th Cir.2003)] and Brosseau, Nawotka does not claim that there were bystanders in the immediate vicinity that faced death or serious bodily injury at the time that he fired his weapon, and the record in this case does not reveal that anybody was in the vicinity of the vehicle's path when Nawotka fired his weapon. . . Moreover, when Nawotka fired his weapon, Justin's vehicle was badly damaged, traveling slowly, and had a flat tire. Even if there were people standing in the vicinity of the vehicle's path, a reasonable officer may not have concluded that they were in imminent danger.").

Montgomery v. Morgan County, No. 1:06-cv-0915-RLY-TAB, 2008 WL 596068, at *9, *11(S.D. Ind. Feb. 29, 2008) ("Plaintiff contends that the 'totality of circumstances' measurement would encompass the decision of the deputies to force their way into the house with tasers and a gun drawn, despite the fact that they testified in deposition that before they entered the house they were in no fear of imminent danger. Defendants want the court to focus on the situation that existed when Hoffman fired his gun. As much as Plaintiff would like the question to be whether it was a good choice to enter the home, the answer to that question provides no basis for holding any of the officers liable. Even under a due process analysis, neither negligence nor gross negligence suffice to support liability under § 1983. . . . In short, it was constitutionally permissible for the deputies to go into the house and attempt to execute on the order of apprehension. Once they entered and Montgomery became hostile, attacking an officer in a manner that could inflict serious bodily harm, there is no doubt that it was reasonable for Hoffman to use his gun to stop Montgomery from swinging the pipe at Beaver. This is especially true in light of the deputies' efforts to first use less than lethal force, the Tasers, to subdue him. It would have been better for all if Worth or Beaver had successfully utilized the Tasers, but their efforts were stymied by Montgomery's own violence and no liability is created by an inaccurate Taser shot.")

Duran v. Town of Cicero, No. 01 C 6858, 2005 WL 2563023, at *12 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 7, 2005) ("First, we are analyzing plaintiffs' claim under the Fourth Amendment, not the Fourteenth, so defendants' conduct is evaluated for objective reasonableness. Moreover, defendants' framing of the 'clearly established law' inquiry is much too narrow. . . .At the time of the events in this case, it was clearly established that 'police officers do not have the right to shove, push, or otherwise assault innocent citizens without any provocation whatsoever.'. .Pepper-spraying is a type of 'assault.' A clearly-established constitutional right can be demonstrated not only by pointing to a closely analogous case that established a right to be free from the type of force the police officers used on plaintiffs, but also by 'showing that the force was so plainly excessive that, as an objective matter, the police officers would have been on notice that they were violating the Fourth Amendment.' . . Here, the facts could support a finding that defendants used plainly excessive force by assaulting plaintiffs with pepper spray without justification (when those plaintiffs were confined in the house and not provoking the officers). Under the facts, there was no reason for the officers to believe that spraying into the house was justified. We therefore conclude that Officers DeCianni and Peslak are not shielded by qualified immunity from the Group I plaintiffs' claim of excessive force in spraying into the Durans' house.").

DeSalvo v. City of Collinsville, No. 04-CV-0718-MJR, 2005 WL 2487829, at *4, *5 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 7, 2005) (not reported) ("Krug does argue, however, that a citizen's right to be free from being tased is not a clearly established right, in that there is no clearly analogous case specifically establishing a right to be free from tasing. While this may or may not be the case, this Court finds that Krug's argument implicitly asserts a definition of DeSalvo's right that exceeds the appropriate level of specificity. . . DeSalvo's right in this case, defined at an appropriate level of specificity, poses to the Court a broader question: does a restrained person have a right to be free from a significantly violent level of force if he is, while perhaps not fully compliant with an officer's orders, acting in an otherwise peaceable manner? In answering this question, the Court finds the fact that Krug used a taser to inflict pain upon DeSalvo, rather than some other weapon, is of diminished importance. A taser is capable of inflicting a great deal of pain upon a person–shocking, burning, and even rendering numb its target–and is, in this sense, little different than a nightstick, mace, or any other weapon that a police officer might use against an adversary. A reasonable officer in the situation Krug confronted would have known that it would be unlawful to deliver a swift blow with a night stick to the back of DeSalvo's neck as he stood handcuffed at the rear of the squad car. A reasonable officer would also have known that spraying mace in the face of DeSalvo under the circumstances would be unlawful. So too, then, this Court finds, a reasonable officer in Krug's position would have known that it would be unlawful to tase DeSalvo under the circumstances of this case. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the rights of DeSalvo that Krug allegedly violated were 'clearly established' at the time of DeSalvo's arrest. Therefore, the Court rejects Krug's qualified immunity argument.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Lankford v. City of Plumerville, Arkansas, 42 F.4th 918, 923-24 (8th Cir. 2022) ("This case is not like Hawkins. In Hawkins, a police officer drove out of a median and allegedly sideswiped a motorcyclist who was not fleeing from police officers and who testified that he did not suspect the police officer was coming out from the median to stop him until the police cruiser struck his motorcycle. . . Here, Lankford was fleeing from police officers at over 100 miles per hour and was in no way unsuspecting. Duvall parked his SUV across the road—not in a median like in Hawkins—giving Lankford an opportunity to see the SUV and avoid or mitigate the collision. Then, Duvall purportedly made a split-second decision to cut off Lankford when Lankford attempted to evade Duvall's SUV at dangerously high speeds. Viewing the totality of these circumstances, we conclude this case is more like the cases in which a police officer was justified in ending a dangerous, high-speed chase. . . Finally, we address perhaps Lankford's strongest evidence of unreasonableness—Morrilton police officers' testimony that Duvall's roadblock would only be appropriate in a deadly force situation and that Lankford's flight was not a deadly force situation. We assess the reasonableness of deadly force for Fourth Amendment purposes from the seizing officer's perspective at the time of the incident. . . The testifying Morrilton police officers were able to review dashcam footage and make a calculated, post hoc analysis. Duvall, on the other hand, made a quick decision based on information he received that a high-speed chase was coming toward his town and that Morrilton police officers were requesting a roadblock. . .

.We appreciate the Morrilton police officers' testimony that deadly force was unnecessary in the given situation. But based on Duvall's knowledge at the time when he was forced make a quick judgment, we conclude the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard gave Duvall more leeway than would have the Morrilton police officers.")

McElree v. City of Cedar Rapids, 983 F.3d 1009, 1017-18 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The family advances two primary arguments as to why it was unreasonable for the officers to shoot Gossman. They first emphasize that Garringer mistakenly believed Gossman fired his gun. They also argue the officers should have warned Gossman before firing. Neither argument has merit considering the totality of the circumstances. First, we need not resolve whether Garringer's mistaken belief was reasonable here since deadly force was authorized because Gossman pulled a gun and thus the officers were 'faced with an apparently loaded weapon.'. . Second, Gossman's family is correct that a warning should be given if it is feasible. . . But where the decision to shoot must be made in a 'split-second,' as here, it is reasonable to forgo a warning. . . In light of the above, we hold the use of deadly force did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Liggins v. Cohen, 971 F.3d 798, 800-802 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The district court thought there were genuine disputes of fact about whether a reasonable officer in Cohen's position 'would have perceived' that B.C. was running toward the officer before he fired and whether it was feasible for the officer to give a warning before shooting. The implication is that if Cohen reasonably perceived that B.C. was running toward him, and a warning was not feasible, then it may have been reasonable to discharge the firearm. We agree that these are important questions, but they are not questions of fact for a jury. Once the court has assumed a particular set of facts about where and how B.C. was running in relation to Cohen's position, whether B.C.'s actions rose to a level warranting Cohen's use of force is a question of law for the court, not a question of fact. Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007). The undisputed facts are that B.C. had run through the breezeway to the back of the building. The evidence shows that he was positioned to the right of the sidewalk that led straight out from the breezeway, and was moving toward the back of the property. Cohen was to the left of the sidewalk in the parking lot. But Cohen was still in front of B.C. at an acute angle to the left, so B.C. was running in Cohen's general direction, even if not directly at him. B.C. was carrying in his right hand a gun that moved while he ran. The officers were investigating a report of a stolen firearm, and B.C. was fleeing from police who had arrived at the front of the building. Under those circumstances, we conclude that a reasonable officer was justified in discharging his firearm. With only a second or two to react as he rounded the parked truck, Cohen had reasonable grounds to believe that the fleeing subject who was running toward the back of the property could raise the gun and shoot. It would take only an instant to do so if the person were ready to fire. The young man was fleeing with gun in hand, and the officers presented an obstacle to his escape. This was a split-second decision for the officer. It was not practical in that moment for Cohen to discern whether B.C. was carrying the gun in an unusual manner or to shout a warning and wait for him to react. There was simply no time. 'When the hesitation involved in giving a warning could readily cause such a warning to be the officer's last, then a warning is not feasible.'. . In dangerous situations where an officer has reasonable grounds to believe that there is an imminent threat of serious harm, the officer may be justified in using a firearm before a subject actually points a weapon at the officer or others. . . Given the convergence of events, it was not unreasonable for the officer to use force as he did. We do not accept the appellees' suggestion that Cohen acted unreasonably because he created the danger. It is true that the officers anticipated that a subject might flee to the rear of the building if he encountered police in the front. But police officers investigating a stolen firearm reasonably may position themselves in a way that facilitates apprehension of a suspect. If, as B.C. asserts, he took the stolen gun from his brother with the intention of returning it to the owner, then the outcome is all the more tragic. But B.C. chose to remove the firearm from the bag and flee, rather than carry it away in the bag, stay put and say nothing, or surrender the firearm to police with an explanation. The officer had no way to know B.C.'s subjective intentions, and our analysis must consider only what a reasonable officer on the scene would have perceived. . . The appellees also suggest that the crime under investigation was not serious, but it involved a dangerous weapon, and it is well known that stolen firearms 'are used disproportionately in the commission of crimes.'. .This situation is not comparable to Nance v. Sammis, 586 F.3d 604 (8th Cir. 2009), which held it unreasonable for officers, without identifying themselves as police, to shoot without warning a twelve-year-old boy who had a toy gun tucked into his waistband while he was trying to comply with an order to get on the ground. Nor is it like Craighead v. Lee, 399 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2005), where a police officer encountered an assault victim struggling with a perpetrator over a gun that was pointed in the air, and without warning fired a shotgun blast that killed the innocent victim. Also distinguishable is Wealot v. Brooks, 865 F.3d 1119 (8th Cir. 2017), where police allegedly shot a man who was unarmed and turning around with his hands up to surrender. The confluence of circumstances here—the stolen firearm, the fleeing suspect with a gun moving in his hand, and the need for an officer at an acute angle in front of the subject to make an instant decision about using force—does not match any of our prior decisions. Allowing, as we must, 'for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments ... in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving,'. . . we conclude that the force used in this particular situation was not unconstitutional.")

Birkeland as Trustee for Birkeland v. Jorgensen, 971 F.3d 787, 791-92 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Regardless of whether Birkeland's movement toward the officers was voluntary, in light of the close proximity between the officers and Birkeland's location in the closet, Birkeland's failure to comply with Officer Jorgensen's commands to drop the knife, and Birkeland's stabbing of the police dog in the face with a knife, Birkeland posed a threat of serious physical harm to the officers and we cannot say that their 'use of deadly force, even if just over the line of reasonableness, violated a clearly established right.'. . The district court erred in denying the officers qualified immunity on the deadly force claim.")

Birkeland as Trustee for Birkeland v. Jorgensen, 971 F.3d 787, 792-93 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The court concludes the defendant officers did not violate Birkeland's clearly established rights when they shot and killed him in his home after they arrived for a welfare check. Because I believe questions of fact preclude our drawing this conclusion, I respectfully dissent. . . The officers argue they reasonably feared for their safety after Birkeland stabbed Otis, the police K9. 'The "reasonableness" of a particular use of force must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.'. . There is 'extensive case law setting forth the requirement that an officer must have probable cause to believe the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm before using deadly force.'. . We view the facts in the light most favorable to the Trustee. . . When Jorgensen slid open the closet door, he saw Birkeland crouched on the ground. The closet was full of clothes, boxes, and other belongings. Birkeland did not come out of the closet when ordered, and Jorgensen saw him move his hand behind his back. Jorgensen said he was concerned that Birkeland might be reaching for a weapon. Jorgensen then sent Otis 'to make a physical apprehension,' in other words, 'to bite.' Otis bit Birkeland: the autopsy shows Birkeland suffered a wound deep enough to expose the bone. In response, Birkeland stabbed Otis with a knife. Jorgensen looked at Otis and saw no visible injuries. Jorgensen yelled at Birkeland to 'let go' or 'put down' the knife. As the court acknowledges, '[t]he parties dispute, and the video does not show, whether Birkeland [then] started to come out of the closet on his own accord or because he was being pulled out by Otis.'. . The district court found that Otis was between the officers and Birkeland when the officers fired their shots. Eckert testified that he only fired one shot in part because he did not want to hit Otis. These facts present a jury question as to whether the officers' stated fear for their safety was reasonable. Because 'the parties dispute, and the video does not show' crucial moments before the officers killed Birkeland, a jury must determine the facts and weigh the officers' credibility. Birkeland was not suspected of a crime and had made no effort to actively resist arrest or flee the apartment; in fact, he had closed himself in his closet with no other exit. . . Although Birkeland had a knife, he was crouched in a closet and separated from the officers by a re-engaging police dog. A reasonable jury could question whether it was reasonable for an officer at the scene to believe 'the totality of the circumstances justifie[d]' shooting and killing Birkeland in his closet. . . I agree with the district court that 'fact issues preclude a determination that, as a matter of law, the use of deadly force was reasonable' and so I respectfully dissent.") Kong v. City of Burnsville, 960 F.3d 985, 992-95 (8th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2839 (2021) ("Two years after Kong's 2016 shooting, the Supreme Court held that its case law did not clearly establish that officers acted unreasonably by shooting a woman who stood calmly with a kitchen knife by her side six feet from a bystander. . . Although the Burnsville defendants could not rely on Kisela for guidance, the Court's analysis of its own pre-2016 precedent is instructive. Like Kong, the woman shot in Kisela was not suspected of any felony, and police responded to a report she was 'acting erratically' with a knife. . . During the encounter, she did not raise the knife toward the police or others. . . Like Kong, she did not acknowledge the officers' presence or obey their commands to drop the knife. . . Holding that Kisela was 'far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting' the woman would violate her rights, the Court relied only on cases decided before March 2016, when Kong was shot. . . The Court also held that case law of the relevant circuit did not clearly establish the right. . . . Similarly, this court's case law at the time of Kong's shooting did not place the question of his right beyond debate. The Trustee argues the officers should have known that shooting Kong was an unreasonable seizure under the Ludwig case. See Ludwig v. Anderson, 54 F.3d 465, 473 (8th Cir. 1995) (denying qualified immunity to officers who fatally shot Ludwig as he fled with a knife). Ludwig may have been running away from bystanders when shot, with the nearest bystander 150 feet away. . . This court also assumed Ludwig did not physically threaten a police officer. . . . Shot at a distance when posing no threat to officers or citizens, Ludwig was like the unarmed man shot in Harris, which the Supreme Court rejected as distinct from the woman in Kisela standing calmly with a knife near a bystander. . . In contrast to Ludwig, Kong ran toward bystanders, including a woman driving only 30 feet away. . . Other cars were parked in the McDonald's lot, with at least one pedestrian visible among them on the body-camera footage. The steady flow of vehicles through the parking lot meant that citizens might quickly approach or step out of their vehicles. And, a few cars passed by along on the frontage road, only 100 feet away, with steady traffic on the highway beyond. . . While pointing their handguns at Kong's car, the officers continually warned each other about "crossfire" hitting an officer or citizen, in or out of a vehicle, by firing at the wrong angle. If the officers waited, a car might block their line of fire or bystanders get too close for them to fire. In fact, a bullet that missed Kong lodged in the bumper of a vehicle pulling out of the parking lot 30 feet away. . . When Kong began running through the occupied parking lot, toward the frontage road and highway, the officers 'were forced to make a split-second judgment in circumstances that were tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. . Although Kong may not have threatened an officer with his knife, he posed a threat to citizens. This situation differs from Ludwig, where this court did not mention nearby traffic or 'citizens who might be in the area' and endangered by crossfire. . . A reasonable officer could miss the connection between the situation confronting officers in Ludwig in the woods and the situation with Kong in the McDonald's parking lot. Cases decided by this court after Ludwig make clear that, at the time of Kong's shooting, officers could use deadly force to stop a person armed with a bladed weapon if they reasonably believed the person could kill or seriously injure others. . . . Even if the officers caused Kong to leave his car by confronting him, they would reasonably believe the law allowed them to shoot him if he posed an immediate and significant threat. Even if officers 'created the need to use' deadly force by trying to disarm a mentally ill person, the reasonableness of force depends on the threat the person poses during the shooting. . . . Based on Schulz, Hayek, and Hassan, a reasonable officer would have believed the law permitted shooting Kong. Like the officers in Schulz and Hayek, the Burnsville officers tried to disarm Kong to prevent him from causing harm, even if he initially posed no immediate threat to others. . . When Kong left his car, the threat he posed justified lethal force, even if officers caused him to leave his car. . . Like the man in Hassan, Kong's unpredictable behavior with his weapon made him dangerous even if he had not yet harmed anyone. . . Just as in Hassan, repeated commands and tasing did not cause Kong to drop his knife. . . The encounter occurred in a McDonald's parking lot with citizens in the vicinity, like the strip mall parking lot in Hassan. . . While Hassan involved pedestrians, the McDonald's parking lot had at least one pedestrian and several citizens in cars. . . .Existing precedent of the Supreme Court and this circuit did not provide fair warning to the Burnsville officers that shooting Kong under these circumstances was unreasonable. The district court erred in denying the officers qualified immunity.")

Kong v. City of Burnsville, 960 F.3d 985, 997-1000 (8th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2839 (2021) (Kelly, J., dissenting) ("In my view, the district court correctly denied defendants' motion for summary judgment after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Trustee and deciding that a reasonable jury could find defendants violated Kong's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. . . . Kong was non-confrontational during the entire encounter. Indeed, he was running away from the officers and other pedestrians when he was shot. And while Kong carried a knife, a reasonable officer would have known he did not pose a significant and immediate threat to anyone else in the vicinity because those people were driving inside their cars. Kong was moving away from the officers and was unlikely to confront, much less harm, any other person. In sum, viewing the record in the light most favorable to the Trustee—as we must on summary judgment—a reasonable officer would not have believed Kong posed a significant and immediate threat of serious physical harm to the officers or the public. Thus, the use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances and amounted to excessive force. . . . Like the district court, I believe defendants violated Kong's clearly established right to be free from excessive force, as set out in Ludwig v. Anderson, 54 F.3d 465 (8th Cir. 1995). . . .The court today concludes that our decision in Ludwig did not fairly warn defendants that their actions violated the Constitution because, unlike Ludwig, 'Kong ran toward bystanders, including a woman driving only 30 feet away.'. . But officers shot Ludwig as he ran towards a street where the officers 'could see pedestrians.'. . While Ludwig might not have been running directly towards the pedestrians when he was shot, the officers feared he would 'attempt[ ] to get across the street, which he would then be in contact with other citizens,' who were between 50 and 150 feet away. . . Although 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality[,] it is not necessary ... that the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,' so long as precedent evinces 'a fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. . In my view, Ludwig clearly established that it is objectively unreasonable to use deadly force against a fleeing person who is likely experiencing a mental-health crisis and holding a knife if that person has not committed a violent felony, is moving away from officers, and does not pose a significant and immediate risk of serious harm. Because a reasonable jury could decide the officers violated this clearly established right when they shot Kong, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.")

See also Kong v. City of Burnsville, 966 F.3d 889, 890-91 (8th Cir. 2020), (Grasz, J., with whom Erickson, J., joins, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("I respectfully dissent from the court's refusal to rehear this case en banc. In my view, this case deserves reconsideration for three reasons. First and foremost, we must ensure the consistent application of settled precedent, particularly with respect to how we review denials of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. In such circumstances, we must accept the ' "district court's findings of fact to the extent they are not blatantly contradicted by the record," and if the district court fails to make a finding necessary for our legal review, "we determine what facts the district court, in nonmoving party, likely assumed."'. . I do not believe this standard was properly applied here. The panel distinguished this case from Ludwig v. Anderson . . . by claiming Mr. Kong 'posed a threat to citizens.'. . From where was this fact derived? Not from the district court, which found 'a genuine dispute of material fact ... as to whether Mr. Kong posed a significant and immediate threat of serious injury or death to the surrounding public.'. . Did the record blatantly contradict the district court's finding? The opinion does not say, though the evidence of Mr. Kong's frightened flight 'away from pedestrians and the officers' cuts against such a conclusion. . . And as Judge Kelly pointed out in her dissent, a jury could presumably reject as unreasonable the officers' belief that Mr. Kong posed such a threat. . . The court should reexamine this case to prevent the steady erosion of our summary judgment standard. Second, we ought to rehear this case to further consider what constitutes an 'immediate threat.' Has the panel opinion broadened 'immediate threat' to include all situations in which someone flees with a knife when occupied vehicles are in the general vicinity? Answering this question seems important, given the similar facts in Ludwig, in which we denied qualified immunity to officers who shot a man as he fled with a knife. . . It is hard to justify expanding our definition of 'immediate threat' in a situation where our analysis directly turns on how we have resolved prior, similar cases (e.g., when determining whether a right has been 'clearly established'). . . Finally, the en banc court should address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. That is, we should determine whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they shot the fleeing Mr. Kong fifteen times in the back and side when no pedestrians were nearby. The panel did not address the constitutional issue, stating only that, '[e]ven if the facts showed that the officers had violated Kong's Fourth Amendment right, the law ... did not clearly establish the right.'. . I do not question the panel's authority to skip this analytical step. . But I worry about the impact bypassing this inquiry has on the public's perception of the justice system's efficacy and law enforcement's accountability, both of which are critical for a society governed by the rule of law. In my view, we should do what we permissibly can to strengthen confidence in the rule of law and the judicial system.")

Cole Estate of Richards v. Hutchins, 959 F.3d 1127, 1133-34, 1136 (8th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e conclude Officer Hutchins's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable. The 'facts known' to Officer Hutchins 'at the precise moment [he] effectuate[d] the seizure,'. . . were that Richards, with his gun pointed either toward the ground or the sky, retreated down Underwood's front steps and had turned away from his front door. . . In that moment, Officer Hutchins did not have probable cause to believe Richards posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm to Underwood as Richards was not pointing the weapon at Underwood or wielding it in an otherwise menacing fashion. In fact, Richards was visibly retreating from Underwood's home. . . . Officer Hutchins chose to shoot him, as upwards of five seconds elapsed between when Richards retreated from Underwood's door and turned toward his vehicle and when Officer Hutchins opened fire. Furthermore, Officer Hutchins chose to 'stand silent before shooting,'. . . despite having five to ten seconds from when he saw Richards emerge from behind his vehicle with a gun to when he shot Richards, which was enough time to provide a warning[.] . . His failure to warn 'exacerbate[s] the circumstances,'. . . further confirming that use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable here. . . . We conclude the law was clearly established on October 25, 2016 that Officer Hutchins's use of deadly force against Richards was objectively unreasonable in the circumstances of this case. The law was clearly established in two respects relevant here. First, it was clearly established that a person does not pose an immediate threat of serious physical harm to another when, although the person is in possession of a gun, he does not point it at another or wield it in an otherwise menacing fashion. Second, it was clearly established that a few seconds is enough time to determine an immediate threat has passed, extinguishing a preexisting justification for the use of deadly force. . . . We emphasize the limited nature of today's holding. We do not decide that Officer Hutchins in fact violated Richards's rights. If the factfinder later determines that key facts are not as we must assume them to be—for instance, how Richards held the gun when he was shot, how much time elapsed between when he began to retreat toward his vehicle and when he was shot, whether Richards retreated at all, whether Richards turned away from Underwood's door at all—the legal conclusions that may be drawn at that time may be different than the ones we draw here. But, based on the facts we are bound to assume, we conclude Officer Hutchins violated Richards's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from use of deadly force when he did not pose an immediate threat of serious physical harm to others and any such immediate threat he may have posed previously was no longer present when he was shot. Therefore, we affirm.")

Franklin v. Franklin County, Arkansas, 956 F.3d 1060, 1062-63 (8th Cir. 2020) ("After evaluating the undisputed material facts in the record, which we rehearsed above, we hold that the Griffiths acted reasonably under the circumstances and so did not violate Franklin's right to be free from excessive force, even if they tased him up to eight times. Because the Griffiths did not violate the constitution, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . We have numerous cases permitting officers to use tasers on noncompliant, violent suspects. . . . These decisions are consistent with the Supreme Court's holding, in the context of a police chase in which officers fired fifteen gunshots, that 'if police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended.'. . Here, the threat of Franklin's violent aggression did not subside until after the final shot of the taser. We have held it reasonable, moreover, for officers to use tasers and their own body weight to subdue combative jail detainees, apparently under the influence of drugs, who resist officer efforts to move them. . . In short, the scene here 'was a tumultuous one involving seemingly aggressive and noncompliant behavior, circumstances which we have previously held rendered officers' uses of tasers reasonable.'. .The fact that Franklin was tased three times in drive-stun mode while in handcuffs does not affect the result. Franklin continued to resist the officers while he was in handcuffs. We have allowed the use of tasers on detainees in handcuffs in appropriate circumstances. . . A person in handcuffs can still present a danger to officers. . . We have also observed that a tasing in drive-stun mode 'only causes discomfort and does not incapacitate the subject,' suggesting that effects of such force are de minimis. . . We therefore cannot say that Joseph acted unreasonably when he used a taser as he did in this circumstance. It could be argued that the use of force on Franklin while he was in the isolation cell was unreasonable and thus excessive because the officers did not have a sound reason for wanting to remove Franklin's handcuffs. Perhaps they could have simply closed and locked the door and left Franklin to his own devices. But the Griffiths offered objectively good reasons for removing the handcuffs. As Joseph testified during his deposition and as both Griffiths explained in their incident reports, they wanted Franklin to be able to move about the cell freely, and if he remained handcuffed in the drug-influenced state he was in, he might well have fallen while cuffed and broken his arms or wrists or hit his head. It was also objectively reasonable for them to be concerned that Franklin might be able to maneuver his hands and body in such a way as to use the cuffs as a weapon when someone entered the cell. We therefore hold that the Griffiths are entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 excessive-force claims because their actions did not violate the constitution.")

Jackson v. Stair, 953 F.3d 1052, 1052-54 (8th Cir. 2020) (Colloton, J., with whom Loken, J., joins, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("[T]he panel decision necessarily determined that a police action deemed constitutionally reasonable by the district judge and the dissenting panel judge would have been undertaken by only 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . I would rehear the case 'to secure and maintain uniformity of the court's decisions.'. .Qualified immunity has been a point of emphasis for the Supreme Court over the last decade, particularly in cases involving alleged use of excessive force by police officers. In 2017, the Court explained that, in the preceding five years, it had issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases. White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017) (per curiam); see City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1774 n.3 (2015) (collecting cases). This was 'necessary both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . The Court's attention to this topic, and the string of reversals, continued in the last two years. . . The Eighth Circuit thus far has avoided reversal in a qualified immunity case, although it may be noteworthy that no petition for writ of certiorari was filed from several divided panel decisions. . . . Officer Stair deployed a taser device three times to subdue Jackson after he refused to comply with commands and raised his fist toward another police officer's head. The panel majority ruled that the first and third deployments were reasonable, but that the second deployment was unreasonable and violated a clearly established right of Jackson. The panel opinion cited no comparable decision involving application of a taser against a non-compliant subject who threatened use of force against a police officer, and no decision holding that a subject's 'momentary post-tasered position on the ground' requires an officer to consider it 'a clearly punctuated interim of compliance' that makes another use of the taser unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . Instead, to justify reversing the district court's grant of qualified immunity, the panel majority reasoned that ' "general constitutional principles against excessive force" are enough to create a clearly established right and to put a reasonable officer on notice that a particular tasing was excessive.'. . The opinion does not attempt to reconcile its reliance on 'general constitutional principles' with the rule that clearly established law should not be defined at 'a high level of generality.' The panel opinion also relied on decisions involving different legal inquiries or materially different circumstances that do not squarely govern the specific facts of this case. . . . Whether the panel's reasoning is consistent with the Supreme Court's admonitions—including that clearly established law should not be defined 'at a high level of generality,' and that 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue,'. . . is a matter that warrants further review.")

Jackson v. Stair, 944 F.3d 704, 712-14 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1263 (2021) ("The district court ruled that Officer Stair's conduct as a whole was reasonable without considering whether the second tasing could be a constitutional violation on its own. . . . In light of the video footage depicting the quick succession of the tasings and dispute as to whether Jackson was resisting the officers or posing a threat at the time of the second tasing, we find that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the second tasing amounted to excessive force. . . . In 2013, when the tasings of Jackson occurred, there was sufficient case law to establish that a misdemeanor suspect in Jackson's position at the time of the second tasing – non-threatening, non-fleeing, non-resisting – had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force. . . . The third tasing occurred after Officer Stair gave several clear orders for Jackson to stop moving and lay down on his stomach, or he would be tased. Afterward, Jackson moved in the direction of Officer Stair and rose to his knee in an apparent attempt to get off the ground. Officer Stair then deployed his Taser for the third and final time before Jackson complied with his demands and was arrested. A reasonable officer in Officer Stair's position could have perceived Jackson to be resisting arrest and could have feared for his safety. Based on our review of the record, we conclude the third tasing was objectively reasonable. . . . In the instant case, Officer Stair tased Jackson three times. The district court ruled that Officer Stair used a reasonable amount of force to subdue Jackson, considering the officer's conduct as a whole. The court erred by not considering and analyzing each tasing individually. We find the first and third tasings were objectively reasonable, and no Fourth Amendment violation occurred. As to the second tasing, we find there are genuine issues of material fact regarding whether Officer's Stairs use of force was excessive. If the second tasing amounted to excessive force, then Officer Stair is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Stair, 944 F.3d 704, 714 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1263 (2021) (Wollman, J., concurring and dissenting) ("I agree with the court that Officer Stair's first and third tasings were objectively reasonable and that Jackson's First and Fourth Amendment and municipal liability claims are without merit. When viewed in light of his earlier manifestation of unceasing, rage-filled verbal and physical conduct, Jackson's momentary post-tasered position on the ground does not justify considering it as a clearly punctuated interim of compliance with Officer Stair's earlier commands, and thus the second tasing was not objectively unreasonable. Granted that Jackson had not at that point attempted to rise from the ground, his earlier-expressed threatened use of force against Officer Harness, when coupled with the nearly hysterical tone of his voice throughout his interaction with Stair and others nearby, justified the continued application of the taser. It may appear from our chambers-viewed observation of the entire encounter to have been a too-hasty application, but given Jackson's earlier pretasing arm-waving, rant-filled anger and his reluctance to comply with Stair's several earlier-expressed commands and warnings, his momentarily supine position on the ground was hardly a guarantee of a no-longer aggressive subject, as was the case of the medical assistance-seeking detainee in Smith v. Conway. In a word, then, although Officer Stair's quickly applied application following Jackson's initial fall to the ground may have been ill-advised, I do not believe that it was objectively unreasonable in the circumstances, and so I respectfully dissent from the court's decision to remand the case for a further review of that issue.")

Z.J. by & through Jones v. Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners, 931 F.3d 672, 682-88 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Whether the use of the flash-bang grenade here was reasonable is not a close question. The SWAT team knew the suspect, Charles, was already in custody. Any potential justification based on the fact Charles was (at the time) suspected of murder is eliminated by the fact the SWAT team knew they would not encounter Charles there. Nor did they have any indication that other people at the residence would pose any threat. In fact, they had no idea who was inside the house because they failed to do any investigation into that question beyond a quick drive-by to check the address. The use of a flash-bang grenade under these facts was not reasonable. . . Nor was the manner of use reasonable. They threw the flash-bang grenade into the house blindly without knowing whether children, elderly, or other innocent individuals were inside. . . .The SWAT team's use of the flash-bang grenade was unreasonable and violated the Fourth Amendment. As the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, we address 'whether the right at issue was "clearly established" at the time of defendant's alleged misconduct.'. . .The "clearly established" requirement of qualified immunity provides officers with ample room for honest mistakes, but the SWAT team officers' conduct falls outside even this generous standard. First, the use of the flash-bang grenade was unreasonable under all of the relevant case law. Second, it would have been obvious to any reasonable officer that the use of the flash-bang grenade under those circumstances was unreasonable. . . .[T]he relevant case law clearly established that the use of flash-bang grenades is unreasonable where officers have no basis to believe they will face the threat of violence and they unreasonably fail to ascertain whether there are any innocent bystanders in the area it is deployed. It is true this court has not yet addressed the reasonableness of the use of flash-bang grenades, but many other courts have. [collecting cases] We do not hold that every unreasonable use of a flash-bang grenade is a violation of clearly established law. Rather, we hold only that it was clearly established in 2010 that the use of flash-bang grenades is unreasonable where officers have no basis to believe they will face the threat of violence and they unreasonably fail to ascertain whether there are any innocent bystanders in the area it is deployed. . . . Under all of the relevant case law, the SWAT team officers' use of a flash-bang grenade in this situation would be unconstitutional. The court is not aware of, and neither the parties nor the dissent have pointed to, any case law in existence in 2010 under which the SWAT team's conduct would be constitutional. Even aside from the consensus in persuasive case law at the time, the SWAT team officers violated clearly established law because it would be obvious to any reasonable officer that the use of the flash-bang grenade under these circumstances was unreasonable. For a right to be clearly established, it is not required that there be 'a case directly on point.'. . An officer may have fair notice based on the fact his conduct is obviously unlawful, even in the absence of a case addressing the particular violation. . . . The cases cited by the dissent do not lend any support to the position the SWAT team's use of the flash-bang grenade was not obviously unconstitutional. As discussed above, those cases each involved circumstances where officers knew or had reason to believe the residence in which the flash-bang grenade was used contained a potentially violent individual. Under the facts of this case, where the SWAT team had no basis to believe they would face the threat of violence and unreasonably failed to ascertain whether there were any innocent bystanders in the area the flash-bang grenade was deployed, their violation was obvious. The SWAT team officers violated clearly established law when they used the flash-bang grenade. The district court did not err by denying summary judgment on qualified immunity to the SWAT team. . . . Z.J. argues the detectives' authorization to use the SWAT team for executing the search warrant was unreasonable because they conducted no pre-search investigation other than a brief drive by the house to confirm the address and had no reason to believe a SWAT team was necessary. We do not decide whether the detectives' decision violated the Fourth Amendment but instead conclude they are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate clearly established law. . . . An officer's decision to authorize a SWAT team to execute a warrant can, in some cases, constitute a Fourth Amendment violation. . . We do not, however, decide whether the detectives' decision here was reasonable. On the one hand, they had no information that would have supported the need to send the SWAT team to execute the search warrant. They also performed virtually no investigation that would have provided them with more information about whether the use of the SWAT team was appropriate. But on the other hand, the detectives are only responsible for their own decisions. Importantly here, we must judge their conduct 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . While the detectives likely knew the use of a flash-bang grenade was possible, no evidence suggests they directed or were involved in planning its use. The warrant was also not a 'no-knock' warrant. Thus, the detectives would have expected the SWAT team officers to knock and announce their presence — and presumably not use a flash-bang grenade without justification. This is a much different situation from one where an officer is involved in the planning of a surprise, 'no-knock' raid by a SWAT team and knows a significant amount of force will be used. The detectives would not have necessarily anticipated the SWAT team would throw a flash-bang grenade into the house blindly without knowing who was inside and without any indication that anyone inside posed any danger to them. Without deciding the close question of whether the detectives' decision to use the SWAT team to execute the search warrant in this case violated the Fourth Amendment, we conclude the detectives did not violate clearly established law. Z.J. has pointed to no cases in this circuit, or a consensus of cases from other circuits, that would have put the detectives on notice that using a SWAT team to execute a search warrant under these circumstances violated the Constitution. Nor was the decision obviously unconstitutional. The detectives are entitled to qualified immunity for what may have been a 'bad guess[ ] in [a] gray area[ ].'")

Z.J. by & through Jones v. Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners, 931 F.3d 672, 689-92 (8th Cir. 2019) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("While I agree with much of the court's analysis, I take issue with two points—that the use of the flash-bang grenade violated clearly established law and that the decision to authorize a SWAT team to execute a search warrant can constitute excessive force. . . .The court claims that 'many other courts' have addressed the reasonableness of the use of flash-bang grenades, . . . but it cites opinions from only the Ninth and Seventh Circuits. Agreement between two other circuits does not constitute a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority. While some additional circuits have found Fourth Amendment violations involving flash-bang grenades, their decisions came after November 2010. . . Additionally, the Eleventh Circuit held in 2017 that a July 2010 search involving a flash-bang grenade did not violate clearly established law. . . . In sum, Z.J. has not shown a 'robust consensus of cases' that resolve 'a fact-intensive Fourth Amendment issue under a governing standard that requires judges to "allow[ ] officers to draw on their own experience and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person."'. . Further, Dukes, though different in some respects, illustrates that the law was not clearly established in November 2010. I similarly disagree that the use of the flash-bang grenade violated law clearly established by a 'general constitutional rule' that applied 'with obvious clarity.'. . We must ask whether the constitutional question was 'beyond debate.'. . As discussed above, the Sixth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuit opinions indicate that a 'general constitutional rule' did not apply 'with obvious clarity.' The facts of the case also demonstrate that a general constitutional rule did not apply with obvious clarity. . . . [T]he court's conclusion that the decision to authorize a SWAT team to execute a search warrant can constitute excessive force and therefore an unreasonable search is unnecessary. . . Thus, I only would decide, and agree with the court, that authorizing the SWAT team did not violate clearly established law. . . To be sure, the use of a SWAT team may involve a show of overwhelming force and may be unreasonable in a particular context, but whether the use of a SWAT team constitutes an unreasonable use of force necessarily depends on the SWAT team's actions in executing the warrant. An officer making the general decision to deploy a SWAT team may not be responsible for the tactical decisions the team makes in carrying out the search. Here, there is no evidence that the SWAT team always applies excessive force.")

Z.J. by & through Jones v. Kansas City Bd. of Police Commissioners, 931 F.3d 672, 692-94 (8th Cir. 2019) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the court's opinion except for the latter half of Part II.B.2. The opinion acknowledges that an officer's decision to authorize a SWAT team to execute a search warrant can violate the Fourth Amendment under certain circumstances, yet it declines to opine on whether there was a constitutional violation here. The district court concluded that there are material factual disputes about whether the detectives violated Z.J.'s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by failing to conduct an adequate investigation and by summoning a SWAT team without justification. I would affirm that conclusion for two reasons. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Z.J., a reasonable jury could conclude that using the SWAT team under these circumstances violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Because there was no justification for calling a SWAT team and there is evidence that this particular SWAT team may have a widespread practice of using excessive force, I cannot conclude that the detectives were entitled to qualified immunity for their decision to employ the SWAT team in this case.")

Swearingen v. Judd, 930 F.3d 983, 987-88 (8th Cir. 2019) ("We need not decide whether Judd's use of force was objectively reasonable because, at a minimum, Judd did not violate a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment. It was not clearly established in August 2014 that an officer was forbidden to discharge his firearm when suddenly confronted in close quarters by a noncompliant suspect armed with a knife. . . . Although general propositions about use of deadly force were clearly established, and a plaintiff need not cite a prior decision with identical facts,

"the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case" and not 'defined at a high level of generality.'. . While the Swearingens identify some factors militating against a need for deadly force in this instance, it remains undisputed that Judd was suddenly confronted, at a distance of only three feet, with a suspect who was armed with a knife after ignoring multiple commands to drop it. Accepting for purposes of summary judgment that Ryan was neither advancing toward Judd nor holding the knife with the blade directed at the officer, the suspect still had been noncompliant and could have caused serious injury or death in a matter of seconds by repositioning himself and the knife. The situation is fairly described as tense and rapidly evolving. Even if Judd should have attempted to apprehend Ryan without firing his weapon, the officer's actions sit along the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . Under these circumstances, we cannot say that Judd's use of deadly force, even if just over the line of reasonableness, violated a clearly established right.")

Swearingen v. Judd, 930 F.3d 983, 988-89 (8th Cir. 2019) (Erickson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Swearingens, I believe Judd's mistaken perception or belief that Ryan posed a threat of serious physical harm to Judd or any of the other officers was objectively reasonable in this particular case due to the close proximity between the officers and Ryan, and because the positioning of the knife was such that it that could have been readily modified to pose an imminent threat to the officers. . . I, therefore, concur in the judgment.")

Clark v. Clark, 926 F.3d 972, 979-80 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Gregory relies on cases from this circuit and other circuits that have found that pointing a gun may constitute an unconstitutional display of force. [citing cases] Those cases are not analogous to the circumstances confronting the officers in this case. They involve incidents where guns were pointed at suspects for unreasonably long periods of time, well after the police had taken control of the situation. In this case, Gregory signaled compliance by putting his hands out the driver's side window. A reasonable officer was justified in believing the situation was not fully under control until Gregory had been removed from the vehicle, patted down, and restrained. When Gregory stopped his vehicle, officers knew Gregory had a weapon, were aware that he had been the only identified person present in an area where shots had reportedly been fired, and had reason to believe he might be a suspect attempting to evade capture. Under these circumstances, pointing a firearm at Gregory for a few seconds while removing him from his vehicle did not constitute excessive force, and did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Moore-Jones v. Quick, 909 F.3d 983, 985-87 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The right to be free from a PIT maneuver in these circumstances was not sufficiently definite. The district court relied on the clearly established law that 'force is least justified against nonviolent misdemeanants who do not flee or actively resist arrest and pose little or no threat to the security of the officers or the public.'. . From a reasonable officer's perspective, she refused to comply with commands to pull over. In November 2015, Quick was justified in using some force to secure compliance. . . Quick decided to use a PIT maneuver from the right side of Moore-Jones's car, avoiding the dangers to her and other drivers from her car potentially spinning into the parallel interstate. He waited until after the last exit before the nearest city, which had space on the right shoulder for the maneuver. The issue is whether existing precedent put the reasonableness of his decision 'beyond debate.' [Court discusses cases] The circumstances here are somewhere between the Marshall case and the other cases above. Taken together, they suggest Quick's actions were in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . The district court erred in concluding Moore-Jones's right was clearly established. Quick is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Zubrod v. Hoch, 907 F.3d 568, 577, 580 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Though we view the facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, the Zubrods have not submitted competent, admissible evidence that rebuts the deputies' version of events. . . The deputies' statements were substantially the same regarding the material facts: Michael had already severely injured his victim and demonstrated hostility and violence toward the deputies. The deputies faced an individual who was dangerous, acting abnormally, strong, threatening, and noncompliant, and each time they eased up to allow him to submit, he resumed his violent behavior. With the unsworn statements excluded, the Zubrods rely on Deputy Hoch's taser video. After reviewing it, we conclude that it shows a violent suspect who failed to comply with reasonable orders to turn around and resisted even after multiple tasings. This is consistent with the deputies' statements. The video does not provide any evidence that would lead a reasonable juror to conclude that Michael surrendered. . . . The Zubrods failed to raise a genuine, material fact question as to whether the Deputy Hoch's use of force was reasonable. Because we are satisfied that there was no constitutional violation, we need not undertake an analysis into whether the right in question was clearly established.")

Johnson v. City of Minneapolis, 901 F.3d 963, 967-71 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Officer Heiple believed that Johnson kicked him. . . There is no question (and Johnson does not contest) that assaulting a police officer is a crime under Minnesota law. . . Thus, our inquiry is not whether it was reasonable for an officer to believe a specific act constituted a violation of the law. . . or whether it was reasonable for an officer to believe a suspect had the requisite mindset (or mens rea) for a criminal violation[.] . . Instead, our inquiry here is whether it was reasonable to believe that the purported act (or actus reus), a kick, happened in the first place. Framed differently, the question is 'was it objectively reasonable for [Officer Heiple] to mistakenly believe, under the totality of the circumstances, that [Johnson]' kicked him? . . . We do not believe so. 'Considering the totality of the circumstances,' Officer Heiple did not make an 'entirely reasonable inference' that Johnson had kicked him. [citing Wesby] . . . .In sum, we find Officer Heiple lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Johnson. A review of the totality of the circumstances suggests that Officer Heiple had reason to know that Johnson could not deliver the type of pain he felt. Indeed, he had no information suggesting she was even in a position to do so. Most importantly, however, the arguable probable cause undergirding the warrantless arrest here was missing a fundamental element: observation—either by Officer Heiple or a witness who relayed that information to him—of a criminal act. . . . The next question is whether the 'unlawfulness of [Officer Heiple's] conduct was clearly established at the time.'. . In Kuehl v. Burtis, we held that an officer who did not witness a crime did not have arguable probable cause to arrest a suspect after speaking with her only for 'twenty seconds' when other eyewitnesses were present and would have exonerated her. . . Indeed, there are striking parallels to this case—the only investigation undertaken by Officer Heiple was asking Johnson twice if she had kicked him. There was one eyewitness (Moriarty) present that Officer Heiple could have easily turned to. And, as in Kuehl, Moriarty would have exonerated Johnson. Additionally, similar to Kuehl, there were no exigent circumstances that prevented Officer Heiple from speaking with Moriarty before the arrest. Kuehl is a 'controlling case' on these facts. . . . At bottom, 'a reasonable officer, looking at the entire legal landscape at the time of the arrests, could [not] have interpreted the law as permitting the arrest[ ] here.'")

Wenzel v. City of Bourbon, 899 F.3d 598, 602-03 (8th Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that the district court erred in ruling that Storm's use of deadly force was not reasonable under the circumstances. Considering the version of the evidence that the district court assumed or likely assumed in reaching its decision, the facts and circumstances confronting Storm were that of a fleeing suspect whose reckless rules-violating driving constituted a hazard to oncoming motorists. Storm was aware of Wenzel's aggressiveness and of his violence towards law enforcement officers. The manner in which Wenzel exited his vehicle and charged towards Storm while exhibiting an angry visage was in keeping with the reputation he had earned during his earlier interactions with law enforcement officers. Given his knowledge of that reputation and the scant three seconds that he had to observe Wenzel's unabated approach towards him, it was reasonable for Storm to believe that Wenzel posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm to him, notwithstanding the fact that Storm could see that Wenzel's hands were empty and the later-discovered fact that Wenzel was unarmed. . . We reject Plaintiffs' contention that it was unreasonable for Storm to use deadly force when, they say, he could have used his baton or his pepper spray to subdue Wenzel. . . . A reasonable officer on the scene would have viewed Wenzel's indisputably aggressive approach as a precursor to a physical altercation. Storm was required to make a split-second decision in unpredictable and dangerous circumstances, and he was not constitutionally required to attempt to re-holster his firearm, grab his baton or pepper spray canister, and do battle with the fast-approaching, known-to-be-confrontational Wenzel. . . We reverse the order denying qualified immunity.")

Michael v. Trevena, 899 F.3d 528, 533-35 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Accepting Michael's version of events as true, Trevena and Chaffee's use of force was objectively unreasonable. The officers allegedly suspected Michael of making a false statement—a nonviolent misdemeanor. . . Michael was neither fleeing nor actively resisting arrest and, sitting in a lawn chair, he posed no threat to the security of the officers or the public. Accordingly, none of the Graham factors cuts in favor of a forceful arrest being reasonable. . . Under Michael's version of the facts, he was a nonviolent misdemeanant who neither fled nor actively resisted arrest, and posed no threat to the officers or other members of the public. . . Under these circumstances, it is objectively unreasonable to make an arrest by grabbing the suspect by the throat (Trevena), or using a baton with sufficient force to break the suspect's arm (Chaffee). Accordingly, neither officer is entitled to qualified immunity on Michael's excessive force claim. . . . Like the district court, the dissent believes that the dash cam video clearly shows Michael intentionally put his foot under the tire of his sister's vehicle (a minivan). We have watched the same video and we disagree. . . The video shows Michael walking quickly to the passenger side of the van. Michael's sister begins to drive away. We do not see Michael taking any steps backwards; his feet move but he remains immediately beside the van. As the van turns toward Michael and away from the curb, Michael's right foot moves under the rolling van. The van's rear tire—presumably the tire Michael says ran over his foot—is not visible because the van blocks the dash cam's view as it turns into the street. Though a jury could reasonably conclude that Michael put his foot under his sister's van on purpose, it could also reasonably conclude that Michael's sister deliberately turned the van toward him, and succeeded in running over his foot. Thus, this remains one of those 'usual' qualified immunity cases in which viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the nonmovant 'means adopting ... the plaintiff's version of the facts.'. . Here, that means assuming, for the purpose of summary judgment, that Michael's sister intentionally ran over his foot. . . . [T[he officers' belief, mistaken or otherwise, that they had probable cause to arrest Michael for violating N.D. Cent. Code § 12.1-11-03(1) was unreasonable. Accordingly, neither Trevena nor Chaffee is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Church v. Anderson, 898 F.3d 830, 832-34 (8th Cir. 2018) ("On appeal, Church's main argument is that we should create an evidentiary presumption at the summary judgment stage against an officer who fails to use audio or video recording equipment that he has been issued. He argues that Anderson should not benefit from Church's inability to remember the incident given that Anderson failed to activate his recording equipment. The proposed presumption would permit the court to infer from the lack of audio evidence that Anderson's use of force was excessive, allowing the claims to proceed to trial. While we recognize that cases involving the use of force in which only one side can tell its story present 'a unique evidentiary problem,' we decline to adopt such a radical solution. . . Church admits that he knows of no court anywhere that has recognized such a presumption. Moreover, we must follow circuit precedent, . . . which places the burden of showing the violation of a clearly established right on Church[.] . . Church also claims that the physical evidence concerning the shooting and '[d]iscrepancies and variations' in Anderson's testimony are sufficient to bring his claims to trial even without the proposed evidentiary presumption. . . In particular, he points to Anderson's lack of physical injuries consistent with a violent assault, his knowledge that Church was unarmed, and his failure to use less violent means to subdue Church, as well as the jury's acquittal of Church on the more serious charge of assault with intent to inflict serious bodily injury. . . . Though Church was acquitted of the more serious charge, it is undisputed that he assaulted Anderson, who did have injuries consistent with such an assault, even if those injuries were limited. Weighing approximately 268 pounds, Church was far larger than Anderson, who weighed approximately 190 pounds. Anderson testified that he feared that he might lose consciousness and that Church could potentially access his service weapon and kill him. Given the size difference between the two men, Anderson's concerns about his safety, and the 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, . . . it was reasonable for him to use deadly force to defend himself[.] . . . As for the availability of less lethal force, Anderson testified that he could not reach his taser or pepper spray—which were on the opposite side of his duty belt from his service weapon—due to Church's repeated punches. But even if we assume that Anderson could have used these alternatives, an officer need not 'pursue the most prudent course of conduct as judged by 20/20 hindsight vision.'. . And because deadly force was justified, Anderson was not required to warn Church before each shot and was permitted to use force until the threat had ended. . . While one shot did apparently enter Church's right shoulder area from the rear, this case bears little similarity to those in which 'an unarmed man was shot in the back of the head,'. . . or four of six shots entered the suspect from behind[.] . . . Anderson testified that he fired the second and third shots in rapid succession. The mere possibility that a shot hit Church as he withdrew is not enough to defeat qualified immunity if 'the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for' Church. . . There is no dispute that the second and third shots were fired together and that one shot hit Church from the front. 'This would be a different case if [Anderson] had initiated a second round of shots after an initial round had clearly incapacitated [Church] and had ended any threat of continued flight, or if [Church] had clearly given himself up. But that is not what happened.'. . Because Anderson's 'unrefuted version of these events establishes that his use of force was constitutionally reasonable, we must affirm.'")

Rogers v. King, 885 F.3d 1118, 1121-22 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Rogers and Boyd, and considering the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that Officer King's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. The officers responded to Ambrose-Boyd's home after receiving a 911 call report that she was home alone, suicidal, and had a gun. The dangerousness of the situation escalated as the officers found themselves in a hallway with Ambrose-Boyd holding a gun. Ambrose-Boyd failed to respond to commands to drop the weapon. The officers testified that her mental state added to their fears and that she raised the gun to Officer Christoph's shin level. At that time 'a reasonable officer would have had probable cause to believe that [she] posed a threat of serious physical harm, and any mistake in believing that [s]he posed such a threat was objectively reasonable.'. . There is 'no constitutional or statutory right' that prevents an 'officer from using deadly force when faced with an apparently loaded weapon.'")

Frederick v. Motsinger, 873 F.3d 641, 645-47 (8th Cir. 2017) ("With this appeal awaiting oral argument, the Supreme Court rejected the Ninth Circuit's provocation rule, agreeing with other circuits that its 'fundamental flaw is that it uses another constitutional violation to manufacture an excessive force claim where one would not otherwise exist.'. . The Court made clear that 'the objective reasonableness analysis must be conducted separately for each search or seizure that is alleged to be unconstitutional.'. . If the use of deadly force was objectively reasonable under Graham, based on what the officers knew when the force was applied, 'it may not be found unreasonable by reference to some separate constitutional violation.'. . The Estate's Brief did not argue that it was objectively unreasonable for Officer Motsinger to use deadly force against a suspect who was charging a fellow officer with a knife raised in a stabbing position. Our prior cases support the district court's conclusion that Motsinger's use of deadly force in this situation was reasonable. . . Consistent with this precedent, counsel for the Estate conceded at oral argument that, applying Mendez, the shooting of Frederick did not in itself give rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. At oral argument, the Estate argued that the attempted tasing was objectively unreasonable, and this was a distinct Fourth Amendment claim raised and argued in the district court and vigorously pursued on appeal. The Supreme Court in Mendez noted 'the principle that plaintiffs can—subject to qualified immunity—generally recover damages that are proximately caused by any Fourth Amendment violation.... The harm proximately caused by ... two [Fourth Amendment] torts may overlap, but the two claims should not be confused.'. . Thus, we must address the Fourth Amendment tasing claim. . . .In this case, we agree with the district court that Officer Torkelson's decision to use non-lethal force, his taser, in an attempt to disarm Frederick after she refused repeated warnings to drop a four-inch knife was objectively reasonable—Frederick was in a small commercial space, in front of restrooms that might have been occupied, and brandishing a weapon that posed a danger to the officers and store customers. The Estate argues that Frederick had not directly threatened the officers with her knife before she was tased. But she was acting erratically, expressing irrational thoughts, holding a knife in a stabbing position, challenging the officers' authority, and disobeying commands to drop her knife. While Frederick did not lunge at the officers prior to being tased, Torkelson and Clifton reasonably perceived she was ready to use her knife against them or others. . . . Even if she was suffering from mental illness or other impairment, the relevant inquiry is whether she posed a threat, not what prompted her threatening conduct. . . The district court also held that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because 'it was certainly not clearly established that tasing a person standing in a public area who refused several commands to drop a knife would violate that person's constitutional rights.' We agree. What is 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality ... [but] must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . Although the Supreme Court 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate' at the time the officers acted. . . As the above-cited Eighth Circuit cases demonstrate, existing precedent did not place 'beyond debate' that the officers violated Frederick's Fourth Amendment rights when they discharged a taser at Frederick in these circumstances.The judgment of the district court is affirmed.") Tatum v. Robinson, 858 F.3d 544, 549-52 (8th Cir. 2017) ("[A] reasonable officer would not believe Tatum was 'actively' resisting arrest. True, witness affidavits describe Tatum as fighting and resisting Robinson. But the district court found these statements inconsistent with the security footage. On appeal, Robinson does not contend that Tatum physically struggled with him, threatened him, or attempted to flee before he used the pepper spray. Noncompliance and arguing do not amount to active resistance. . . . Robinson contends that pepper spraying Tatum was reasonable partly because Tatum was armed and pled guilty to resisting arrest. Officers found a metal shank in Tatum's coat pocket after he was in the security office. This later discovery does not justify Robinson's earlier use of pepper spray because there is no evidence he knew or suspected that Tatum had the shank at the time he used pepper spray. . . Neither does Tatum's later guilty plea justify Robinson's use of pepper spray. The guilty plea does not show when he resisted arrest. Viewed most favorably to Tatum, it does not show Tatum was resisting arrest before Robinson used the pepper spray. Robinson used force on a non-resisting, non-fleeing individual suspected of a completed, non-violent misdemeanor—the type of individual against whom the use of force is 'least justified.'. . .Here, by the undisputed facts, Robinson informed Tatum he was a police officer, told him he was under arrest, told him to put his hands on a clothes rack, warned him he would use pepper spray if he did not calm down, and then pepper sprayed him. Tatum was given an opportunity to comply. He did not, instead arguing angrily with Robinson. It was reasonable for Robinson to use some force. But it was not reasonable to immediately use significant force. In addition to the lack of justification from the three Graham factors, other facts and circumstances indicate only limited force was reasonable. Robinson was not alone—another security officer was close by, as were at least two Dillard's employees. . .Robinson was off-duty and in plain clothes. . . It was not reasonable for Robinson to immediately use pepper spray. Pepper spray can cause more than temporary pain. . . Robinson presents no evidence he attempted to use other force to secure compliance—no evidence he tried to grab Tatum's hands and place them on the clothes rack, for example. . . Instead, he proceeded to pepper spray Tatum 14 seconds after he encountered him, and necessarily fewer seconds after Tatum failed to comply with his command. . . .Given the limited justification for using force against Tatum, a jury could find that Robinson used an unreasonable amount of force when he pepper sprayed Tatum. . . .Tatum's right to be free from the use of pepper spray under these facts was not sufficiently definite. A reasonable officer in Robinson's shoes could have believed he was not violating Tatum's rights by pepper spraying him because Tatum was angrily arguing and was warned before the pepper spray was used. The district court erred in concluding Tatum's right to not be pepper sprayed was clearly established. . . .Viewing the evidence most favorably to Tatum, Robinson choked him for an extended period of time although he was restrained and not resisting. A reasonable jury could find that Robinson's use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . . As of April 29, 2014, it was clearly established that a suspect's Fourth Amendment rights were violated by uses of force like Robinson's. . . These cases put the question of the constitutionality of choking Tatum beyond debate because they clearly establish that it violates the Fourth Amendment to choke a suspect who is handcuffed and not resisting. The district court correctly denied qualified immunity on the choking claim.")

Dooley v. Tharp, 856 F.3d 1177, 1182-84 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Tharp testified that when he screamed the command to drop the gun, '[i]nstantaneously, the subject began to turn toward us and I saw him spin around, raising his rifle and pointing it at me.' According to Tharp, he believed 'that the subject was going to fire at me or Deputy Hudson unless I fired first.' Hudson testified that Dooley had pointed the rifle at Tharp and 'look[ed] directly at Deputy Tharp as he moved his rifle into a firing position.' When viewed frame-by-frame, the video appears to contradict the officers' description. It shows Dooley turning to face the deputies and using his right hand to maneuver the rifle. . . It also shows that Dooley did not place his right hand near the trigger and did not place his left hand on the rifle. It shows that at the moment of the bullet's impact, Dooley's arms were crossed over his chest and the muzzle of the rifle was pointed toward the sky. As we said in Aipperspach v. McInerney, 766 F.3d 803, 808 (8th Cir. 2014), '[w]e agree with the general proposition that a video of the incident can create a genuine issue of material fact that precludes the grant of summary judgment in an excessive force case.' When viewed in slow motion, the video of Dooley's actions could be seen as creating a genuine issue of fact whether Tharp used excessive force in the light of Dooley's response to the shouted commands to drop the gun. But law enforcement officers are not afforded the opportunity of viewing in slow motion what appears to them to constitute life-threatening action. In contrast to the situation in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S.

372, 378 (2007), the real-time view of the video does not clearly contradict Tharp's account of what he perceived Dooley's actions to have been. . . Accordingly, we must view Tharp's mistaken-perception action for objective reasonableness. . . . Viewing the dash-cam video at regular speed and considering the facts of this case in light of the forgoing decisions, we conclude that Tharp's mistaken perception that Dooley posed a threat of serious physical harm to Tharp was objectively reasonable. We agree with the district court's determination that '[a] reasonable officer could believe that at some point in this arc of movement the man was pointing his gun at the officers and [could] feel himself to be at risk of serious harm.'. . We thus conclude that, however tragic the circumstances of Dooley's death, Tharp was correctly granted qualified immunity in the constitutionally based action. In light of the post-shooting facts discovered by Hudson and Tharp, a less confrontational approach to the situation facing them—one that might have given them time to recognize that Dooley was in fact attempting to comply with Tharp's twice-shouted commands to drop the gun rather than preparing to fire upon him—might have prevented this needless loss of life. . . Similarly, in retrospect, and with the 20/20 vision of hindsight, had Tharp identified himself as a law enforcement officer and given a warning, Dooley might well have reacted in such a way that did not involve maneuvering the barrel of the rifle as he did. As it was, however, Dooley's decision to fasten the pellet gun to his epaulet, coupled with Tharp's mistaken belief that Dooley was taking aim at the officers, ultimately resulted in his death.")

Malone v. Hinman, 847 F.3d 949, 954-55 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Based on these undisputed facts, the relevant question is whether Officer Hinman's use of deadly force against Malone was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . More specifically, the question is whether Officer Hinman had 'probable cause to believe that [Malone] pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm to the officer or others.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Malone, he did not pose a threat of serious physical harm to Officer Hinman because he was running away from Officer Hinman. But we conclude that, looking at the circumstances from the perspective of a reasonable officer and taking the disputed facts in Malone's favor, Malone posed a threat of serious physical harm to others. Officer Hinman knew that approximately three gunshots had just been fired in a crowd of 40 to 50 people. He then saw Malone running away with a gun toward Officer Montgomery and others as the crowd dispersed. Officer Hinman instructed Malone to stop, but Malone did not stop because he did not hear Officer Hinman. . . Malone continued to run toward Officer Montgomery. The record shows that Malone was two to three feet from Officer Montgomery at the time that Officer Hinman fired his gun. The entire event occurred within three to ten seconds. Like the district court, we recognize the tragic nature of these events: 'Taking Malone's version as the truth, his good deed in defusing a dangerous argument, coupled with two split-second decisions, resulted in a promising young man's paralysis.' Nonetheless, applying the required review standard, we hold that Officer Hinman's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. Therefore, the district court did not err in granting Officer Hinman's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity on Malone's excessive-force claim.")

Wallace v. City of Alexander, 843 F.3d 763, 769-70, 767 n.3 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Since the Supreme Court decided Tennesse v. Garner in 1985, it has been clearly established 'that the use of deadly force against a fleeing suspect who does not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others is not permitted.'. . Further, such a threat must be 'immediate.'. . . We have thus concluded that an officer violated Garner by using deadly force to seize an individual who did not possess a weapon and was attempting to flee the scene of a potentially violent crime. . . Here, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the estate, Wallace did not pose an immediate and significant threat of serious injury to Cummings or bystanders because he may not have committed any violent felony, the physical struggle was minimal, and he was not 'holding a firearm' when he attempted to flee. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the estate, a reasonable fact finder could thus conclude that the seizure violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .Cummings argues that an unintentional shooting would not violate the Fourth Amendment, but we need not address this argument in light of the district court findings from which we assume for the purposes of this appeal that Cummings intentionally shot Wallace. There is a circuit split on whether unintentional conduct can ever lead to Fourth Amendment liability. See Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 37–39 (1st Cir. 2016) (collecting cases). Our court has thus far declined to reach this issue. See McCoy v. City of Monticello, 342 F.3d 842, 847 n.3 (8th Cir. 2003).")

Ransom v. Grisafe, 790 F.3d 804, 811-12 (8th Cir. 2015) ("It is undisputed that the officers knew a 911 call had reported shots fired, and that call was corroborated when the officers found Ransom's van where the caller said it would be. After arriving, the van backfired-a sound both sides agree could have been mistaken for a gunshot. Ransom then exited his van and appeared to the officers to disregard their order to get back in the car. Based on these facts, the officers were justified in using deadly force to neutralize what they reasonably believed was a risk of serious physical harm, either to themselves or to others. It is very fortunate that the officers missed with their shots. This would be a tragic case if Ransom, who by all means was abiding by the law, had been injured or killed. Though Ransom had done nothing wrong, and viewing the scene in his favor, the officers' fear of harm was reasonable, and the potential seizure from their gunshots did not violate Ransom's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .After firing at Ransom, the officers saw that their window was shot out (even though that was from their own ricocheting bullets). Although Ransom yelled that he had no gun and that the sounds were coming from his van, a reasonable officer in this position could not know whether Ransom's uncorroborated explanation was true. . . We believe the above facts provided the officers 'an objectively reasonable concern for [their] safety or suspicion of danger' that allowed them to handcuff and detain Ransom while they surveyed the scene for future danger.") [See also Acosta v. California Highway Patrol, No. 18-CV-00958-BLF, 2019 WL 2579202, at *10–13 (N.D. Cal. June 24, 2019)]

Ransom v. Grisafe, 790 F.3d 804, 815-16 (8th Cir. 2015) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Viewing the evidence in Ransom's favor, I conclude that the Detectives did detain Ransom against his will without probable cause to do so in violation of his constitutional right as described in Hayes. As a result, I believe the district court properly denied Detectives Randle and Grisafe's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and I respectfully dissent from the court's conclusion to the contrary in Part II(b). Under the same standard of review, however, I agree that Officers Phillips and Conaway and Sergeant Dearing are entitled to qualified immunity. I also acknowledge this odd result: The officers who open-fired on an unarmed man are given immunity; yet the detectives who transported the same unarmed man, without restraint, to a police station to ask him questions and then took him home would receive no immunity. But the peculiarity of the facts in this case leads to those conclusions. All involved parties agreed that the van's backfires sounded like gunshots. The 911 caller certainly thought so, too. It was reasonable for the officers to react as officers would be expected to react in the highly unusual and potentially dangerous situation presented in this case. How lucky that the officers did not hit Ransom, or anyone else, when they fired their guns. But even viewing the facts in Ransom's favor, and despite the frightening circumstances, the officers are immune under the law from this suit.")

Schoettle v. Jefferson Cnty., 788 F.3d 855, 861 (8th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he record indisputably shows that even if the officers became aware at some point during their interaction with Schoettle that he was suffering a hypoglycemic episode, they were still confronted with a belligerent and impaired man who was refusing to comply with their orders to exit the vehicle and who was physically resisting their attempts to remove him from it. If the officers realized at some point that Schoettle's impairment was not attributable to any fault of his own, that knowledge would not have made Schoettle any less dangerous to himself and others while he was impaired. Given these facts, it is difficult to conceive how Schoettle could have received appropriate medical care without first being physically subdued. Indeed, as noted above, even after he was arrested Schoettle continued to resist until the ambulance arrived and was uncooperative with EMS personnel. The district court properly determined that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment on Schoettle's excessive force claim.")

Capps v. Olson, 780 F.3d 879, 885-86 (8th Cir. 2015) ("This Court must presume Capps was not facing Deputy Olson and Deputy Olson did not believe Capps possessed a weapon at the time of the shooting. If the jury were to determine that Capps refused to listen to Deputy Olson's commands and moved towards Deputy Olson with what appeared to be a weapon, the use of deadly force could have been objectively reasonable. However, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Capps we must conclude there is a factual dispute as to whether Deputy Olson violated Capps's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force. . . .Based on the facts we are required to assume, Capps did not pose a threat of significant bodily injury or death to Deputy Olson or Scribner. And Deputy Olson had fair and clear warning at the time of the shooting that the use of deadly force against a suspect who did not pose a threat of serious bodily injury or death was unconstitutional.")

Aipperspach v. McInerney, 766 F.3d 803, 807, 808 (8th Cir. 2014) ("The responding officers were confronted with a suspect who held what appeared to be a handgun, refused repeated commands to drop the gun, pointed it once at Sergeant Jones, and then waved it in the direction of officers deployed along the ridge line in an action they perceived as menacing. In these circumstances, objectively reasonable officers had probable cause to believe that Al–Hakim posed a threat of serious physical harm to the officers. . . .We agree with the general proposition that a video of the incident can create a genuine issue of material fact that precludes the grant of summary judgment in an excessive force case, just as a video established undisputed facts warranting summary judgment in Scott. We nonetheless reject Aipperspach's contention because the video in this case does not cast doubt on the factual sequence of events; at most, it supports an inference that Al–Hakim may have intended to surrender, despite refusing repeated prior demands to drop the gun, or that he may have waved the gun above his head to regain his balance, rather than to threaten the police officers. Those possible inferences are not germane to the issue of Fourth Amendment objective reasonableness. As the district court recognized, 'the inquiry here is not into [Mr. Al–Hakim's] state of mind or intentions, but whether, from an objective viewpoint and taking all factors into consideration, [each defendant officer] reasonably feared for his life' or the lives of his fellow officers. . . The video taken from high above the scene shed no material light on that question. Aipperspach presented no evidence contradicting the testimony that many officers at the scene of this 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving situation' perceived that Al–Hakim's actions posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm to the officers. On appeal, she contends that the district court ignored various fact disputes in making its ruling. We have closely examined the record and conclude that the fact issues she identifies were not material to the summary judgment analysis. Rather, our many cases declining to second-guess the 'split-second judgments' of officers in similar circumstances warranted the district court's conclusion that there was no genuine issue of material fact precluding the grant of summary judgment. . . Our conclusion that the individual police officers did not violate Al–Hakim's Fourth Amendment rights in using deadly force resolves Aipperspach's appeal from the grant of summary judgment to the City of Riverside, Riverside Police Chief Gregory Mills, and the Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners. Absent a constitutional violation by the individual defendants, the municipal defendants are not liable to the plaintiff.")

Smith v. Conway Cnty., Ark., 759 F.3d 853, 860, 861 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Assuming a reasonable officer in Zulpo's position—actually being kicked—could believe the kick was purposeful and aggressive, establishing Zulpo's first use of the taser was reasonable, we cannot say the same for the second taser deployment. . . .As to the second taser strike, a jury could find Smith was nonviolent and an objectively reasonable officer would not use a taser on Smith as corporal inducement, given Hickey's pronouncement that such methods cannot be used as a first resort to induce compliance of a nonviolent inmate in routine circumstances. . . We emphasize the fact that our conclusion might well be different 'where security concerns are ... immediately implicated,'. . . or where the force is used as a reasonable last resort to preserve 'discipline[]'. . . . But here, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Smith, we see a nonviolent pretrial detainee in pain, seeking help, having taser probes affixed to his abdomen, no longer acting aggressively toward the jailers (if he ever was), and attempting to comply with Zulpo's orders to get up. No 'security concern' or disciplinary necessity is apparent. . . . At a minimum, with regard to Zulpo's second taser strike, the district court correctly found, inferring Smith was a nonviolent inmate, Smith's constitutional right to be free from being tased for non-compliance was clearly established by Hickey as of the date of the incident. The law does not authorize the 'day-to-day policing of prisons' either 'by stun gun,'. . . or by taser.")

Smith v. City of Minneapolis, 754 F.3d 541, 548, 549 (8th Cir. 2014) ("As with the first part of the encounter with Officer Devick alone, Ms. Smith does not cite case law clearly establishing that any of the officers' actions were unconstitutional as of December 2008. The officers claim, correctly it seems, 'Appellant's analysis of the officers' qualified immunity argument utterly misses the crucial issue: there is no case law which informs these officers that they were on notice that the punches, kicks, knee strikes and tasers they used on Smith were unconstitutional.'. . Ms. Smith's counsel conceded at oral argument that the case law regarding tasers, a relatively new technology, is 'evolving.' We suspect, even without specific case law outlining a definitive number of constitutionally validated taser probes administered, an 'obvious' case of excessive force could still be established under the clearly established prong. . . But this case is not such an obvious case. Ms. Smith has not cited any case, much less any case that could cast the 'constitutional question beyond debate,' Al–Kidd, 563 U.S. at ——, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, such that any of the five officers would be on notice that his actions during the second part of the arrest violated Smith's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. . . Because we find none, and these case facts do not show an obvious constitutional violation, each officer is entitled to qualified immunity for his actions during the second encounter with Smith. The alleged conduct, even if unconstitutional, was not clearly established as such when it occurred.")

Loch v. City of Litchfield, 689 F.3d 961, 966 (8th Cir. 2012) ("The Lochs also note that Cassidy never brandished or aimed a firearm, and they assert broadly that '[i]t is objectively unreasonable to use deadly force against an unarmed suspect.' That is not the law. An act taken based on a mistaken perception or belief, if objectively reasonable, does not violate the Fourth Amendment. Krueger v. Fuhr, 991 F.2d 435, 439 (8th Cir.1993). Even if a suspect is ultimately 'found to be unarmed, a police officer can still employ deadly force if objectively reasonable.' Billingsley v. City of Omaha, 277 F.3d 990, 995 (8th Cir.2002).")

Hemphill v. Hale, 677 F.3d 799, 801 (8th Cir. 2012) (per curiam) ("In Chambers, we held that evidence of de minimis injury does not necessarily foreclose a Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim, that the force alleged was not reasonable under the circumstances, but that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the state of the law in August 2005 was such that a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, he would not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . .Chambers, however, did not address the situation alleged here: that the force was used in an attempt to coerce consent to a search. While in Chambers we stated that '[p]olice officers undoubtedly have a right to use some degree of physical force, or threat thereof, to effect a lawful seizure,'. . . we agree with the district court that officers do not have the right to use any degree of physical force or threatened force to coerce an individual to consent to a warrantless search of his home. . . Because no use of force to obtain Hemphill's consent to search would have been reasonable, the force Hale was alleged to have used—grabbing Hemphill by the neck, choking him, and hitting him two or three times while he was handcuffed—was objectively unreasonable given the facts and circumstances in the case. . .The law regarding forced consent was clearly established in August 2009 such that a reasonable person in Hale's position would have known that his actions were unreasonable.")

Shekleton v. Eichenberger, 677 F.3d 361, 366, 367 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Under these facts, Shekleton was an unarmed suspected misdemeanant, who did not resist arrest, did not threaten the officer, did not attempt to run from him, and did not behave aggressively towards him. Shekleton has established that a violation of a constitutional right occurred in that a reasonable officer would not have deployed his taser under the circumstances as presented by Shekleton. . . .Having determined that Shekleton has established that a violation of a constitutional right occurred, we move to our next inquiry: determining whether Deputy Eichenberger's use of the taser against Shekleton constituted a clearly established constitutional violation. Deputy Eichenberger contends in his brief that at the time of the incident it was not a clearly established violation of law to use his taser under the circumstances and contends that our taser jurisprudence is in a state of flux. . . . Deputy Eichenberger is correct that at the time of the incident, we had not yet had an opportunity to determine whether an officer's use of a taser on a nonviolent, nonfleeing misdemeanant was an excessive use of force. However, the right to be free from excessive force dates back to the adoption of the Bill of Rights of our Constitution . . . . That the level of force used must be justified in light of 'the severity of the crime at issue,' the suspect's flight risk, and the immediacy of the risk posed by the suspect to the safety of officers and others was the clearly established law on the night of the incident. . . In Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d at 491, decided after the incident between Shekleton and Deputy Eichenberger, we were presented with an officer's use of a taser in facts similar to this case. There, we determined that the general law prohibiting excessive force in place at the time of the incident was sufficient to inform an officer that use of his taser on a nonfleeing, nonviolent suspected misdemeanant was unreasonable, even though we did not have a case specifically addressing officer taser use prior to the incident. . .As in Brown, we agree that the general constitutional principles against excessive force that were clearly established at the time of the incident between Deputy Eichenberger and Shekleton were such as to put a reasonable officer on notice that tasering Shekleton under the circumstances as presented by Shekleton was excessive force in violation of the clearly established law.")

Montoya v. City of Flandreau, 669 F.3d 867, 871, 872 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[A]t the time Officer Hooper performed the 'leg sweep,' Montoya was not threatening anyone, was not actively resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee. At most, her actions amounted to a violation of a law restricting disorderly conduct, a misdemeanor punishable by no more than thirty days' imprisonment, a fine of five hundred dollars, or both. . . Moreover, although not dispositive, the severity of the injuries she sustained is a relevant factor in determining the reasonableness of the force used, . . . and we cannot agree with the district court the fact Montoya sustained a broken leg is simply an 'unfortunate' and 'unintended' consequence of what the court described as objectively reasonable use of force by Officer Hooper. . .Based on the physical distance between Montoya and Cournoyer at the time of the incident (ten to fifteen feet), the nature of the crime at issue (disorderly conduct), and the degree of the injury suffered (a broken leg), we cannot say the force used by Officer Hooper was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. Accepting Montoya's version of events as true, as we must under the present procedural posture, we conclude genuine issues of material fact exists as to whether Officer Hooper used excessive force against Montoya. While a jury may credit Officer Hooper's characterization of the incident and disbelieve Montoya at trial, 'it is not our function to remove the credibility assessment from the jury.'. . . Finding Officer Hooper's use of force was objectively reasonable as a matter of law, the district court concluded Montoya failed to establish a violation of a constitutional right, entitling Officer Hooper to qualified immunity on her § 1983 claim. For the reasons stated above, however, the district court erred in concluding, as a matter of law, Officer Hooper did not violate Montoya's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Montoya, as we must at this stage, we conclude she alleged sufficient facts to show a constitutional violation of her rights. We further conclude the constitutional right Officer Hooper allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the misconduct, as required by the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Assuming once again Montoya's story is true, the contours of the right at issue were sufficiently clear to inform a reasonable officer in Officer Hooper's position it was unlawful for him to perform a 'leg sweep' and throw to the ground a nonviolent, suspected misdemeanant who was not threatening anyone, was not actively resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee.")

El-Ghazzawy v. Berthiaume, 636 F.3d 452, 460 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Counsel may shout 'officer safety' until blue-in-the-face, but the Fourth Amendment does not tolerate, nor has the Supreme Court or this Court ever condoned, pat-down searches without some specific and articulable facts to warrant a reasonable officer in the belief that the person detained was armed and dangerous. The Supreme Court has, in interpreting the Fourth Amendment, struck a balance between the justifiable concern for officer safety when confronting an individual and the substantial individual interest in being free from unreasonable intrusion. The Framers' concerns and clear intent to protect individuals from arbitrary government intrusion was enshrined in the Fourth Amendment to prevent situations such as those alleged here–officers, having no reason to fear for their safety, may not require citizens, whom they have not arrested, to stand up against gates or place their hands on police cars, and submit to searches. This has long been the law.")

McKenney v. Harrison, 635 F.3d 354, 358, 359 (8th Cir. 2011) ("We conclude that the entry into the home did not violate Barnes's clearly established constitutional rights. It was reasonable for the officers to believe that their obligation to knock and announce their presence, or to ascertain the arrestee's presence, does not apply to an abandoned property. . . .Even though it turned out that Barnes had not actually abandoned the house, officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment if they act upon a mistake of fact that is objectively reasonable . . . and they are also entitled to qualified immunity if a mistake about abandonment was objectively reasonable. . . . When Barnes made a sudden movement toward the window, which the officers reasonably interpreted as an active attempt to evade arrest by flight, the officers were entitled to use force to prevent Barnes's escape and effect the arrest. . . Although the charges were limited to misdemeanors, the officers executing the warrant were not required to let Barnes run free. Despite the fatal consequences of the incident, the level of force employed also was not unreasonable. Pollreis used only a single Taser shock. She was required to react in a split second as Barnes sought to escape through a window only six to eight feet away. The alternative of attempting to subdue Barnes by tackling him posed a risk to the safety of the officer and did not ensure a successful arrest. The officers had warned Barnes. Just before he lunged, Harrison told Barnes not to do anything stupid, and Pollreis said 'you don't want to be tased.' And although the outcome was tragic, a reasonable officer, knowing that a Taser is designed to incapacitate instantly, could have believed that the force would incapacitate Barnes before he reached the window, while he was not in an 'elevated position' and likely to fall. Under these circumstances, we conclude that the force used by Pollreis was reasonable.")

McKenney v. Harrison, 635 F.3d 354, 361, 363 (8th Cir. 2011) (Murphy, J., concurring) ("While I concur in the opinion of the court, I believe that law enforcement use of tasers merits further reflection. This case illustrates one kind of tragic result that can follow the employment of a taser. The developing law on taser use must consider the unique nature of this type of weapon and the increased potential for possibly lethal results created by newer models. . . . [L]aw enforcement agencies would be well advised to address their potential liability from posttasing falls, both by rulemaking and by training.")

Krout v. Goemmer, 583 F.3d 557, 565 (8th Cir. 2009) ("As of July 2006, it was clearly established that a state actor may be liable for an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment if he fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another official.").

Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 499 (8th Cir. 2009) ("At the time Zarrett deployed his Taser and arrested Sandra, the law was sufficiently clear to inform a reasonable officer that it was unlawful to Taser a nonviolent, suspected misdemeanant who was not fleeing or resisting arrest, who posed little to no threat to anyone's safety, and whose only noncompliance with the officer's commands was to disobey two orders to end her phone call to a 911 operator.").

Engleman v. Murray, 546 F.3d 944, 951 (8th Cir. 2008) ("Even though Deputy Murray lacked the authority to execute the valid Arkansas arrest warrant in Oklahoma, we conclude that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Engleman, Deputy Murray's belief that he was arresting Engleman in Arkansas was objectively reasonable. Therefore, we conclude Deputy Murray did not violate the Fourth Amendment and is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Engleman v. Murray, 546 F.3d 944, 951, 952 (8th Cir. 2008) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("I believe an out-of-state arrest by a police officer violates the clearly-established Fourth Amendment rights of the arrestee. I also believe genuine questions of material fact remain in dispute about whether it was objectively reasonable for an officer in Deputy Murray's position to have believed he was arresting Stephen Engleman in Arkansas rather than Oklahoma. I therefore respectfully dissent. First, I take issue with the Court's suggestion in footnote five that Engleman's arrest did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. The Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from unreasonable seizures. And, that right is clearly established in the specific context of this case, because the recognition of the jurisdictional limits of an officer executing a warrant dates back to English common law, as the Court itself notes. This is not a situation where a peace officer licensed in the state of Arkansas merely crossed a municipal or county line. Rather, the officer executed an arrest warrant in a state where he knew he was unlicensed and had no authority. Would it comport with the Fourth Amendment for an Arkansas police officer to execute a warrant in, for example, the state of Maine? No. For the same reason, an arrest by an Arkansas officer in Oklahoma violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable seizures.")

Moore v. Indehar, 514 F.3d 756, 763 (8th Cir. 2008) ("On the facts we are required to assume at this point in the case, Moore posed no threat to Officers Indehar and Hafstad or to any other person; Officer Indehar admitted as much in his deposition and in his responses to Moore's interrogatories. When Officer Indehar arrived on the scene, shots had been fired, however he specifically noted that Moore was not holding a firearm and the only action Moore took was to flee the scene. Thus, a reasonable officer would have known shooting Moore was a violation of Moore's constitutional rights; as such, a right to be free from the use of excessive force in Moore's situation was clearly established.").

Kenyon v. Edwards, 502 F.3d 722, 724-28 (8th Cir. 2007) (denial of pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc) (Beam, J., joined by Riley, J., dissenting) ("While it is not entirely clear what the district court purported to do, it is perfectly clear what it did not do. It did not follow the requirements of either Schatz or Saucier. The district court appears to have ruled that if a jury (or other undisclosed fact-finder) gives Kenyon's allegations their best factual gloss, Edwards violated Kenyon's constitutional right to be free from the use of excessive force. The district court does not appear to have dealt with Saucier's second question at all. If the district court's cryptic order means that there are facts yet to be determined at this second step, this would constitute an even more egregious violation of both Supreme Court and circuit precedent. In reality, then, as earlier indicated, the district court ignored both Schatz and Saucier but the en banc panel now affirms this procedure through misuse of the evenly divided court affirmance rule. Schatz and the equally divided court rule aside, the district court apparently attempted to follow the route taken by the Ninth Circuit in Saucier, a pathway that was specifically and soundly rejected by the Supreme Court. . . . In summary, giving plaintiff Kenyon's allegations the most charitable reading possible, the district court tentatively determined that Officer Edwards possibly violated Kenyon's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. On this tenuous basis alone, and without ruling on Edwards' contention that a reasonable officer under the specific facts of this situation would not have known he was violating Kenyon's rights, the district court denied Edwards qualified immunity and set the underlying dispute for trial. At the previous trial, as also earlier noted, some number of the members of the jury rejected Kenyon's factual allegations. On appeal to a three-judge panel, two members of the panel rejected Kenyon's constitutional and reasonable knowledge claims. On appeal to a twelve-member en banc panel, six members of the en banc court would have granted Edwards immunity on one or both of his Saucier claims. So, although Kenyon has not mustered a necessary majority vote on any of the underlying or interlocutory claims at any point in this dispute, Officer Edwards is headed back to a jury trial on the excessive force claim through the unfortunate misapplication of the so-called equally divided court rule. We should never condone police brutality. Neither should we disregard the difficulties inherent in the work of our police community. The people of Searcy, Arkansas, sent Officer Edwards into a dicey situation in which he was forced to encounter plaintiff Kenyon, a less than cooperative individual based on undisputed portions of the record before us. Although Edwards handled his duties in a totally lawful manner in the view of some jurors and at least two (or perhaps more) of the circuit judges reviewing the matter, he now finds his time, reputation and personal assets in jeopardy at a jury trial that should not be allowed to occur. From this result I dissent. And if a majority of the en banc panel insists on pursuing this course of action, I urge Officer Edwards to seek relief through writ of certiorari to the United States Supreme Court.").

Ngo v. Storlie, 495 F.3d 597, 604 (8th Cir. 2007) ("[W]e agree with the district court that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether a reasonable officer faced with these circumstances would have believed that his conduct was legal. Storlie exited his squad car and opened fire with a semi-automatic machine gun on a kneeling, unarmed man. He fired within a 'split-second' of exiting the squad car, without giving any warnings or attempting to determine whether Ngo was, in fact, the suspect described on the radio transmission. Further, Storlie knew there was a plainclothes officer somewhere in the area. Thus, it was unreasonable for Storlie to fire on the first person he saw without first making the determination of who that person was.").

Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1007, 1009 (8th Cir. 2007) The defendants do not dispute on appeal the jury's finding that Officer Bruce conducted the strip search in an unreasonable manner in violation of Richmond's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, we proceed directly to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether the asserted constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, the officers had reasonable suspicion that Richmond was concealing evidence on his person and were in a position to conduct a private, hygienic and non-abusive strip search on the spot, rather than risk Richmond disposing of the evidence during the course of his transportation to the police station. . . . No clearly established legal standards would have put a reasonable officer on notice that, in these particular circumstances, it was objectively unreasonable to lower the handcuffed arrestee's pants and boxer shorts to accomplish the strip search, rather than to risk loss of evidence by waiting until the arrestee was in an environment where handcuffs were not required.").

McVay ex rel Estate of McVay v. Sisters of Mercy Health System, 399 F.3d 904, 908 (8th Cir. 2005) ("Here, we need not inquire beyond the first step of the Saucier analysis. We hold, taking the facts alleged in the light most favorable to McVay, that there was no constitutional violation. McVay argues Sears violated her son's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure by employing excessive force in stopping him from exiting the hospital. . . . Given the circumstances in this case, including the fact that McVay was disoriented and exhibiting signs of lacking mental control, that he was barreling toward glass doors that Sears knew would not open, and the rapid pace of events as Sears raced to reach McVay before McVay reached the locked doors, even if Sears forced McVay to the floor in a 'tackle,' doing so was not an excessive use of force.").

Craighead v. Lee, 399 F.3d 954, 962 & n.4, 963 (8th Cir. 2005) ("Although the first question is one of objective reasonableness and the second question is also one of reasonableness, the Supreme Court emphasized in Saucier that the two questions are not duplicative and must be addressed separately. The key distinction between the two questions is that the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity before a court can determine whether it was clearly established. [citing Brosseau] Neither party has cited a case with facts substantially similar to those we are required to assume on this appeal, nor have we found one. Nonetheless, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances .' [citing Hope]'Although earlier cases involving Afundamentally similar" facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' . . Hence, the issue is not whether prior cases present facts substantially similar to the present case but whether prior cases would have put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of deadly force in these circumstances would violate Craighead's right not to be seized by the use of excessive force. At least since Garner was decided nearly 20 years ago, officers have been on notice that they may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others. On the facts we are required to assume, Craighead did not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to Lee at the time Lee fired the shotgun because the pistol was continuously over Craighead's head, pointed upward, as Craighead was keeping it from the smaller Scott. Even if Lee thought that Craighead posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to Scott, the facts we are required to assume show that Lee fired the shotgun in circumstances in which he knew or should have known that he would hit both Craighead and Scott, so he cannot have fired the shot to protect Scott. Nor does Lee claim that he fired to protect Scott. The facts we are required to assume show that a warning was feasible but not given. Moreover, Craighead was grappling with Scott; he was not fleeing when Lee fired the shot. . . . Unlike Brosseau, which the Supreme Court decided on December 13, 2004, the facts we must assume show that Lee gave no commands and made no attempt to use less-than-deadly force; nor, as mentioned, was Craighead fleeing when Lee fired. . . Before December 3, 2001, this Court had denied qualified immunity in at least four cases in which the plaintiff presented evidence to show that the officer used deadly force under circumstances in which the officer should have known that the person did not present an immediate threat of serious physical injury or death. [citing cases] Those cases, along with Garner, put officers on notice before December 3, 2001, that they may not use deadly force under circumstances in which they should know that the suspect does not present an immediate threat of serious physical injury or harm. Craighead's right not to be seized by deadly force was clearly established with sufficient specificity to meet the second prong of Saucier.").

Smith v. Appledorn, No. 11–2966 (JNE/SER), 2013 WL 451320, *4, *5 (D. Minn. Feb. 6, 2013) ("Smith correctly observes that some recent district court opinions could be read to apply a bright-line rule when Tasers are used on nonviolent, nonresisting suspected misdemeanants. See Newton

v. Walker, No. 11–cv–1499, 2012 WL 4856163, at *3 (D.Minn. Oct. 12, 2012). The Court rejects the idea that Tasers—or any other of the modern nonlethal alternatives—should occupy a sui generis position in search and seizure law. The problem with tasing a 'fully compliant individual, who has committed no crime,'. . . is not the choice of using a Taser rather than boots; it is the use of force at all. It has been clearly established for many years that an officer cannot seize a person without having specific and articulable facts to justify the intrusion. . . A reasonable officer in 2009 would have known that it would be unreasonable to use any amount of force to seize a person in the position—injured, complying, and not fighting—that Smith maintains that he was in. Because there are material fact issues that are in dispute, the Court denies Defendant's motion for summary judgment.")

McClennon v. Kipke, Civ. No. 10-2598 (RHK/JJK), 2011 WL 5177393, at *3-*5 (D. Minn. Oct. 31, 2011) ("[T]he Eighth Circuit recently noted that 'over the course of more than fifteen years, ... it ... remain[ed] an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury." Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 904 (8th Cir.2011) (emphasis added). Indeed, different Eighth-Circuit panels had reached different answers to that question since the 1990s. [citing cases] Chambers put an end to this uncertainty, holding that the excessive-force inquiry must focus on the force applied and not its end result, that is, the level of injury. . . . But as Chambers noted, the Eighth Circuit's inconsistent decisions had left it unclear for more than a decade whether 'an officer violated the rights of an arrestee by applying force that caused only de minimis injury.'. . . In other words, it was not clearly established pre-Chambers that an officer violated an arrestee's rights, no matter how much force he applied, if he caused only de minimis injuries. . . As a result, the Eighth Circuit determined that the police officers in Chambers, who were accused of excessive force but who caused only de minimis injuries, were entitled to qualified immunity because at the time of the plaintiff's arrest ("ugust 2005) it was 'reasonable for the officers to believe that they remained within constitutional bounds if that was the result' of their conduct. . .Seizing on Chambers, the Individual Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity here because (1) McClennon suffered only de minimis injuries and (2) it was not clearly established on December 20, 2006, that inflicting a de minimis injury was unconstitutional. (Def. Mem. at 12-17.) The latter assertion cannot seriously be disputed in light of Chambers. And the Court agrees with the former assertion, because case law indicates that McClennon's injuries were de minimis. . . . Although not expressly argued by him, McClennon also appears to suggest that the officers' application of a Taser necessarily inflicted something more than de minimis injury. . .But while a Taser delivers a 'painful and frightening blow' that can render 'even the most pain tolerant individuals utterly limp,' McKenney v. Harrison, 635 F.3d 354, 362 (8th Cir. 2011), the Eighth Circuit has held that in the absence of evidence of long- term effects, the use of a Taser does 'not inflict any serious injury.'")

Neely v. Jefferson County, Ark., No. 5:10-cv-40-DPM, 2011 WL 3565585, at *3 (E.D. Ark. Aug. 12, 2011) ("Dolphin is entitled to qualified immunity in any event. He was trained not to tase suspects in a body of water without a second officer or rescue team being present. Jefferson County's written taser policy also prohibited using the taser if a suspect might fall into a deep body of water after being immobilized. Despite his training, Dolphin did not remember this part of the policy. Dolphin's actions thus violated the letter of the policy. This fact weighs against the reasonableness of Dolphin's actions. But no clearly established law echoes the County policy. Instead, 'case law related to the [t]aser is [in the] developing stage[.]' McKenney, 635 F.3d at 361-62 (Murphy, J., concurring). Therefore, even if Dolphin violated the Fourth Amendment by tasing Howie near deep water, his violation of law was not well-established in February 2007.")

Orsak v. Metropolitan Airports Com'n Airport Police Dept., No. 08-5274 (JRT/FLN), 2009 WL 5030776, at *12, *13 (D. Minn. Dec. 14, 2009) ("The Court notes that Officer Wingate's account of the incident differs significantly from the facts as the Court must view them for purposes of summary judgment. . . .The Court will observe that the deployment of tasers by law enforcement has become widespread. Tasers obviously can and do serve an important function. The fact that tasers have become ubiquitous does not mean the device should be used routinely or indiscriminately. As noted above, tasers cause pain to the victim which is often excruciating and very painful. Given the constitutional requirement that use of force not be unreasonable, it is critical that the use of tasers be limited to situations in which officer safety is a legitimate concern and other, less painful means of subduing a difficult individual are not available. When the facts in this case are viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, Officer Wingate's actions in ordering use of the taser fail the test. Ultimate resolution of this case, however, will depend on a jury's determination of the facts and a jury's assessment of the credibility of the witnesses.").

Mahamed v. Anderson, No. 07-4815 ADM/FLN, 2009 WL 873534, at *5 (D. Minn. Mar. 30, 2009) ("Reviewing courts have split on whether the use of a taser is a clearly established constitutional violation depending on the degree of aggressiveness of the defendant. [collecting cases] Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mahamed, he was uncooperative but not dangerous or threatening, and therefore the use of a taser violated his clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. For this reason, summary judgment is denied on the claim of excessive force against Pedersen.")

Nunn v. City of Woodbury, Civil No. 05-632 ADM/JSM, 2006 WL 3759748, at *9 (D. Minn. Dec. 21, 2006) ("As is discussed above, Officer Gort's conduct did not violate Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Even if it did, the right at issue is not clearly established. It is true that from a generalized perspective, the right to be free from unreasonable seizures under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established. However, when viewed in a more particularized sense, it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that Gort's actions were unlawful in the situation he confronted. From Officer Gort's objective perspective, Nunn was fleeing from police after receiving a disorderly conduct citation and engaging in a course of conduct in which he followed police squad cars at a very close distance, flashed his bright lights, and honked his horn. Nunn appeared aggressive, angry, and uncontrollable. Nunn had already stopped his vehicle once after sliding into a snow bank, only to reverse out of it and continue driving away from the police. Gort ended the pursuit by ramming his squad car into Nunn's car at a speed of approximately twenty miles per hour. It cannot be said that no reasonably competent officer, making a split-second judgment in this tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving situation, would have taken the same action that Officer Gort did. Accordingly, the Officer Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Briceno v. Williams, No. 21-55624, 2022 WL 1599254 (9th Cir. May 20, 2022) (Tallman, J., dissenting) (not reported) ("I write separately to express my increasing concern that our Circuit's caselaw micromanages the police in ways that do not appreciate the dangers officers face in the field and fails to grant qualified immunity when officers are placed at great risk 'in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving'—in contravention of the Supreme Court's repeated admonishments. . . This is particularly so when a lone officer is attempting to effect the arrest of a non-cooperating suspect. Ironically, the only person to have suffered any serious injury here during the foot pursuit was not the plaintiff; it was the officer. Although 'we may not consider questions of evidentiary sufficiency, i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial,'. . . I would conclude that, adopting Briceno's version of the facts, 'no reasonable jury could conclude' that Officer Williams employed excessive force here[.] . . . While the majority makes much of the fact that the crimes at issue constituted only misdemeanors, that does not end the inquiry. If it did, this area of the law would be far simpler. Officer Williams, a member of a uniformed, proactive anti-crime team tasked with patrolling high crime areas of San Diego in search of crimes in progress, was investigating a situation that any police officer would understand presented reasonable suspicion that criminal activity was afoot. Before Officer Williams could conduct even a cursory assessment of what might be transpiring, Briceno fled the scene, disregarding Officer Williams' commands to stop and frustrating his inquiries. . . In response to Briceno's flight, Officer Williams pursued him alone in the dark through the high-crime neighborhood—injuring himself in the process when he fell chasing Briceno and losing the battery to his portable radio, leaving him without backup in a dark setting where no one else knew where he was—to regain control of the situation despite Briceno's active resistance. . . Once Officer Williams was able to bring Briceno to the ground by tackling him, he had not yet gained control over the situation; Briceno still had his hand underneath him and near his waistband, and Officer Williams knew from prior experience and training that 'suspects have pulled guns and knives from their waistband.' It is irrelevant that Officer Williams did not know Briceno was indeed carrying a small knife. Nor is it relevant that other officers subsequently failed to search Briceno after Officer Williams transferred Briceno to their custody. . . . The Supreme Court has frequently reminded us that officer safety is paramount in these stop-and-frisk situations. . . Given Briceno's flight late at night in a high-crime neighborhood and that his hand was located near his waistband where weapons are often kept, it was undeniably reasonable for an officer in Officer Williams' position to fear that Briceno might be armed. Reasonably fearing that Briceno could reach for a weapon in an area he could not see, endangering Officer Williams and any others in the area, Officer Williams used the minimal force of distraction strikes with his hand in order to stop the resistance, restrain Briceno in handcuffs, and secure the scene. . . What else was the officer supposed to do? He did not employ pepper spray, a baton, a taser, or even draw his weapon. To deny qualified immunity in a case like this asks a lone Officer Williams to leave himself vulnerable to attack by an unsecured suspect with a potential weapon. Indeed, it is well-established in use of force cases that 'the most important single element of the three specified factors [is] whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others.'. . Clearly, Briceno still did when the distraction strikes were delivered. For these reasons, no reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Williams employed excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Nor in September of 2013 would clearly established law have led a reasonable officer to conclude that he could not use the minimal force of distraction strikes in order to gain compliance over a struggling suspect's hands. . . . .We should declare that no reasonable jury could find that Officer Williams violated the Fourth Amendment by employing distraction strikes to restrain Briceno in response to his active resistance of arrest here. We are bound to faithfully apply the doctrine of qualified immunity unless and until it is overruled or articulated differently. . . Gilbert and Sullivan were right: 'A policeman's lot is not a happy one.'. . I respectfully dissent from the majority's erroneous analysis which jeopardizes the safety of officers like Williams in a dangerous situation like this.")

Hyde v. City of Willcox, 23 F.4th 863, 872-73 (9th Cir. 2022) ("[W]e are generally loath to second-guess law enforcement officers' actions in a dangerous situation by analyzing each act without looking at the entire event and considering the officers' mindset amid the uncertainty and chaos. We should not scrutinize an officer's every minor move in a frantic and chaotic situation as if we were examining the Zapruder film in slow-motion. But here, Pralgo and Callahan-English had two minutes to realize that Hyde—who was handcuffed, shackled, and exhausted—could no longer resist and did not pose a threat. It is clearly established that officers cannot use intermediate force when a suspect is restrained, has stopped resisting, and does not pose a threat. These two officers thus cannot shield themselves by invoking qualified immunity.")

Amons v. Tindall, No. 20-16351, 2021 WL 3015107 (9th Cir. July 15, 2021) (not reported) ("The district court's analysis contains two errors, one of fact and one of law. First, as a factual matter, the videotape plainly demonstrates that Mr. Amons did not follow the officers' commands. The district court was apparently persuaded that a factfinder might reasonably have accepted Plaintiffs-Appellees' argument that Mr. Amons was confronted with 'contradictory commands' because Officer Arellano said, 'Okay. Leave your hands right there. My partner's going to take you out of the car right now, alright?' But this statement contains only one command: 'Leave your hands right there.' By informing Mr. Amons that his partner was going to take him out of the car, Officer Arellano did not command Mr. Amons to unbuckle his seatbelt. Second, as a legal matter, the district court erred by considering Mr. Amons's subjective intent rather than viewing the evidence objectively from the perspective of an officer in Officer Tindall's position. With the benefit of hindsight, and with the ability to minutely parse the body-worn camera footage, we agree that Amons may have intended to unbuckle his seatbelt, not to reach for his weapon. However, Mr. Amons's subjective intent is legally irrelevant to the question presented here. 'The "reasonableness" of a particular use of force must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight,' and '[w]e cannot consider evidence of which the officers were unaware.'. . A reasonable factfinder would necessarily find that in the face of repeated commands to put his hands up, Mr. Amons failed to do so and instead reached in the direction of a gun that was mere inches from his hand. Thus, whatever Mr. Amons intended to do, Officer Tindall's decision to respond with deadly force was objectively reasonable. The district court erred by denying his motion for summary judgment.")
